Secondly. The proof of this proposition, that both Jews and Gentiles stand in need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God, and that neither the one nor the other have any of their own to plead. Justification must be either by faith or works. It cannot be by works, which he proves at large by describing the works both of Jews and Gentiles; and therefore he concludes it must be by faith, ch. iii. 20, 28. The apostle, like a skilful surgeon, before he applies the plaister, searches the wound—endeavours first to convince of guilt and wrath, and then to shew the way of salvation. This makes the Gospel the more welcome. We must first see the righteousness of God condemning, and then the righteousness of God justifying will appear worthy of all acceptance. In general, ver. 18, "the wrath of God is revealed." The light of nature and the light of the law reveal the wrath of God from sin to sin. It is well for us that the Gospel reveals the justifying righteousness of God from faith to faith. The antithesis is observable. Here is,

1. The sinfulness of man described. He reduceth it to two heads, "ungodliness and unrighteousness;" ungodliness against the laws of the first table, unrighteousness against those of the second.

2. The cause of that sinfulness; and that is, "holding the truth in unrighteousness." Some communes notitiae, some ideas they had of the being of God, and of the difference of good and evil, but they held them in unrighteousness; that is, they knew and professed them in a consistency with their wicked courses. They held the truth as a captive or prisoner, that it should not influence them, as otherwise it would. An unrighteous wicked heart is the dungeon in which many a good truth is detained and buried. "Holding fast the form of sound words in faith and love" is the root of all religion, 2 Tim. i. 13; but holding it fast in unrighteousness is the root of all sin.

3. The displeasure of God against it. "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven," not only in the written word, "which is given by inspiration of God," (the Gentiles had not that,) but in the providences of God, his judgments executed upon sinners, which do not spring out of the dust, or fall out by chance, nor are they to be ascribed to second causes, but they are a revelation from heaven. Or, 'wrath from heaven is revealed;' it is not the wrath of a man like ourselves, 'but wrath from heaven,' therefore the more terrible and the more unavoidable.

19 Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. 20 For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: 21 Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. 22 Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, 23 And changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things. 24 Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to dishonour their own bodies between themselves: 25 Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more showing that this state is the gift of God, and not earned by man. That it is not God's personal righteousness is shown by the context and absence of the article. It is a righteousness of God—i.e., a Divine gift of righteousness, a plan devised by God for man to be righteous before him; thus answering the question of Job. xxv. 4" (Vaughan). "Revealed:" rather, "is in process of unveiling." "From faith to faith:" depending on faith from first to last.

i. 18. "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven:" is in process than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen. 26 For this cause God gave them up unto vile affections: for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature: 27 And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves that recompence of their error which was meet. 28 And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; 29 Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, 30 Backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, 31 Without understanding, covenant-breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: 32 Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them.

In this last part of the chapter the apostle applies what he had said particularly to the Gentile world, in which we may observe,

First. The means and helps they had to come to the knowledge of God. Though they had not such a knowledge of his law as Jacob and Israel had, Ps. cxlvii. 20, yet among them "he left not himself without witness, Acts xiv. 17; "for that which may be known," &c. ver. 19, 20. Observe,

1. What discoveries they had: "That which may be known of God is manifest," ἐν αὐτοῖς,—"among them;" that is, there were some even among them that had the knowledge of God, were convinced of the existence of one supreme Nūmen. The philosophy of Pythagoras, Plato, and the Stoics, discovered a great deal of the knowledge of God, as appears by abundance of testimonies. "That which may be known," which implies that there is a great deal which may not be known. The being of God may be apprehended, but cannot be comprehended. We cannot by searching find him out, Job xi. 7-9. Finite understandings cannot perfectly know an infinite being; but, blessed be God, there is that which may be known, enough to lead us to our chief end, the glorifying and enjoying of him; and these things revealed belong to us and to our children, while secret things are not to be pried into, Deu. xxix. 29.

2. Whence they had these discoveries: "God hath shewn it to them." Those common natural notions which they had of God were imprinted upon their hearts by the God of nature himself, who is the Father of lights. This sense of a Deity, and a regard to that Deity, are so connate with the human nature that some think we are to distinguish men from brutes by these rather than by reason.

3. By what way and means these discoveries and notions which they had were confirmed and improved, namely, by the work of creation; ver. 20, "For the invisible things of God," &c. 1st. Observe what they knew: "The invisible things of him, even his eternal power and godhead." Though God be not the object of sense, yet he hath discovered and made known himself by those things that are sensible. The power and godhead of God are invisible things, and yet are clearly seen in their products. He works in secret, (Job xxiii. 8, 9, Ps. cxxxix. 13; Ecc. xi. 5) but manifests what he has wrought, and therein makes known his power and godhead, and others of his attributes which natural light apprehends in the idea of a God. They could not come by natural light to the knowledge of the three persons in the godhead, (though some fancy they have found footsteps of this in Plato's writings,) but they did come to the knowledge of the godhead, at least so much knowledge as was sufficient to have kept them from idolatry. This was that truth which they held in unrighteousness. 2nd. How they knew it. "By the things that are made," which could not make themselves, nor fall into such an exact order and harmony by any casual hits; and therefore must have been produced by some first cause or intelligent agent, which first cause could be no other than an eternal powerful God: see Ps. xix. 1; Isa. xl. 26; Acts xvii. 24. The workman is known by his work. The variety, multitude, order, beauty, harmony, different nature, and excellent contrivance of the things that are made, the direction of them to certain ends, and the concurrence of all the parts to the good and beauty of the whole, do abundantly prove a Creator, and his eternal power and godhead. Thus did the light shine in the darkness. And this "from the creation of the world." Understand it either, First, As the topic from which the knowledge of them is drawn. To evince this truth, we have recourse to the great work of creation. And some think this κτίσις κόσμου,—"this creature of the world," (as it may be read,) is to be understood of man, the κτίσις κατ' ἐξοχήν,—"the most remarkable creature" of the lower world, called κτίσις, Mar. xvi. 15. The frame and structure of human bodies, and especially the most excellent powers, faculties, and capacities of human souls, do abundantly prove that there is a Creator, and that he is God. Or, Secondly, As the date of the discovery. It is as old as the creation of the world. In this sense ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου is most frequently used in Scripture. These notions concerning God are not any modern discoveries, hit upon of late, but ancient truths, which were from the beginning. The way of the acknowledgment of God is a good old way; it was from the beginning. Truth got the start of error.

Secondly. Their gross idolatry, notwithstanding these discoveries that God made to them of himself, described here, ver. 21-23, 25. We shall the less wonder at the inefficacy of these natural discoveries to prevent the idolatry of the Gentiles if we remember how prone even the Jews, who had Scripture light to guide them, were to idolatry; so miserably are the degenerate sons of men plunged in the mire of sense. Observe,

1. The inward cause of their idolatry, ver. 21, 22. They are therefore without excuse, in that they did know God, and from what they knew might easily infer that it was their duty to worship him, and him only. Though some have greater light and means of knowledge than others, yet all have enough to leave them inexcusable. But the mischief of it was that, 1st. "They glorified him not as God." Their affections towards him, and their awe and adoration of him, did not keep pace with their knowledge. To glorify him as God is to glorify him only; for there can be but one infinite; but they did not so glorify him, for they set up a multitude of other deities. To glorify him as God is to worship him with spiritual worship; but they made images of him. Not to glorify God as God is in effect not to glorify him at all; to respect him as a creature is not to glorify him, but to dishonour him. 2nd. "Neither were they thankful;" not thankful for the favours in general they received from God, (insensibleness of God's mercies is at the bottom of our sinful departures from him;) not thankful in particular for the discoveries God was pleased to make of himself to them. Those that do not improve the means of knowledge and grace are justly reckoned unthankful for them. 3rd. "But they became vain in their imaginations," ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς,—"in their reasonings," in their practical inferences. They had a great deal of knowledge of general truths, ver. 19, but no prudence to apply them to particular cases. Or, in their notions of God, and the creation of the world, and the origination of mankind, and the chief good; in these things, when they quitted the plain truth, they soon disputed themselves into a thousand vain and foolish fancies. The several opinions and hypotheses of the various sects of philosophers concerning these things were so many vain imaginations. When truth is forsaken, errors multiply in infinitum,—"infinitely." 4th. "And their foolish heart was darkened." The foolishness and practical wickedness of the heart cloud and darken the intellectual powers and faculties. Nothing tends more to the blinding and perverting of the understanding than the corruption and depravedness of the will and affections. 5th. "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools," ver. 22. This looks black upon the philosophers, the pretenders to wisdom and professors of it. Those that had the most luxuriant fancy, in framing to themselves the idea of a God, fell into the most gross and absurd conceits; and it was the just punishment of their pride and self-conceit. It has been observed that the most refined of nations, that made the greatest show of wisdom, were the arrantest fools in religion. The barbarians adored the sun and moon, which of all others was the most specious idolatry; while the learned Egyptians worshipped an ox and an onion. The Grecians, who excelled them in wisdom, adored diseases and human passions. The Romans, the wisest of all, worshipped the furies. And at this day the poor Americans worship the thunder; while the ingenious Chinese adore the devil. Thus "the world by wisdom knew not God," 1 Cor. i. 21. As a profession of wisdom is an aggravation of folly, so a proud conceit of wisdom is the cause of a great deal of folly. Hence we read of few philosophers who were converted to Christianity; and Paul's preaching was no where so laughed at and ridiculed as among the learned Athenians, Acts xvii. 18-32. φρόνησεν εἶναι,—"conceited themselves" to be wise. The plain truth of the being of God would not content them; they thought themselves above that, and so fell into the greatest errors.

2. The outward acts of their idolatry, ver. 23-25. 1st. Making images of God, ver. 23, by which, as much as in them lay, "they changed the glory of the incorruptible God;" compare Ps. cvi. 20; Jer. ii. 11. They ascribed a deity to the most contemptible creatures, and by them represented God. It was the greatest honour God did to man that he made man in the image of God; but it is the greatest dishonour man has done to God that he has made God in the image of man. This was what God so strictly warned the Jews against, Deu. iv. 15, &c. This the apostle shews the folly of in his sermon at Athens, Acts xvii. 29; see Isa. xl. 18, &c.; xlv. 10, &c. This is called, ver. 25, "changing the truth of God into a lie." As it did dishonour his glory, so it did misrepresent his being. Idols are called lies, for they belie God, as if he had a body, whereas he is a spirit, Jer. xxiii. 14; Hos. vii. 1. "Teachers of lies," Hab. ii. 18. 2nd. Giving Divine honour to the creature. "Worshipped and served the creature," παρὰ τὸν κτίστην,—"besides the Creator." They did own a supreme Nūmen in their profession, but they did in effect disown him by the worship they paid to the creature; for God will be all or none. Or, 'above the Creator,' paying more devout respect to their inferior deities, stars, heroes, demons, thinking the supreme God inaccessible, or above their worship. The sin itself was their worshipping the creature at all; but this is mentioned as an aggravation of the sin, that they worshipped the creature more than the Creator. This was the general wickedness of the Gentile world, and became twisted in with their laws and government; in compliance with which even the wise men among them, who knew and owned a supreme God and were convinced of the nonsense and absurdity of their polytheism and idolatry, yet did as the rest of their neighbours did. Seneca, in his book De Superstitione, as it is quoted by Augustine, De Civit. Dei, lib. vi., cap. 10, (for the book itself is lost,) after he had largely shewn the great folly and impiety of the vulgar religion, in divers instances of it, yet concludes, Quæ omnia sapiens servabit tanquam legibus iussa, non tanquam dis grata,—"All which a wise man will observe as established by law, not imagining them grateful to the gods." And afterwards, Omne istam ignobilem deorum turbam, quam longo ævo longa superstitione congesti, sic adorabimus, ut meminimus cultum ejus magis ad morem quam ad rem pertinere,—"All this ignoble rout of gods, which ancient superstition has amassed together by long prescription, we will so adore as to remember that the worship of them is rather a compliance with custom than material in itself." Upon which Augustine observes, Colebat quod reprehendebat, agebat quod arguebat, quod cupabat adorabat,—"He worshipped that which he censured, he did that which he had proved wrong, and he adored what he found fault with." I mention this thus largely because methinks it doth fully explain that of the apostle here; ver. 18, "Who hold the truth in unrighteousness." It is observable that upon the mention of the dishonour done to God by the idolatry of the Gentiles, the apostle, in the midst of his discourse, expresses himself in an awful adoration of God: "Who is blessed for ever. Amen." When we see or hear of any contempt cast upon God or his name, we should thence take occasion to think and speak highly and honourably of him. In this, as in other things, the worse others are, the better we should be. "Blessed for ever," notwithstanding these dishonours done to his name; though there are those that do not glorify him, yet he is glorified, and will be glorified to eternity.

Thirdly. The judgments of God upon them for this idolatry; not many temporal judgments, (the idolatrous nations were the conquering ruling nations of the world,) but spiritual judgments, giving them up to the most brutish and unnatural lusts. Παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς,—"He gave them up." It is thrice repeated here, ver. 24, 26, 28. Spiritual judgments are of all judgments the sorest, and to be most dreaded. Observe,

1. By whom they were given up. God gave them up, in a way of righteous judgment, as the just punishment of their idolatry,—taking off the bridle of restraining grace, leaving them to themselves, letting them alone; for his grace is his own, he is debtor to no man, he may give or withhold his grace at pleasure. Whether this giving up be a positive act of God, or only privative, we leave to the schools to dispute; but this we are sure of, that it is no new thing for God to give men up to their own hearts' lusts, to send them strong delusions, to let of revealing. "Hold the truth:" rather, "hold down," and thus hinder the truth.

i. 19. "That which may be known:" that which is matter of knowledge, is manifest. (Compare Job xxxviii. xli., and Psa. xix. 1-4.) "In them:" i.e., in their hearts. The knowledge of God is not from the works of God alone, but from them taken in relation to man. "Shewed:" rather, manifested; same word in both clauses.

i. 21. "Neither were thankful:" unbelief is akin to ingratitude.

"Became vain:" rather, were brought to vanity. "Foolish heart:" "Their heart being without understanding was darkened"—i.e., lost the little light it had, and wandered blindly in the ways of folly" (Alford).

i. 24. "Gave them up:" surrendered, or handed them over to. The word is used twice in this passage, and signifies that stage in the history of a sinner when the Divine influence is withdrawn and sin is sealed upon the sinner. (Compare Hos. iv. 17; Psa. lxxxi. 11, 12.)

Satan loose upon them, nay, to lay stumblingblocks before them. And yet God is not the author of sin, but herein infinitely just and holy; for, though the greatest wickednesses follow upon this giving up, the fault of that is to be laid upon the sinner's wicked heart. If the patient be obstinate, and will not submit to the methods prescribed, but wilfully takes and does that which is prejudicial to him, the physician is not to be blamed if he give him up as in a desperate condition; and all the fatal symptoms that follow are not to be imputed to the physician, but to the disease itself, and to the folly and wilfulness of the patient.

2. To what they were given up.

1st. "To uncleanness and vile affections," ver. 24, 26, 27. Those that would not entertain the more pure and refined notions of natural light, which tend to preserve the honour of God, justly forfeited those more gross and palpable sentiments which preserve the honour of human nature. Man being in honour, and refusing to understand the God that made him, thus becomes worse than the beasts that perish, Ps. xlix. 20. Thus one, by the Divine permission, becomes the punishment of another; but it is, as it is said here, "through the lusts of their own hearts," there all the fault is to be laid. Those who dishonoured God were given up to dishonour themselves. A man cannot be delivered up to a greater slavery than to be given up to his own lusts. Such are given over, like the Egyptians, Isa. xix. 4, into the hand of a cruel lord. The particular instances of their uncleanness and vile affections are their unnatural lusts, for which many of the heathen, even of those among them who passed for wise men, as Solon and Zeno, were infamous, against the plainest and most obvious dictates of natural light. The crying iniquity of Sodom and Gomorrah, for which God rained hell from heaven upon them, became not only commonly practised, but avowed, in the pagan nations. Perhaps the apostle especially refers to the abominations that were committed in the worship of their idol gods, in which the worst of uncleannesses were prescribed for the honour of their gods. Dungehill service for dungehill gods: the unclean spirit's delight in such ministrations. In the church of Rome, where the pagan idolatries are revived, images worshipped, and saints only substituted in the room of demons, we hear of these abominations going barefaced, licensed by the pope, (Fox's Acts and Monuments, vol. i., p. 808.) and not only commonly perpetrated, but justified and pleaded for by some of their cardinals: the same spiritual plagues for the same spiritual wickednesses. See what wickedness there is in the nature of man. How abominable and filthy is man! "Lord, what is man!" says David; what a vile creature is he when left to himself! How much are we beholden to the restraining grace of God for the preserving any thing of the honour and decency of the human nature! For, were it not for this, man, who was made but little lower than the angels, would make himself a great deal lower than the devils. This is said to be that "recompence of their error which was meet." The Judge of all the earth does right, and observes a meetness between the sin and the punishment of it.

2nd. To a reprobate mind in these abominations, ver. 28.

First. "They did not like to retain God in their knowledge." The blindness of their understandings was caused by the wilful aversion of their wills and affections. They did not retain God in their knowledge, because they did not like it. They would neither know nor do any thing but just what pleased themselves. It is just the temper of carnal hearts; the pleasing of themselves is their highest end. There are many that have God in their knowledge, they cannot help it, the light shines so fully in their faces; but they do not retain him there. They say to the Almighty, Depart, Job xxi. 14, and they therefore do not retain God in their knowledge because it thwarts and contradicts their lusts; they do not like it. In their knowledge, — ἐν ἐπιγνώσει. There is a difference between γινώσκω and ἐπιγνώσκω, the 'knowledge' and the 'acknowledgment' of God; the pagans knew God, but did not, would not, acknowledge him.

Secondly. Answerable to this wilfulness of theirs, in gainsaying the truth, God gave them over to a wilfulness in the grossest sins, here called "a reprobate mind." — εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν, a mind void of all sense and judgment to discern things that differ, so that they could not distinguish their right hand from their left in spiritual things.

[That process in general history by which the decline of this world's light respecting God, and the decline of its practical allegiance to his authority, have kept pace, the one with the other, is often realized in the personal history of a single individual. There is a connection by the law of our nature between his wilful disobedience and his spiritual darkness. You have read perhaps in our old theologians of what they called a judicial blindness. It is a visitation consequent upon sin. It is a withdrawal of the Spirit of God, when grieved and discouraged and provoked by our resistance to his warnings. It is that Spirit ceasing to strive with the children of men; and coming to this as the final result of the contest he has so long maintained with their obstinacy—he shall let them alone since they will have it so. It is an extinction of the light which they once had, but refused to be led by; and now perhaps that they have it not, may they do many an evil thing to the evil of which they are profoundly asleep, and against which their conscience, now lulled and stifled into spiritual death, lifts no voice of remonstrance whatever. It is true indeed, that, with a conscience obliterated, and an inner man deaf to every awakening call, and a system of moral feelings like a piece of worn and rusty mechanism that cannot be set agoing, and an overhanging torpor upon all the spiritual faculties, so that every denunciation of an angry God and a coming vengeance is only heard like a sound that whistles by—it is indeed true that he whose soul is in a condition such as this, sits in the region and in the shadow of grossest darkness. But it is not like the transmitted darkness of paganism, which he can offer to plead in mitigation, or which will make his last sentence more tolerable for him even as it shall be more tolerable for Sodom or Gomorrah. It is a darkness which he loved, and into which he voluntarily entered. He made his escape to it from the light which he hated; and by his own act did he so outrun his pursuing conscience, as now to be at a distance from her warnings. If the call of 'repent or perish' do not bring him back, it is because he is sealed unto the day of condemnation; it is because God hath given him over to a reprobate mind; it is because he is judicially in a state of blindness; it is because his soul is compassed with a thick and heavy atmosphere of his own gathering. The heathen sinner will be tried by the light which he had. The Christian sinner will be tried by the light which he fled from. This is his condemnation, that light has come into his part of the world, and he would not come to meet and be enlightened by it. He is on a footing altogether different from that of the idolater, though the darkness in which he is enveloped be irrecoverable. Enough that a light was offered which he refused, or enough that a light was once possessed, and he did not like to retain it.—C.]

See whether a course of sin leads, and into what a gulf it plunges the sinner at last; hither fleshly lusts have a direct tendency. "Eyes full of adultery cannot cease from sin," 2 Pet. ii. 14. This reprobate mind was a blind seared conscience, past feeling, Eph. iv. 19. When the judgment is once reconciled to sin, the man is in the suburbs of hell. At first Pharaoh hardened his heart, but afterwards God hardened Pharaoh's heart. Thus wilful hardness is justly punished with judicial hardness. "To do those things which are not convenient." This phrase may seem to bespeak a diminutive evil, but here it is expressive of the grossest enormities; things that are not 'agreeable to men, but contradict the very light and law of nature. And here he subjoins a black list of those unbecoming things which the Gentiles were guilty of, being delivered up to a reprobate mind. No wickedness so heinous, so contrary to the light of nature, to the law of nations, and to all the interests of mankind, but a reprobate mind will comply with it. By the histories of those times, especially the accounts we have of the then prevailing dispositions and practices of the Romans when the ancient virtue of that commonwealth was so degenerated, it appears that these sins here mentioned were then and there reigning national sins. No fewer than twenty-three several sorts of sins and sinners are here specified, ver. 29–31. Here the devil's seat is; his name is legion, for they are many. It was time to have the Gospel preached among them, for the world had need of reformation. 1st. Sins against the first table. "Haters of God." Here is the devil in his own colours, sin appearing sin. Could it be imagined that rational creatures should hate the chiefest good, and depending creatures abhor the fountain of their being? And yet so it is. Every sin has in it a hatred of God; but some sinners are more open and avowed enemies to him than others, Zec. xi. 8. Proud men and boasters cope with God himself, and put those crowns upon their own heads which must be cast before his throne. 2nd. Sins against the second table. These are especially mentioned, because in these things they had a clearer light. In general here is a charge of unrighteousness. This is put first, for every sin is unrighteousness; it is withholding that which is due, perverting that which is right; it is especially put for second table sins, doing as we would not be done by. Against the fifth commandment: "Disobedient to parents, and without natural affection." — ἀσέβητος, that is, parents unkind and cruel to their children. Thus, when duty fails on one side, it commonly fails on the other. Disobedient children are justly punished with unnatural parents; and, on the contrary, unnatural parents with disobedient children. Against the sixth commandment: "Wickedness" (doing mischief for mischief's sake) "maliciousness, envy, murder, debate," (ἐριδος,—contention,) "malignity, spiteful, implacable, unmerciful;" all expressions of that hatred of our brother which is heart-murder. Against the seventh commandment: "Fornication." He mentions no more, having spoken before of other uncleannesses. Against the eighth commandment: "Unrighteousness, covetousness." Against the ninth commandment: "Deceit, whisperers, backbiters, covenant-breakers," lying and slandering. Here are two generals not before mentioned,—inventors of evil things, and without understanding; wise to do evil, and yet having no knowledge to do good. The more deliberate and politic sinners are in inventing evil things, the greater is their sin; so quick of invention in sin, and yet without understanding (stark fools) in the thoughts of God. Here is enough to humble us all in the sense of our original corruption; for every heart by nature has in it the seed and spawn of all these sins. In the close he mentions the aggravations of the sins, ver. 32. (1.) They "knew the judgment of God;" that is, (1st.) They knew the law. The judgment of God is that which his justice requires, which, because he is just, he judgeth meet to be done. (2nd.) They knew the penalty; so it is explained here. They knew "that those who commit such things were worthy of death," eternal death; their own consciences could not but suggest this to them, and yet they ventured upon it. It is a great aggravation of sin when it is committed against knowledge, (Jas. iv. 17) especially against the knowledge of the judgment of God. It is daring presumption to run upon the sword's point. It argues the heart much hardened, and very resolutely set upon sin. (2.) They "not only do the same, but have pleasure in those that do them." The violence of some present temptation may hurry a man into the commission of such sins himself in which the vitiated appetite may take a pleasure; but to be pleased with other people's sins is to love sin for sin's sake: it is joining in a confederacy for the devil's kingdom and interest. Συνεδοκῶντες: they do not only commit sin, but they defend and justify it, and encourage others to do the like. Our own sins are much aggravated by our concurrence with, and complacency in, the sins of others.

Now lay all this together, and then say whether the Gentile world, lying under so much guilt and corruption, could be justified before God by any works of their own.

CHAPTER II.

The scope of the first two chapters of this epistle may be gathered from ch. iii. 9, "We have before proved both Jews and Gentiles that they are all under sin." Thus we have proved upon the Gentiles, (ch. i.) now in this chapter he proves it upon the Jews, as appears by ver. 17, "thou art called a Jew." I. He proves in general that Jews and Gentiles stand upon the same level before the justice of God, to ver. 17. II. He shews more particularly what sins the Jews were guilty of, notwithstanding their profession and vain pretensions, ver. 17, to the end.

HEREFORE thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things. 2 But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit such things. 3 And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? 4 Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? 5 But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against

i. 25. "Truth of God into a lie:" the contrast sustained here as in verse 23—corruptible, incorruptible; truth, lie. Truth, the true notion of God as Creator, changed into a lie; word used in Jer. xvi. 19 (LXX.) for idols. "More than the Creator:" beyond the Creator, and so excluding him. The doxology, "who is blessed for ever," serves by contrast to show the darkness of their sins.

i. 32. "The apostle advances to the highest grade of moral abandonment—the knowledge of God's sentence against such crimes, united with the contented practice of them, and encouragement of them in others" (Alford). It is the climax of sin to take pleasure in the sins of others; Christian love can never rejoice in iniquity (1 Cor. xiii. 6).

ii. 2. "We are sure:" rather, "we know." "According to truth:" the judgment is (i.e., proceeds) according to justice. (Compare John viii. 16.)

ii. 4. "Not knowing:" De Wette remarks that it is not mere inconsiderateness which is here blamed, but a guilty and wilful igno-

the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God; 6 Who will render to every man according to his deeds: 7 To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life: 8 But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, 9 Tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; 10 But glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile: 11 For there is no respect of persons with God. 12 For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law: and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law; 13 (For not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. 14 For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: 15 Which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another;) 16 In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel.

In the former chapter the apostle had represented the state of the Gentile world to be as bad and black as the Jews were ready enough to pronounce it. And now, designing to shew that the state of the Jews was very bad too, and their sins in many respects more aggravated, to prepare his way he sets himself in this part of the chapter to shew that God would proceed upon equal terms of justice with Jews and Gentiles; and not with such a partial hand as the Jews were apt to think he would use in their favour.

First. He arraigns them for their censoriousness and self-conceit; ver. 1, "Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest." As he expresses himself in general terms, the admonition may teach those many masters, (Jas. iii. 1), of whatever nation or profession they are, that assume to themselves a power to censure, control, and condemn others. But he intends especially the Jews, and to them particularly he applies this general charge; ver. 21, "Thou who teachest another teachest thou not thyself?" The Jews were generally a proud sort of people, that looked with a great deal of scorn and contempt upon the poor Gentiles, as not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock; while in the meantime they were themselves as bad and immoral—though not idolaters, as the Gentiles, yet sacrilegious; ver. 22, "Therefore thou art inexcusable." If the Gentiles, who had but the light of nature, were inexcusable, (ch. i. 20), much more the Jews, who had the light of the law, the revealed will of God, and so had greater helps than the Gentiles.

Secondly. He asserts the invariable justice of the Divine government, ver. 2, 3. To drive home the conviction, he here shews what a righteous God that is with whom we have to do, and how just in his proceedings. It is usual with the apostle Paul, in his writings, upon mention of some material point, to make large disquisitions upon it; as here concerning the justice of God; ver. 2, "That the judgment of God is according to truth,"—according to the eternal rules of justice and equity,—according to the heart, and not according to the outward appearance, 1 Sam. xvi. 7,—according to the works, and not with respect to persons,—is a doctrine which we are all sure of, for he would not be God if he were not just; but it behoves those especially to consider it who condemn others for those things which they themselves are guilty of, and so, while they practise sin and persist in that practice, think to bribe the Divine justice by protesting against sin, and exclaiming loudly upon others that are guilty, as if preaching against sin would atone for the guilt of it. But observe how he puts it to the sinner's conscience; ver. 3, "Thinkest thou this, O man?" O man, a rational creature, a dependent creature, made by God, subject under him, and accountable to him. The case is so plain that we may venture to appeal to the sinner's own thoughts: Canst thou think that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Can the heart-searching God be imposed upon by formal pretences, the righteous Judge of all so bribed and put off? The most plausible politic sinners, who acquit themselves before men with the greatest confidence, cannot escape the judgment of God, cannot avoid being judged and condemned.

Thirdly. He draws up a charge against them, ver. 4, 5, consisting of two branches.

1. Slighting the goodness of God, ver. 4, "the riches of his goodness." This is especially applicable to the Jews, who had singular tokens of the Divine favour. Means are mercies, and the more light we sin against the more law we sin against. Low and mean thoughts of the Divine goodness are at the bottom of a great deal of sin. There is in every wilful sin an interpretative contempt of the goodness of God; it is spurning at his bowels, particularly the goodness of his patience, his forbearance, and long-suffering, taking occasion thence to be so much the more bold in sin, Ecc. viii. 11. "Not knowing," that is, not considering, not knowing practically and with application, "that the goodness of God leadeth thee," the design of it is to lead thee, "to repentance." It is not enough for us to know that God's goodness leads to repentance, but we must know that it leads us—there, in particular. See here what method God takes to bring sinners to repentance. He leads them, not drives them like horses; but leads them like rational creatures, allures them, Hos. ii. 14; and it is goodness that leads, bands of love, Hos. xi. 4; compare Jer. xxxi. 3. The consideration of the goodness of God, his common goodness to all (the goodness of his providence, of his patience, and of his offers,) should be effectual to bring us all to repentance; and the reason why so many continue in impenitency is because they do not know and consider this.

2. Provoking the wrath of God, ver. 5. The rise of this provocation is a "hard and impenitent heart;" and the ruin of sinners is their walking after such a heart, being led by it. To sin is to walk in the way of the heart; and when that is a hard and impenitent heart, (contracted hardness by long custom, besides that which is natural,) how desperate must the course needs be! The provocation is expressed by "treasuring up wrath." Those that go on in a course of sin are treasuring up unto themselves wrath. A treasure denotes abundance. It is a treasure that will be spending to eternity, and yet never exhausted; and yet sinners are still adding to it as to a treasure. Every wilful sin adds to the score, and will inflame the reckoning; it brings a 'branch to their wrath,' as some read that, Eze. viii. 17, they "put the branch to their nose." A treasure denotes secrecy. The treasury or magazine of wrath is the heart of God himself, in which it lies hid, as treasures in some secret place sealed up: see Deu. xxxii. 34; Job xiv. 17. But wrath it denotes reservation to some farther occasion; as the treasures of the hail are reserved against the day of battle and war, Job xxxviii. 22, 23. These treasures will be broken open like the fountains of the great deep, Gen. vii. 11. They are treasured up against the day of wrath, when they will be dispensed by the wholesale, poured out by full vials. Though the present day be a day of patience and forbearance towards sinners, yet there is a day of wrath coming—wrath, and nothing but wrath. Indeed, every day is to sinners a day of wrath, for "God is angry with the wicked every day," Ps. vii. 11, but there is the great day of wrath coming, Rev. vi. 17. And that day of wrath will be "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God." The wrath of God is not like our wrath, a heat and passion; no, fury is not in him, Isa. xxvii. 4; but it is a righteous judgment, his will to punish sin, because he hates it as contrary to his nature. This righteous judgment of God is now many times concealed in the prosperity and success of sinners, but shortly it will be manifested before all the world, these seeming disorders set to rights, and the heavens shall declare his righteousness, Ps. i. 6. "Therefore judge nothing before the time."

Fourthly. He describes the measures by which God proceeds in his judgment. Having mentioned the righteous judgment of God in ver. 5, he here illustrates that judgment, and the righteousness of it, and shews what we may expect from God, and by what rule he will judge the world. The equity of distributive justice is the dispensing of frowns and favours with respect to deserts, and without respect to persons: such is the righteous judgment of God.

1. He will "render to every man according to his deeds," ver. 6, a truth often mentioned in Scripture, to prove that the Judge of all the earth does right.

1st. In dispensing his favours; and this is mentioned twice here, both in ver. 7, and ver. 10. For he delights to shew mercy. Observe,

First. The objects of his favour. "Those who by patient continuance," &c. By this we may try our interest in the Divine favour, and may hence be directed what course to take, that we may obtain it. Those whom the righteous God will reward are, 1st. Such as fix to themselves the right end, that "seek for glory, and honour, and immortality;" that is, the glory and honour which are immortal—acceptance with God here and for ever. There is a holy ambition which is at the bottom of all practical religion. This is seeking the kingdom of God, looking in our desires and aims as high as heaven, and resolved to take up with nothing short of it. This seeking implies a loss, sense of that loss, desire to retrieve it, and pursuits and endeavours consonant to those desires. 2nd. Such as, having fixed the right end, adhere to the right way. "A patient continuance in well-doing." (1.) There must be well-doing, working good, ver. 10. It is not enough to know well, and speak well, and profess well, and promise well, but we must do well; do that which is good, not only for the matter of it, but for the manner of it. We must do it well. (2.) A continuance in well-doing. Not for a fit and a start, like the morning cloud and the early dew; but we must endure to the end. It is perseverance that wins the crown. (3.) A patient continuance. This patience respects not only the length of the work, but the difficulties of it, and the oppositions and hardships we may meet with in it. Those that will do well and continue in it must put on a great deal of patience.

Secondly. The product of his favour. He will render to such eternal life. Heaven is life, eternal life, and it is the reward of those that patiently continue in well-doing; and it is called, ver. 10, "glory, honour, and peace." Those that seek for glory and honour, ver. 7, shall have them. Those that seek for the vain glory and honour of this world often miss of them, and are disappointed; but those that seek for immortal glory and honour shall have them, and not only "glory and honour," but "peace." Worldly glory and honour are commonly attended with trouble; but heavenly glory and honour have peace with them, undisturbed everlasting peace.

2nd. In dispensing his frowns, ver. 8, 9. Observe, First. The objects of his frowns. In general those that do evil, more particularly described to be "such as are contentious and do not obey the truth." Contentious against God. Every wilful sin is a quarrel with God, it is striving with our Maker, Isa. xlv. 9, the most desperate contention. The Spirit of God strives with sinners, Gen. vi. 3, and impenitent sinners strive against the Spirit, rebel against the light, Job xxiv. 13, hold fast deceit, strive to retain that sin which the Spirit strives to part them from. Contentious, and do not obey the truth. The truths of religion are not only to be known, but to be obeyed; they are directing, ruling, commanding; truths relating to practice. Disobedience to the truth is interpreted a striving against it. "But obey unrighteousness"—do what unrighteousness bids them do. Those that refuse to be the servants of truth will soon be the slaves of unrighteousness. Secondly. The products or instances of these frowns. "Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish." These are the wages of sin. "Indignation and wrath" the causes—"tribulation and anguish" the necessary and unavoidable effects. And this upon the soul; souls are the vessels of that wrath, the subjects of that tribulation and anguish. Sin qualifies the soul for this indignation, and the impressions or effects of anguish therefrom. Hell is eternal tribulation and anguish, the product of infinite wrath and indignation. This comes of contending with God, of setting briers and thorns before a consuming fire, Isa. xxvii. 4. Those that will not bow to his golden sceptre will certainly be broken by his iron rod. Thus will God render to every man according to his deeds.

2. There is no respect of persons with God, ver. 11. As to the spiritual state, there is a respect of persons; but not as to outward relation or condition. Jews and Gentiles stand upon the same level before God. This was Peter's remark upon the first taking down of the partition-wall, Acts x. 34, that God is no respecter of persons; and it is explained in the next words, that "in every nation he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him." God does not save men with respect to their external privileges or their barren knowledge and profession of the truth, but according as their state and disposition really are. In dispensing both his frowns and favours it is both to Jew and Gentile. If to the Jews first, who had greater privileges, and made rance. "Leadeth:" better, with Alford, "is leading." The goodness of God is adaped to lead to repentance.

ii. 6, 7. "The apostle is here speaking generally of the general system of God in governing the world—punishing the evil and rewarding the righteous. No question at present arises how this righteousness is to be obtained; but the truth is only stated broadly at present, to be further specified by-and-by, when it is clearly shown that by the works of the law no flesh can be justified before God" (Alford).

ii. 8. "Are contentious:" the word is formed from one signifying a hiring, and has the sense of party spirit, faction. Alford renders, "self-seeking."

ii. 9, 10. The word rendered Gentile in these verses is properly Greek. In verse 14 Gentile is a different word, and rightly rendered Gentile.

ii. 17. "Restest in:" the word is used of false trust (compare Micah iii. 11: "lean upon the Lord"). The confidence implied is a greater profession, yet "also to the Gentiles," whose want of such privileges will neither excuse them from the punishment of their ill-doing nor bar them out from the reward of their well-doing, see Col. iii. 11; for shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

Fifthly. He proves the equity of his proceedings with all, when he shall actually come to judge them, ver. 12—16, upon this principle, that that which is the rule of man's obedience is the rule of God's judgment. Three degrees of light are revealed to the children of men:

1. The light of nature. This the Gentiles have, and by this they shall be judged. "As many as have sinned without law shall perish without law;" that is, the unbelieving Gentiles, who had no other guide but natural conscience, no other motive but common mercies, and had not the law of Moses nor any supernatural revelation, shall not be reckoned with for the transgression of the law they never had, nor come under the aggravation of the Jews' sin against judgment by the written law; but they shall be judged by, as they sin against, the law of nature, not only as it is in their hearts, corrupted, defaced, and imprisoned in unrighteousness, but as in the uncorrupted original the Judge keeps by him. Farther to clear this, ver. 14, 15, in a parenthesis, he evinces that the light of nature was to the Gentiles instead of a written law. He had said, ver. 12, they had "sinned without law," which looks like a contradiction; "for where there is no law there is no transgression." But, says he, though they had not the written law, Ps. cxlvii. 20, they had that which was equivalent, not to the ceremonial, but to the moral law. They "had the work of the law." He does not mean that work which the law commands, as if they could produce a perfect obedience; but that work which the law does. The work of the law is to direct us what to do, and to examine us what we have done. Now, 1st. They had that which directed them what to do by the light of nature; by the force and tendency of their natural notions and dictates they apprehended a clear and vast difference between good and evil. They "did by nature the things contained in the law." They had a sense of justice and equity, honour and purity, love and charity; the light of nature taught obedience to parents, pity to the miserable, conservation of public peace and order, forbade murder, stealing, lying, perjury, &c. Thus they were "a law unto themselves." 2nd. They had that which examined them as to what they had done. "Their conscience also bearing witness." They had that within them which approved and commended what was well done, and which reproached them for what was done amiss. Conscience is a witness, and first or last will bear witness, though for a time it may be bribed or brow-beaten. It is instead of a thousand witnesses, testifying of that which is most secret; and their "thoughts accusing or excusing," passing a judgment upon the testimony of conscience by applying the law to the fact. Conscience is that candle of the Lord which was not quite put out, no, not in the Gentile world. The heathen have witnessed to the comfort of a good conscience.

*Hic murus aeneus esto,
Nil conscire sibi—*

'Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,

and to the terror of a bad one:

Quos diri conscia facti

Mens habet attonitos, et surdo verberare cedit—

'No lash is heard, and yet the guilty heart
Is tortured with a self-inflicted smart.'—Juv. Sat. 13.

Their "thoughts the meanwhile," μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων—among themselves, or one with another. The same light and law of nature that witnesses against sin in them, and witnessed against it in others, accused or excused one another. Vicissim, so some read it, 'by turns,' according as they observed or broke these natural laws and dictates, their consciences did either acquit or condemn them. All this did evince that they had that which was to them instead of a law, which they might have been governed by, and which will condemn them, because they were not so guided and governed by it. So that the guilty Gentiles are left without excuse. God is justified in condemning them. They cannot plead ignorance—and, therefore, are likely to perish, if they have not something else to plead.

2. The light of the law. This the Jews had, and by this they shall be judged; ver. 12. "As many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law." They sinned, not only having the law, but ἐν νόμῳ—"in the law," in the midst of so much law, in the face and light of so pure and clear a law, the directions of which were so very full and particular, and the sanctions of it so very cogent and enforcing. These "shall be judged by the law;" their punishment shall be, as their sin is, so much the greater for their having the law. "The Jew first," ver. 9. It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon. Thus Moses did accuse them, Jno. v. 45; and they fell under the many stripes of him that knew his master's will, and did it not, Lu. xii. 47. The Jews prided themselves very much in the law; but, to confirm what he had said, the apostle shews (ver. 13) that their having, and hearing, and knowing the law, would not justify them, but their doing it. The Jewish doctors bolstered up their followers with an opinion that all that were Jews, how bad soever they lived, should have a place in the world to come. This the apostle here opposes: it was a great privilege that they had the law, but not a saving privilege, unless they lived up to the law they had, which it is certain the Jews did not; and therefore they had need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. We may apply it to the Gospel; it is not hearing, but doing, that will save us, Jno. xiii. 17; Jas. i. 22.

3. The light of the Gospel. And according to this those that enjoyed the Gospel shall be judged, ver. 16. According to my Gospel; not meant of any fifth Gospel written by Paul, as some conceit; or of the Gospel written by Luke, as Paul's amanuensis, (Evangel. Hist. lib. iii. cap. 8), but the Gospel in general, called Paul's because he was a preacher of it. As many as are under that dispensation shall be judged according to that dispensation, Mar. xvi. 16. Some refer those words, "according to my Gospel," to what he says of the day of judgment; "There will come a day of judgment, according as I have in my preaching often told you; and that will be the day of the final judgment both of Jews and Gentiles." It is good for us to get acquainted with what is revealed concerning that day. 1st. There is a day set for a general judgment. The day, the great day, his day that is coming, Ps. cxvii. 13. 2nd. The judgment of that day will be put into the hands of Jesus Christ; God shall judge by Jesus Christ, Acts xvii. 31. It will be part of the reward of his humiliation. Nothing speaks more terror to sinners, or more comfort to saints, than this, that Christ shall be the judge. 3rd. The secrets of men shall then be judged; secret services shall be then rewarded, secret sins shall be then punished, hidden things shall be brought to light. That will be the great discovering day, when that which is now done in corners shall be proclaimed to all the world.

17 Behold, thou art called a Jew, and retest in the law, and makest thy boast of God, 18 And knowest his will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law; 19 And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, 20 An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law. 21 Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? 22 Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? 23 Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God? 24 For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written. 25 For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law: but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. 26 Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision? 27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? 28 For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: 29 But he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

In the latter part of the chapter the apostle directs his discourse more closely to the Jews, and shews what sins they were guilty of, notwithstanding their profession and vain pretensions. He had said, ver. 13, that not the hearers but the doers of the law are justified; and he here applies that great truth to the Jews. Observe,

First. He allows their profession, ver. 17—20; and specifies their particular pretensions and privileges in which they prided themselves, that they might see he did not condemn them out of ignorance of what they had to say for themselves; no, he knew the best of their cause.

1. They were a peculiar people, separated and distinguished from all others by their having the written law and the special presence of God among them, 1st. "Thou art called a Jew;" not so much in parentage as profession. It was a very honourable title. Salvation was of the Jews; and this they were very proud of, to be a people by themselves; and yet many that were so called were the vilest of men. It is no new thing, for the worst practices to be shrouded under the best names; for many of the synagogue of Satan to say they are Jews, Rev. ii. 9; for a generation of vipers to boast they have Abraham to say they are Jews, Mat. iii. 7—9. 2nd. "And retest in the law;" that is, they took a pride in this, that they had the law among them, had it in their books, read it in their synagogues. They were mightily puffed up with this privilege, and thought this enough to bring them to heaven, though they did not live up to the law. To rest in the law, with a rest of complacency and acquiescence, is good; but to rest in it with a rest of pride, and slothfulness, and carnal security, is the ruin of souls. "The temple of the Lord," Jer. vii. 4; "Bethel their confidence," Jer. xlviii. 13; "Haughty because of the holy mountain," Zep. iii. 11. It is a dangerous thing to rest in external privileges, and not to improve them. 3rd. "And makest thy boast of God." See how the best things may be perverted and abused. A believing, humble, thankful glorying in God is the root and summary of all religion, Ps. xxxiv. 2; 1sa. xlv. 25; 1 Cor. i. 31. But a proud, vainglorious boasting in God, and in the outward profession of his name, is the root and summary of all hypocrisy. Spiritual pride is of all kinds of pride the most dangerous.

2. They were a knowing people, ver. 18, "And knowest his will;" τὸ θέλημα—"the will." God's will is the will; the sovereign, absolute, irresistible will. The world will then, and not till then, be set to rights when God's will is the only will, and all other wills are melted into it. They did not only know the truth of God, but the will of God, that which he would have them do. It is possible for a hypocrite to have a great deal of knowledge in the will of God. And approvest the things that are more excellent," δοκιμάζεις τὰ διαφέροντα. Paul prays for it for his friends as a very great attainment, Phil. i. 10. Εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν ὑμᾶς τὰ διαφέροντα. Understand it, 1st. Of a good apprehension in the things of God, reading it thus, "Thou discernest things that differ;" knowest how to distinguish between good and evil, to separate between the precious and the vile, Jer. xv. 19; to make a difference between the unclean and the clean, Lev. xi. 47. Good and bad lie sometimes so near together that it is not easy to distinguish them; but the Jews, having the touchstone of the law ready at hand, were, or at least thought they were, able to distinguish, to cleave the hair in doubtful cases. A man may be a good casuist, and yet a bad Christian—accurate in the notion, but loose and careless in the application. Or, we may, with De Dieu, understand controversies by the τὰ διαφέροντα. A man may be well skilled in the controversies of religion, and yet a stranger to the power of godliness. 2nd. Of a warm affection to the things of God, as we read it, "Approvest the things that are excellent." There are excellences in religion which a hypocrite may approve of; there may be a consent of the practical one in the fact of possessing the law. Similarly, "makest thy boast of God" is not the boast of David (Psa. xlv. 8), but the false boast of the Jews, "The people of the Lord are we."

ii. 20. "Hast the form," &c.: the word rendered "form" occurs only here and in 2 Tim. iii. 5. In this latter passage it clearly means the outline without the substance. Here, however, it seems to signify "embodiment"—the real, not the delusive manifestation. Olshausen takes it to mean that the law contained a foreshadowing of Christ.

ii. 25. "Circumcision:" on this the Jews especially prided themselves. The apostle takes it up to show that circumcision, without real heart conformity to the law, is no avail. "The law;" the article is wanting in the original before "law" in both cases. Attention is thus drawn to the character of the person supposed: "If thou art a law-breaker, thy," &c.

ii. 28. "Jew," "circumcision:" each of these words is understood a second time, as in verse 29 also: "Not he who is (a Jew) out-judgment "to the law, that it is good," and yet that consent overpowered by the lusts of the flesh, and of the mind:—

—Vide me! ora proboque
—Deteriora sequor,
"I see the better, but pursue the worse."

And it is common for sinners to make that approbation an excuse which is really a very great aggravation of a sinful course. They got this acquaintance with, and affection to, that which is good, by being "instructed out of the law," scilicet "being catechised." The word signifies an early instruction, from childhood. It is a great privilege and advantage to be early catechised betimes. It was the custom of the Jews to take a great deal of pains in teaching their children when they were young, and all their lessons were out of the law; it was well if Christians were but as industrious to teach their children out of the Gospel. Now this is called, ver. 20, "The form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law;" that is, the show and appearance of it. Those whose knowledge rests in an empty notion, and does not make an impression on their hearts, have only the form of it, like a picture well drawn and in good colours, but which wants life. A form of knowledge produces but a form of godliness, 2 Tim. iii. 5. A form of knowledge may deceive men, but cannot impose upon the piercing eye of the heart-searching God. A form may be the vehicle of the power; but he that takes up with that only is like "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal."

3. They were a teaching people, or at least thought themselves so; ver. 19, 20, "And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind." Apply it, 1st. To the Jews in general. They thought themselves guides to the poor blind Gentiles that sat in darkness, were very proud of this, that whoever could have the knowledge of God must be beholden to them for it. All other nations must come to school to them, to learn what is good, and what the Lord requires; for they had the lively oracles. 2nd. To their rabbies, and doctors, and leading men among them, who were especially those that judged others, ver. 1. These prided themselves much in the possession they had got of Moses' law, and the deference which the vulgar paid to their dictates; and the apostle expresses this in several terms. "a guide of the blind, a light of those who are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes;" the better to set forth their proud conceit of themselves, and contempt of others. This was a string they loved to be harping upon, heaping up titles of honour upon themselves. The best work, when it is prided in, is unacceptable to God. It is good to instruct the foolish, and to teach the babes; but, considering our own ignorance, and folly, and inability to make these teachings successful without God, there is nothing in it to be proud of.

Secondly, He aggravates their provocations (ver. 21–24) from two things:

1. That they sinned against their knowledge and profession, did that themselves which they taught others to avoid. Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Teaching is a piece of that charity which begins at home, though it must not end there. It was the hypocrisy of the Pharisees that they did not do as they taught, Mat. xxiii. 3; but pulled down with their lives what they built up with their preaching; for who will believe those who do not believe themselves? Examples will govern more than rules. The greatest obstructors of the success of the word are those whose bad lives contradict their good doctrine, who in the pulpit preach so well that it is a pity they should ever come out, and out of the pulpit live so ill that it is a pity they should ever come in. He specifies three particular sins that did abound among the Jews. 1st. Stealing. This is charged upon some that declared God's statutes, Ps. l. 16, 18. "When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him." The Pharisees are charged with devouring widows' houses, Mat. xxiii. 14, and that is the worst of robberies. 2nd. Adultery, ver. 22. This is likewise charged upon that sinner, Ps. l. 18. "Thou hast been partaker with adulterers." Many of the Jewish rabbies are said to have been notorious for this sin. 3rd. Sacrilege. Robbing in holy things which were then by special laws dedicated and devoted to God; and this is charged upon those that professed to abhor idols. So the Jews did remarkably, after their captivity in Babylon; that furnace separated them for ever from the dross of their idolatry, but they dealt very treacherously in the worship of God. It was in the latter days of the Old Testament church that they were charged with robbing God in tithes and offerings, Mal. iii. 8, 9; converting that to their own use, and to the service of their lusts, which was, in a special manner, set apart for God. And this is almost equivalent to idolatry, though this sacrilege was cloaked with the abhorrence of idols. Those will be severely reckoned with another day who, while they condemn sin in others, do the same, or as bad, or worse, themselves.

2. That they dishonoured God by their sin, ver. 23, 24. While God and his law were an honour to them, which they boasted of and prided themselves in, they were a dishonour to God and his law, by giving occasion to those that were without to reflect upon their religion, and if that did countenance and allow of such things; which, as it is their sin, who draw such inferences, (for the faults of professors are not to be laid upon professions,) so it is their sin who give occasion for those inferences, and will greatly aggravate their miscarriages. This was the condemnation in David's case, that he had "given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme," 2 Sam. xii. 14; and the apostle here refers to the same charge against their forefathers, "As it is written," ver. 24. He does not mention the place, because he wrote this to those that were instructed in the law (in labouring to convince, it is some advantage to deal with those that have knowledge and are acquainted with the Scripture), but he seems to point at Isa. lii. 5; Eze. xxxvi. 22, 23; and 2 Sam. xii. 14. It is a lamentation that those who were made "to be to God for a name and for a praise" should be to him a shame and dishonour. The great evil of the sins of professors is the dishonour done to God and religion by their profession. "Blasphemed through you;" that is, you give the occasion for it, it is through your folly and carelessness. The reproaches you bring upon yourselves reflect upon your God, and religion is wounded through your sides. A good caution to professors to walk circumspectly: see 1 Tim. vi. 1.

Thirdly, He asserts the utter insufficiency of their profession to clear them from the guilt of these provocations, ver. 25–29. "Circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law;" that is, obedient Jews shall not lose the reward of their obedience, but will gain this by their being Jews, that they have a clearer rule of obedience than the Gentiles have. God did not give the law nor appoint circumcision in vain. This must be referred to the state of the Jews before the ceremonial polity was abolished, otherwise circumcision to one that professed faith in Christ was forbidden, Gal. v. 2. But he is here speaking to the Jews, whose Judaism would benefit them, if they would but live up to the rules and laws of it; but, if not, "thy circumcision is made uncircumcision;" that is, thy profession will do thee no good; thou wilt be no more justified than the uncircumcised Gentiles, but more condemned for sinning against greater light. The uncircumcised are in Scripture branded as unclean, Isa. lii. 1, as out of the covenant, Eph. ii. 11, 12, and wicked Jews will be dealt with as such: see Jer. ix. 25, 26. Farther to illustrate this,

1. He shews that the uncircumcised Gentiles, if they live up to the light they have, stand upon the same level with the Jews; if "they keep the righteousness of the law," ver. 26, "fulfil the law," ver. 27; that is, by submitting sincerely to the conduct of natural light, perform the matter of the law. Some understand it as putting the case of a perfect obedience to the law. "If the Gentiles could perfectly keep the law, they would be justified by it as well as the Jews." But it seems rather to be meant of such an obedience as some of the Gentiles did attain to. The case of Cornelius will clear it; though he was a Gentile, and uncircumcised, yet, "being a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house," Acts x. 2, he was accepted, ver. 4. Doubtless, there were many such instances; and "they were the uncircumcision, that kept the righteousness of the law;" and of such he says, 1st. That they were accepted with God, as if they had been circumcised. "Their uncircumcision was counted for circumcision." Circumcision was indeed to the Jews a commanded duty, but it was not to all the world a necessary condition of justification and salvation. 2nd. That their obedience was a great aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews, who had the letter of the law, ver. 27. "Judge thee," that is, help to add to thy condemnation, who "by the letter and circumcision dost transgress." Observe, To carnal professors the law is but the letter; they read it as a bare writing, but are not ruled by it as a law. They did transgress, not only notwithstanding the letter and circumcision, but by it; that is, they thereby hardened themselves in sin. External privileges, if they do not do us good, do us hurt. The obedience of those that enjoy less means, and make a less profession, will help to condemn those that enjoy greater means, and make a greater profession, but do not live up to it.

2. He describes the true circumcision, ver. 28, 29. 1st. It is "not that which is outward in the flesh and in the letter." This is not to drive us off from the observance of external institutions, (they are good in their place,) but from trusting to them and resting in them as sufficient to bring us to heaven, taking up with a name to live, without being alive indeed. "He is not a Jew," that is, shall not be accepted of God as the seed of believing Abraham, nor owned as having answered the intention of the law. To be Abraham's children is to do the works of Abraham, Jno. viii. 39, 40. 2nd. It is "that which is inward, of the heart, and in the spirit." It is the heart that God looks at, the circumcising of the heart that renders us acceptable to him; see Deu. xxx. 6. This is "the circumcision that is not made with hands," Col. ii. 11, 12; "Casting away the body of sin." So it is in the spirit; in our spirit as the subject, and wrought by God's Spirit as the author of it. 3rd. The praise thereof, though it be not of men, who judge according to outward appearance, yet it is of God; that is, God himself will own and accept and crown this sincerity, for "he seeth not as man seeth." Fair pretences and a plausible profession may deceive men; but God cannot be so deceived; he sees through shows to realities. This is alike true of Christianity. He is not a Christian that is one outwardly, nor is that baptism which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Christian that is one inwardly, and baptism is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God.

[Let us observe that the apostle speaks both of the letter and spirit of the New Testament. And certain it is that, were we asked to fix on a living counterpart in the present day to the Jew of the passage now under consideration—it would be on him, who, thoroughly versant in all the phrases, and dexterous in all the arguments, of orthodoxy, is, without one affection of the old man circumcised, and without one sanctified affection to mark him the new man in Christ Jesus our Lord, withal a zealous and staunch and sturdy controversialist. He too rests in the form of sound words, and is confident that he is a light of the blind; and founds a complacency on knowledge, though it be knowledge without love and without regeneration—nor can we think of any delusion more hazardous, and at the same time more humbling, than that by which a literal acquaintance with the Gospel, and a literal adherence on the part of the understanding to all its truths and all its articles, may be confounded with the faith which is unto salvation. Faith is an inlet to holy affections. Its primary office is to admit truth into the mind, but it is truth that impresses as well as informs. The kingdom of God is neither in word alone, nor in argument alone—it is also in power; and while we bid you look unto Jesus and be saved, it is such a look as will cause you to mourn and to be in heaviness—it is such a look as will liken you to his image, and import into your own character the graces and the affections which adorn his. It is here that man finds himself at the limits of his helplessness. He cannot summon into his breast that influence which will either circumcise its old tendencies or plant new ones in its room. But the doctrine of Jesus Christ and of him crucified is the grand instrument for such a renovation; and he is at his post, and on the likely way of obtaining the clean heart and the right spirit, when looking humbly and desirously to Jesus as all his salvation, he may at length experience the operation of faith working by love, and yielding all manner of obedience.—C.]

CHAPTER III.

The apostle in this chapter carries on his discourse concerning justification. He had already proved the guilt both of Gentiles and Jews. Now in this chapter, I. He answers some objections that might be made against what he had said about the Jews, ver. 1–8. II. He asserts the guilt and corruption of mankind in common, both Jews and Gentiles, ver. 9–18. III. He argues thence that justification must needs be by faith, and not by the law, which he gives several reasons for, ver. 19, to the end. The many digressions in his writings render his discourse sometimes a little difficult, but his scope is evident.

HATH advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? 2 Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God. 3 For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? 4 God forbid: yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art wardly is a Jew, nor is that (circumcision) which is outward in the flesh, circumcision; but he who is (a Jew) in secret is a Jew," &c.

iii. 3. "Unbelief make the faith of God," &c.: this verse becomes more intelligible if we substitute unfaithfulness for unbelief. The unfaithfulness of Israel to the covenant will not make God break his promise; on the contrary, as the next verse shows, the very failure of men will serve to display the faithfulness of God.

iii. 9. "What then?" must be understood as taking up the question of verse 3. "Are we (i.e., Jews) better," &c.: i.e., preferred, placed in a position of real superiority to the Gentiles. Not really, because both are under sin.

iii. 19. "Saith:" The thought is condensed. 1st. Whatever the law says it says to the Jews. 2nd. Whatever it does say is, as we have seen, condemnatory, and this in order that neither Jew nor Gentile may be able to justify himself before God" (Dr. Vaughan). "Become guilty:" brought under or liable to judgment.

judged. 5 But if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man) 6 God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world? 7 For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory; why yet am I also judged as a sinner? 8 And not rather, (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just. 9 What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin; 10 As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one; 11 There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. 12 They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. 13 Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: 14 Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: 15 Their feet are swift to shed blood: 16 Destruction and misery are in their ways: 17 And the way of peace have they not known: 18 There is no fear of God before their eyes.

First. Here the apostle answers several objections, which might be made, to clear his way. No truth so plain and evident but wicked wits and corrupt carnal hearts will have something to say against it; but Divine truths must be cleared from evil.

Object. 1. If Jew and Gentile stand so much upon the same level before God, "what advantage then hath the Jew?" Hath not God often spoken with a great deal of respect for the Jews, as a nonsuch people, Deu. xxxiii. 29, a holy nation, a peculiar treasure, the seed of Abraham his friend? Did not he institute circumcision as a badge of their church-membership, and a seal of their covenant-relation to God? Now does not this levelling doctrine deny them all such prerogatives, and reflect dishonour upon the ordinance of circumcision, as a fruitless insignificant thing? Answer. The Jews are, notwithstanding this, a people greatly privileged and honoured, have great means and helps, though these be not infallibly saving; ver. 2, "much every way." The door is open to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, but the Jews have a fairer way up to this door, by reason of their church privileges, which are not to be undervalued, though many that have them perish eternally for not improving them. He reckons up many of the Jews' privileges, Rom. ix. 4, 5; here he mentions but one, (which is indeed instar omnium,—equivalent to all,) "that unto them were committed the oracles of God;" that is, the Scriptures of the Old Testament, especially the law of Moses, which is called "the lively oracles," Acts vii. 38, and those types, promises, and prophecies, which relate to Christ and the Gospel. The Scriptures are the oracles of God; they are a Divine revelation, they come from heaven, are of infallible truth, and of eternal consequence as oracles. The Septuagint call the Urim and Thummim the λόγια—"the oracles." The Scripture is our breastplate of judgment. We must have recourse to the law and to the testimony, as to an oracle. The Gospel is called the oracles of God, Heb. v. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 11. Now these oracles were committed to the Jews; the Old Testament was written in their language; Moses and the prophets were of their nation, lived among them, preached and wrote primarily to and for the Jews. They were committed to them as trustees for succeeding ages and churches. The Old Testament was deposited in their hands to be carefully preserved pure and uncorrupt, and so transmitted down to posterity. The Jews were the Christians' library keepers, were intrusted with that sacred treasure for their own use and benefit in the first place, and then for the advantage of the world; and, in preserving the letter of the Scripture, they were very faithful to their trust, did not lose one iota or tittle, in which we are to acknowledge God's gracious care and providence. The Jews had the means of salvation, but they had not the monopoly of salvation. Now this he mentions with a "chiefly," πρωτον μὲν γὰρ—this was their prime and principal privilege. The enjoyment of God's word and ordinances is the chief happiness of a people; is to be put in the imprimis of their advantages, Deu. iv. 8; xxxiii. 3; Ps. cxlvii. 20.

Object. 2. Against what he had said of the advantages the Jews had in the lively oracles some might object the unbelief of many of them. To what purpose were the oracles of God committed to them when so many of them, notwithstanding these oracles, continued strangers to Christ, and enemies to his Gospel? "Some did not believe," ver. 3. Answer. It is very true that some, nay most of the present Jews, do not believe in Christ; but "shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?" The apostle startles at such a thought: "God forbid!" The infidelity and obstinacy of the Jews could not invalidate and overthrow those prophecies of the Messiah which were contained in the oracles committed to them. Christ will be glorious, though Israel be not gathered, Isa. xlix. 5. God's words shall be accomplished, his purposes performed, and all his ends answered, though there be a generation that by their unbelief go about to make God a liar. "Let God be true, but every man a liar;" let us abide by this principle that God is true to every word which he has spoken, and will let none of his oracles fall to the ground, though thereby we give the lie to man; better question and overthrow the credit of all the men in the world than doubt of the faithfulness of God. What David said in his haste, Ps. cxvi. 11, that all men are liars, Paul here asserts deliberately. Lying is a limb of that old man which we every one of us come into the world clothed with. All men are fickle, and mutable, and given to change, vanity and a lie, Ps. lxi. 9, altogether vanity, Ps. xxxix. 5. All men are liars compared with God. It is very comfortable, when we find every man a liar, no faith in man, that God is faithful. When "they speak vanity every one with his neighbour," it is very comfortable to think that "the words of the Lord are, pure words," Ps. xii. 2, 6. For the farther proof of this he quotes, Ps. li. 4, "That thou mightest be justified," the design of which is to shew, 1. That God does and will preserve his own honour in the world, notwithstanding the sins of men. 2. That it is our duty, in all our conclusions concerning ourselves and others, to justify God, and to assert and maintain his justice, truth, and goodness, however it goes. David lays a load upon himself in his confession that he might justify God, and acquit him from any injustice. So here, let the credit or reputation of man shift for itself, the matter is not great whether it sink or swim; let us hold fast this conclusion, how specious soever the premises may be to the contrary, that "the Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." Thus is God justified in his sayings, and cleared when he judges, (as it is Ps. li. 4,) or when he is judged, as it is here rendered. When men presume to quarrel with God and his proceedings, we may be sure the sentence will go on God's side.

Object. 3. Carnal hearts might hence take occasion to encourage themselves in sin. He had said that the universal guilt and corruption of mankind gave occasion to the manifestation of God's righteousness in Jesus Christ. Now it may be suggested, if all our sin be so far from overthrowing God's honour that it commends it, and his ends are secured, so that there is no harm done, is it not unjust for God to punish our sin and unbelief so severely? If the unrighteousness of the Jews gave occasion to the calling in of the Gentiles, and so to God's greater glory, why are the Jews so much censured? "If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say?" ver. 5. What inference may be drawn from this? "Is God unrighteous," μή ἀδικος ὁ θεός—"Is not God unrighteous," (so it may be read, more in the form of an objection), "who taketh vengeance?" Unbelieving hearts will gladly take any occasion to quarrel with the equity of God's proceedings, and to condemn him that is most just, Job xxxiv. 17. "I speak as a man;" that is, I object this as the language of carnal hearts; it is suggested like a man, a vain, foolish, proud creature. Answer. "God forbid;" far be it from us to imagine such a thing. Suggestions that reflect dishonour upon God and his justice and holiness are rather to be startled at than parleyed with. Get thee behind me, Satan; never entertain such a thought. "For then how shall God judge the world?" ver. 6. The argument is much the same with that of Abraham, Gen. xviii. 25; "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" No doubt he shall. If he were not infinitely just and righteous he would be unfit to be the judge of all the earth. "Shall even he that hateth right govern?" Job xxxiv. 17. Compare ver. 18, 19. The sin has never the less of malignity and demerit in it though God bring glory to himself out of it. It is only accidentally that sin commends God's righteousness. No thanks to the sinner for that, who intends no such thing. The consideration of God's judging the world should for ever silence all our doubtings of, and reflections upon, his justice and equity. It is not for us to arraign the proceedings of such an absolute sovereign. The sentence of the supreme court, whence lies no appeal, is not to be called in question.

Object. 4. The former objection is repeated and prosecuted, ver. 7, 8, for proud hearts will hardly be beaten out of their refuge of lies, but will hold fast the deceit. But his setting off the objection in its own colours is sufficient to answer it; "If the truth of God has more abounded through my lie." He supposes the sophisters to follow their objection thus, "If my lie, that is, my sin, for there is something of a lie in every sin, especially in the sins of professors, have occasioned the glorifying of God's truth and faithfulness, why should I be judged and condemned as a sinner, and not rather thence take encouragement to go on in my sin that grace may abound?" an inference which at first sight appears too black to be argued, and fit to be cast out with abhorrence. Daring sinners take occasion to boast in mischief, because "the goodness of God endures continually," Ps. lii. 1. "Let us do evil that good may come" is oftener in the heart than in the mouth of sinners, so justifying themselves in their wicked ways. Mentioning this wicked thought, he observes, in a parenthesis, that there were those who charged such doctrines as this upon Paul and his fellow-ministers: Some affirm that we say so. "It is no new thing for the best of God's people and ministers to be charged with holding and teaching such things as they do most detest and abhor; and it is not to be thought strange, when our Master himself was said to be in league with Beelzebub. Many have been reproached as if they had said that the contrary of which they maintain: it is an old artifice of Satan thus to cast dirt upon Christ's ministers, fortiter calumnias, aliquid adhaerebit—lay slander thickly on, for some will be sure to stick." The best men and the best truths are subject to slander. Bishop Sanderson makes a farther remark upon this: "as we be slanderously reported"—βλασφημοῦμεθα. Blasphemy in Scripture usually signifies the highest degree of slander, speaking ill of God. The slander of a minister and his regular doctrine is a more than ordinary slander, it is a kind of blasphemy, not for his person's sake, but for his calling's sake, and his work's sake, 1 Thes. v. 13. Answer. He says no more by way of confutation but that, whatever they themselves may argue, the damnation of those is just. Some understand it of the slanderers; God will justly condemn those who unjustly condemn his truth. Or, rather, it is to be applied to those who embolden themselves in sin under a pretence of God's getting glory to himself out of it. Those who deliberately do evil that good may come of it will be so far from escaping, under the shelter of that excuse, that it will rather justify their damnation, and render them the more inexcusable; for sinning upon such a surmise, and in such a confidence, argues a great deal both of the wit and of the will in the sin—a wicked will deliberately to choose the evil, and a wicked wit to palliate it with the pretence of good arising from it. Therefore their damnation is just; and, whatever excuses of this kind they may now please themselves with, they will none of them stand good in the great day, but God will be justified in his proceedings, and all flesh, even the proud flesh that now lifts up itself against him, shall be silent before him. Some think Paul herein refers to the approaching ruin of the Jewish church and nation, which their obstinacy and self-justification in their unbelief hastened upon them apace.

Secondly, Paul, having removed these objections, next revives his assertion of the general guilt and corruption of mankind in common, both of Jews and Gentiles, ver. 9–18. "Are we better than they," we Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God: doth this recommend us to God, or will this justify us? No, by no means. Or, are we Christians (Jews and Gentiles) so much better antecedently than the unbelieving part as to have merited God's grace? Alas! no; before free grace made the difference, those of us that had been Jews and those that had been Gentiles were all alike corrupted. "They are all under sin." 1. Under the guilt of sin; under it as under a sentence; under it as under a bond, by which they are bound over to eternal ruin and damnation; under it as under a burthen, Ps. xxxviii. 4, that will sink them to the lowest hell; we are guilty before God, ver. 19. 2. Under the government and dominion of sin; under it as under a tyrant and cruel taskmaster, enslaved to it; under it as under a yoke; under the power of it, sold to work wickedness. And this he had

iii. 20. "By the deeds of the law:" the works of the law can never afford the source of man's justification. Observe the future tense, which makes the conclusion universal.

iii. 21. "But now:" in these Gospel times. (Compare Col. i. 21–26; 2 Tim. i. 10; Heb. i. 1.) "Without the law:" i.e., independently, apart from. "Is manifested," better, "has been manifested," i.e., in the facts of the Gospel. The word may be compared with that used in chap. i. 17. That spoke of a gradual manifestation of God's righteousness in the hearts and lives of his children; this of a complete one, made once for all in Christ.

iii. 24, 25. "Redemption:" this word is found ten times in the New Testament. There are three stages implied—1. Bondage. 2. The intervention of a ransom. 3. Deliverance. "Propitiation:" the word used in the LXX. of the mercy-seat. "Through faith:" these words must be taken with "propitiation." They define "the instrumentality by which the expiatory work of Christ is applied to the proved, προηγουμένη. It is a law term; 'we have charged them with it,' and have made good our charge; we have proved the indictment, we have convicted them by the notorious evidence of the fact. This charge and conviction he here farther illustrates by several scriptures out of the Old Testament, which describe the corrupt, depraved state of all men, till grace restrain or change them; so that herein as in a glass we may all of us behold our natural face. The 10th, 11th, and 12th verses are taken from Ps. xiv. 1-3, which are repeated as containing a very weighty truth, Ps. liii. 1-3. The rest that follows here is found in the Septuagint translation of the 14th psalm, which some think the apostle chooses to follow as better known; but I rather think that Paul took these passages from other places of Scripture here referred to, but in later copies of the Seventy they were all added in Ps. xiv. from this discourse of Paul. It is observable that, to prove the general corruption of nature, he quotes some scriptures which speak of the particular corruptions of particular persons, as of Doeg, Ps. cxi. 3, of the Jews, Isa. lix. 7, 8, which shews that the same sins that are committed by one are in the nature of all. The times of David and Isaiah were some of the better times, and yet to their days he refers. What is said Ps. xiv. is expressly spoken of all the children of men, and that upon a particular view and inspection made by God himself. "The Lord looked down," as upon the old world, Gen. vi. 5. And this judgment of God was according to truth. He who, when he himself had made all, looked upon every thing that he had made, and behold all was very good, now that man had marred all, looked, and behold all was very bad. Let us take a view of the particulars. Observe,

1. That which is habitual, which is twofold:
1st. An habitual defect of everything that is good. First. "There is none righteous," none that has an honest good principle of virtue, or is governed by such a principle, none that retains any thing of that image of God, consisting in righteousness, wherein man was created; "no, not one;" implying that, if there had been but one, God would have found him out. When all the world was corrupt, God had his eye upon one righteous Noah. Even those who through grace are justified and sanctified were none of them righteous by nature. No righteousness is born with us. The man after God's own heart owns himself conceived in sin. Secondly. "There is none that understandeth," ver. 11. The fault lies in the corruption of the understanding; that is blinded, depraved, perverted. Religion and righteousness have so much reason on their side that if people had but any understanding they would be better and do better. But they do not understand. Sinners are fools. Thirdly. "None that seeketh after God;" that is, none that has any regard to God, any desire after him. Those may justly be reckoned to have no understanding that do not seek after God. The carnal mind is so far from seeking after God that really it is enmity against him. Fourthly. "They are together become unprofitable," ver. 12. Those that have forsaken God soon grow good for nothing, useless burthens of the earth. Those that are in a state of sin are the most unprofitable creatures under the sun; for it follows, Fifthly. "There is none that doeth good;" no, not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not, Ecc. vii. 23. Even in those actions of sinners that have some goodness in them there is a fundamental error in the principle and end; so that it may be said, "there is none that doeth good." Malum oritur ex quolibet defectu—'Every defect is the source of evil.'

2nd. An habitual defection to every thing that is evil. "They are all gone out of the way." No wonder that those miss the right way who do not seek after God, the highest end. God made man in the way, set him in right, but he hath forsaken it. The corruption of mankind is an apostasy.

3. That which is actual. And what good can be expected from such a degenerate race? He instances,

1st. In their words, ver. 13, 14, in three things particularly: First. Cruelty. "Their throat is an open sepulchre," ready to swallow up the poor and innocent, waiting an opportunity to do mischief, like the old serpent seeking to devour, whose name is Abaddon and Apollyon, the destroyer. And when they do not openly avow this cruelty, and vent it publicly, yet they are underhand intending mischief; "the poison of asps is under their lips," Jas. iii. 8; the most venomous and incurable poison, with which they blast the good name of their neighbour by reproaches, and aim at his life by false witness. These passages are borrowed from Ps. v. 9, and exl. 3. Secondly. Cheating. "With their tongues they have used deceit." Herein they shew themselves the devil's children, for he is a liar, and the father of lies. They have used it; it intimates that they make a trade of lying; it is their constant practice, especially belying the ways and people of God. Thirdly. Cursing; reflecting upon God, and blaspheming his holy name; wishing evil to their brethren; "Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness." This is mentioned as one of the great sins of the tongue, Jas. iii. 9. But those that thus love cursing shall have enough of it, Ps. cix. 17-19. How many who are called Christians do by these sins evince that they are still under the reign and dominion of sin, still in the condition that they were born in!

2nd. In their ways, ver. 15-17. "Their feet are swift to shed blood;" that is, they are very industrious to compass any cruel design, ready to lay hold of all such opportunities. Wherever they go, "destruction and misery" go along with them; these are their companions—destruction and misery to the people of God, to the country and neighbourhood where they live, to the land and nation, and to themselves at last. Besides the destruction and misery that are at the end of their ways, (death is the end of these things,) destruction and misery are in their ways; their sin is its own punishment; a man needs no more to make him miserable than to be a slave to his sins. "And the way of peace have they not known;" that is, they know not how to preserve peace with others, nor how to obtain peace for themselves. They may talk of peace, such a peace as is in the devil's palace, while he keeps it, but they are strangers to all true peace; they know not the things that belong to their peace. These are quoted from Pr. i. 16; Isa. lix. 7, 8.

3rd. The root of all this we have: "There is no fear of God before their eyes," ver. 18. The fear of God is here put for all practical religion, which consists in an awful and serious regard to the word and will of God as our rule, to the honour and glory of God as our end. Wicked people have not this before their eyes; that is, they do not steer by it: they are governed by other rules, aim at other ends. This is quoted from Ps. xxxvi. 1. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. The fear of God would lay a restraint upon our spirits, and keep them right, Neh. v. 15. When once fear is cast off, prayer is restrained, Job xv. 4, and then all goes to wreck and ruin quickly. So that we have here a short account of the general depravity and corruption of mankind; and may say, O Adam! what hast thou done? God made man upright, but thus he hath sought out many inventions.

19 Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God. 20 Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin. 21 But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; 22 Even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference: 23 For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; 24 Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: 25 Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; 26 To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. 27 Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. 28 Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. 29 Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: 30 Seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith. 31 Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law.

From all this Paul infers that it is in vain to look for justification by the works of the law, and that it is to be had only by faith, which is the point he has been all along proving, from ch. i. 17, and which he lays down (ver. 28) as the summary of his discourse, with a quod erat demonstrandum,—"that which was to be demonstrated." "We conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law;" not by the deeds of the first law of pure innocence, which left no room for repentance, nor the deeds of the law of nature, how highly soever improved, nor the deeds of the ceremonial law, (the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sin,) nor the deeds of the moral law, which are certainly included, for he speaks of that law by which is the knowledge of sin, and those works which might be matter of boasting. Man, in his depraved state, under the power of such corruption, could never, by any works of his own, gain acceptance with God; but it must be resolved purely into the free grace of God, given through Jesus Christ to all true believers that receive it as a free gift. If we had never sinned, our obedience to the law would have been our righteousness; "Do this, and live." But having sinned, and being corrupted, nothing that we can do will atone for our former guilt. It was by their obedience to the moral law that the Pharisees looked for justification, Lu. xviii. 11. Now there are two things from which the apostle here argues: the guiltiness of man, to prove that we cannot be justified by the works of the law; and the glory of God, to prove that we must be justified by faith.

First. He argues from man's guiltiness, to shew the folly of expecting justification by the works of the law. The argument is very plain: we can never be justified and saved by the law that we have broken. A convicted traitor can never come off by pleading the statute of 25 Edw. III., for that law discovers his crime and condemns him: indeed, if he had never broken it, he might have been justified by it; but now it is past that he has broken it, and there is no way of coming off but by pleading the act of indemnity, upon which he has surrendered and submitted himself, and humbly and penitently claiming the benefit of it and casting himself upon it. Now concerning the guiltiness of man,

1. He fastens it particularly upon the Jews; for they were the men that made their boast of the law, and set up for justification by it. He had quoted several scriptures out of the Old Testament to shew this corruption. Now, says he, (ver. 19) this that "the law says to those who are under the law;" this conviction belongs to the Jews as well as others, for it is written in their law. The Jews boasted of their being under the law, and placed a great deal of confidence in it: "But," says he, "the law convicts and condemns you—you see it does." That "every mouth may be stopped"—that all boasting may be silenced. See the method that God takes both in justifying and condemning: he stops every mouth; those that are justified have their mouths stopped by an humble conviction; those that are condemned have their mouths stopped too, for they shall at last be convinced, (Jude 15), and sent speechless to hell, Mat. xxii. 12. "All iniquity shall stop her mouth," Ps. cvii. 42.

2. He extends it in general to all the world; "That all the world may become guilty before God." If the world lies in wickedness, (1 Jno. v. 19), to be sure it is guilty. "May become guilty;" that is, may be proved guilty, liable to punishment, all "by nature children of wrath," Eph. ii. 3. They must all plead guilty; those that stand most upon their own justification will certainly be cast. Guilty before God is a dreadful word, before an all-seeing God, that is not, nor can be, deceived in his judgment—before a just and righteous judge, who will by no means clear the guilty. All are guilty, and therefore all have need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. "For all have sinned," ver. 23; all are sinners by nature, by practice, "and have come short of the glory of God"—have failed of that which is the chief end of man. "Come short," as the archer comes short of the mark, as the runner comes short of the prize; so come short, as not only not to win, but to be great losers. "Come short of the glory of God." 1st. Come short of glorifying God: see ch. i. 21, "They glorified him not as God." Man was placed at the head of the visible creation, actively to glorify that great Creator whom the inferior creatures could glorify only objectively; but man by sin comes short of this, and, instead boastful confidence of the Jew, he has shown that neither the possession of the law (chap. ii. 17-24), nor of circumcision (verses 25-29) in themselves gave any title to confidence. The case of Abraham is brought forward for a double purpose: to the Jew the name of Abraham was the very embodiment of these external confidences; to demolish these looked like stripping their great ancestor of his glory. Did Abraham find nothing as pertaining to the flesh? Had he no external grounds of boasting? Having thus anticipated the inquiry, individual man, and are closely connected with the following words—"in his blood." Propitiatory by means of a faith resting in the blood of Christ himself" (Dr. Vaughan).

iv. 1-8. The connection between this chapter and the preceding should be carefully noted. In dealing with the case of the Jews, the apostle pointed to their confidence and boasting (chap. ii. 17). In chap. iii. he shows that the principle of justification by faith utterly annihilates the ground of this boasting (verse 27). In demolishing the of glorifying God, dishonours him. It is a very melancholy consideration, to look upon the children of men, who were made to glorify God, and to think how few there are that do it. 2nd. Come short of glorying before God. There is no boasting of innocence; if we go about to glory before God, to boast of any thing we are, or have, or do, this will be an everlasting estoppel—that we have all sinned, and this will silence us. We may glory before men, who are shortsighted, and cannot search our hearts—who are corrupt, as we are, and well enough pleased with sin; but there is no glorying before God, who cannot endure to look upon iniquity. 3rd. Come short of being glorified by God. Come short of justification, or acceptance with God, which is glory begun—come short of the holiness or sanctification which is the glorious image of God upon man, and have overthrown all hopes and expectations of being glorified with God in heaven by any righteousness of their own. It is impossible now to get to heaven in the way of spotless innocence. That passage is blocked up. There is a cherub and a flaming sword set to keep that way to the tree of life.

3. Farther to drive us off from expecting justification by the law, he ascribes this conviction to the law; ver. 20, "For by the law is the knowledge of sin." That law which convicts and condemns us can never justify us. The law is the straight rule, that rectum which is index sui et obliqui,—that which points out the right and the wrong; 'it is the proper use and intendment of the law to open our wound, and therefore not likely to be the remedy. That which is searching is not sanative. Those that would know sin must get the knowledge of the law in its strictness, extent, and spiritual nature. If we compare our own hearts and lives with this rule, we shall discover wherein we have turned aside. Paul makes this use of the law, ch. vii. 9. "Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight. Observe, 1st. No flesh shall be justified," no man, no corrupted man, (Gen. vi. 3), "for that he also is flesh," sinful and depraved; therefore not justified, because we are flesh. The corruption that remains in our nature will for ever obstruct any justification by our own works, which, coming from flesh, must needs taste of the cask, Job xiv. 4. 2nd. Not justified in his sight. He does not deny that justification which was by the deeds of the law in the sight of the church; they were, in their church-estate, as embodied in a polity, a holy people, a nation of priests; but as the conscience stands in relation to God, in his sight, we cannot be justified by the deeds of the law. The apostle refers to Ps. cxlii. 2.

Secondly. He argues from God's glory to prove that justification must be expected only by faith in Christ's righteousness. There is no justification by the works of the law. Must guilty man then remain eternally under wrath? Is there no hope? Is the wound become incurable because of transgression? No, blessed be God, it is not, ver. 21, 22; there is another way laid open for us, "the righteousness of God without the law is manifested" now under the Gospel. Justification may be obtained without the keeping of Moses' law; and this is called "the righteousness of God," righteousness of his ordaining, and providing, and accepting,—righteousness which he confers upon us; as the Christian armour is called the armour of God, Eph. vi. 11.

1. Now concerning this righteousness of God observe, 1st. That it is manifested. The gospel way of justification is a highway, a plain way, it is laid open for us: the brazen serpent is lifted up upon the pole; we are not left to grope our way in the dark, but it is manifested to us. 2nd. It is without the law. Here he obviates the method of the Judaizing Christians, who would needs join Christ and Moses together—owning Christ for the Messiah, and yet too fondly retaining the law, keeping up the ceremonies of it, and imposing it upon the Gentile converts: No, says he, it is without the law. The righteousness that Christ hath brought in is a complete righteousness. 3rd. Yet it is "witnessed by the law and the prophets;" that is, there were types, and prophecies, and promises, in the Old Testament, that pointed at this. The law is so far from justifying us that it directs us to another way of justification, points at Christ as our righteousness, to whom bear all the prophets witness: see Acts x. 43. This might recommend it to the Jews, who were so fond of the law and the prophets. 4th. It is by "the faith of Jesus Christ," that faith which hath Jesus Christ for its object—an 'anointed Saviour,' so Jesus Christ signifies. Justifying faith respects Christ as a Saviour in all his three anointed offices, as prophet, priest, and king—trusting in him, accepting of him, and adhering to him, in all these. It is by this that we become interested in that righteousness which God has ordained, and which Christ has brought in. 5th. It is "to all, and upon all, those that believe." In this expression he inculcates that which he had been often harping upon, that Jews and Gentiles, if they believe, stand upon the same level, and are alike welcome to God through Christ; "for there is no difference." Or, it is εις πάντας—to all, offered to all in general; the Gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves; but it is ἐπι πάντας τοὺς πιστεύοντας, "upon all that believe," not only tendered to them, but put upon them as a crown, as a robe; they are, upon their believing, interested in it, and entitled to all the benefits and privileges of it.

2. But now how is this for God's glory? 1st. It is for the glory of his grace; ver. 24, "Justified freely by his grace,"—δωρεάν ἢ αὐτοῦ χάριτι. It is "by his grace," not by the grace wrought in us as the papists say, confounding justification and sanctification, but by the gracious favour of God to us, without any merit in us so much as forseen. And, to make it the more emphatic, he says it is "freely by his grace," to shew that it must be understood of grace in the most proper and genuine sense. It is said that Joseph found grace in the sight of his master, Gen. xxxix. 4, but there was a reason; he saw that what he did prospered. There was something in Joseph to invite that grace; but the grace of God communicated to us comes freely, freely; it is free grace, mere mercy; nothing in us to deserve such favours; no, it is all "through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ." It comes freely to us, but Christ bought it, and paid dear for it, which yet is so ordered as not to derogate from the honour of free grace. Christ's purchase is no bar to the freeness of God's grace; for grace provided and accepted this vicarious satisfaction.

2nd. It is for the glory of his justice and righteousness; ver. 25, 26, "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation," &c. Note, First. Jesus Christ is the great propitiation, or propitiatory sacrifice, typified by the ἱλαστήριον, or mercy-seat, under the law. He is our throne of grace, in and through whom atonement is made for sin, and our persons and performances are accepted of God, 1 Jno. ii. 2. He is all in all in our reconciliation, not only the maker, but the matter of it—our priest, our sacrifice, our altar, our all. God was in Christ as in his mercy-seat, reconciling the world unto himself. Secondly. God hath set him forth to be so. God, the party offended, makes the first overtures towards a reconciliation, appoints the daysman; προέβητο—"foreordained" him to this, in the counsels of his love from eternity, appointed, anointed him to it, qualified him for it, and has exhibited him to a guilty world as their propitiation; see Mat. iii. 17; xvii. 5. Thirdly. That by faith in his blood we become interested in this propitiation. Christ is the propitiation; there is the healing plaster provided. Faith is the applying of this plaster to the wounded soul. And this faith in the business of justification hath a special regard to the blood of Christ, as that which made the atonement; for such was the Divine appointment, that without blood there should be no remission, and no blood but his would do it effectually. Here may be an allusion to the sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifices under the law as Ex. xxiv. 8. Faith is the bunch of hyssop, and the blood of Christ is the blood of sprinkling. Fourthly. That all who by faith are interested in this propitiation have "the remission of their sins that are past." It was for this that Christ was set forth to be a propitiation, in order to remission, to which the reprieves of his patience and forbearance were a very encouraging preface. "Through the forbearance of God." Divine patience has kept us out of hell, that we might have space to repent, and get to heaven. Some refer the "sins that are past" to the sins of the Old Testament saints, which were pardoned for the sake of the atonement which Christ in the fullness of time was to make, which looked backward as well as forward. "Past through the forbearance of God." It is owing to the Divine forbearance that we were not taken away in the very act of sin. Several Greek copies make ἐν τῇ ἀνομίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ—"through the forbearance of God," to begin ver. 26, and they denote two precious fruits of Christ's merit and God's grace:—Remission: ἀνά τῇ παρρησίᾳ—"for the remission;" and reprieves: "the forbearance of God." It is owing to the master's goodness and the dresser's mediation that barren trees are let alone in the vineyard; and in both God's righteousness is declared, in that without a mediator and a propitiation he would not only not pardon, but not so much as forbear, not spare a moment; it is owing to Christ that there is ever a sinner on this side hell. Fifthly. That God does in all this declare his righteousness. This he insists upon with a great deal of emphasis; "To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness." It is repeated, as that which has in it something surprising. He declares his righteousness, 1st. In the propitiation itself. Never was there such a demonstration of the justice and holiness of God as there was in the death of Christ. It appears that he hates sin, when nothing less than the blood of Christ would satisfy for it. Finding sin, though but imputed, upon his own Son, he did not spare him, because he had made himself sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21. The iniquities of us all being laid upon him, though he was the Son of his love, yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, Isa. liii. 10. 2nd. In the pardon upon that propitiation; so it follows, by way of explication; "That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth." Mercy and truth are so met together, righteousness and peace have so kissed each other, that it is now become not only an act of grace and mercy, but an act of righteousness, in God, to pardon the sins of penitent believers, having accepted the satisfaction that Christ by dying made to his justice for them. It would not comport with his justice to demand the debt of the principal when the surety has paid it and he has accepted that payment in full satisfaction: see 1 Jno. i. 9. He is just, that is, faithful to his word.

3rd. It is for God's glory; for boasting is thus excluded, ver. 27. God will have the great work of the justification and salvation of sinners carried on from first to last in such a way as to exclude boasting, that no flesh may glory in his presence, 1 Cor. i. 29–31. Now, if justification were by the works of the law, boasting would not be excluded. How should it? If we were saved by our own works, we might put the crown upon our own heads. But the law of faith, that is, the way of justification by faith, doth for ever exclude boasting; for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne; therefore it is most for God's glory that thus we should be justified. Observe, He speaks of the law of faith. Believers are not left lawless: faith is a law, it is a working grace, wherever it is in truth; and yet, because it acts in a strict and close dependence upon Jesus Christ, it excludes boasting. From all this he draws this conclusion; ver. 28, "That a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law."

Thirdly. In the close of the chapter he shews the extent of this privilege of justification by faith, and that it is not the peculiar privilege of the Jews, but pertains to the Gentiles also; for he had said (ver. 23) that there is no difference: and as to this, 1. He asserts and proves it; ver. 29, 30, "Is he the God of the Jews only?" He argues from the absurdity of such a supposition. Can it be imagined that a God of infinite love and mercy should limit and confine his favours to that little perverse people of the Jews, leaving all the rest of the children of men in a condition eternally desperate? This would by no means agree with the idea we have of the Divine goodness, for his "tender mercies are over all his works;" therefore it is one God of grace that "justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith;" that is, both in one and the same way. However the Jews, in favour of themselves, will needs fancy a difference, really there is no more difference than between by and through, that is, no difference at all. 2. He obviates an objection, ver. 31, as if this doctrine did nullify the law, which they knew came from God: "No," says he, "though we do say that the law will not justify us, yet we do not therefore say that it was given in vain, or is of no use to us; no, we establish the right use of the law, and secure its standing, by fixing it on the right basis. The law is still of use to convince us of what is past, and to direct us for the future; though we cannot be saved by it as a covenant, yet we own it, and submit to it, as a rule in the hand of the Mediator, subordinate to the law of grace; and thus are so far from overthrowing that we establish the law." Let those consider this who deny the obligation of the moral law on believers. [Yea, we establish the law.] This is done in the following manner: 1. God shewed respect to it, in being unwilling to pardon sinners without an atonement. 2. Jesus Christ came to magnify it, and to make it honourable. 3. The plan of justification by faith leads to an observance of the law. We do not easily and readily repeat that which overwhelms our best friends in calamity; and we are brought to hate that which inflicted such woes on the Saviour's soul. The sentiment recorded by Watts is as true as it is beautiful,—

'Twas for my sins my dearest Lord Hung on the cursed tree,
And groan'd away his dying life,
For thee, my soul, for thee.
O how I hate those lusts of mine
That crucified my Lord;
Those sins that pierced and nail'd his flesh
Fast to the fatal wood.
Yes, my Redeemer, they shall die,
My heart hath so decreed;
Nor will I spare the guilty things
That made my Saviour bleed.

This is an advantage in moral influence which no cold, abstract law ever has over the human mind. And one of the chief glories of the plan of salvation is, that, while the sinner is justified, it brings a new set of influences from heaven, more tender and mighty than can be drawn from any other source, to produce obedience to the law of God.—A. E.]

CHAPTER IV.

The great gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law was so very contrary to the notions the Jews had learnt from those that sat in Moses' chair, that it would hardly go down with them; and therefore the apostle insists very largely upon it, and labours much in the confirmation and illustration of it. He had before proved it by reason and argument, now in this chapter he proves it by example, which the apostle proceeds to show that the principle for which he was contending had been exemplified in the case of Abraham, and the very outward sign on which the Jew prided himself was in itself the witness that Abraham found his justification by faith. In verse 1 the phrase "as pertaining to the flesh" must be joined to "found," not to "our father Abraham." In verse 2 a full stop after "glory" will make the passage clearer. The last clause in the verse is best read in connection with verse 3: "But not before God. For," &c.: the sense runs, "If Abraham was justified by works, he has ground for boasting. But he has none before God, for the Scripture assigns faith as the means of his justification." In this passage the word "impute" is translated "reckon" by Alford.

iv. 11, 12. "Yet being uncircumcised," better, "while in his uncircumcision." "That he might be the father," &c.: implying the purpose, not the mere consequence; but in order "that he might be the father of all them that believe." The true descendants of Abraham

In some places serves for confirmation as well as illustration. The example he pitches upon is that of Abraham, whom he chooses to mention because the Jews gloried much in their relation to Abraham, put it in the first rank of their external privileges that they were Abraham's seed, and truly they had Abraham for their father. Therefore this instance was likely to be more taking and convincing to the Jews than any other. His argument stands thus: 'All that are saved are justified in the same way as Abraham was; but Abraham was justified by faith, and not by works; therefore all that are saved are so justified; for it would easily be acknowledged that Abraham was the father of the faithful. Now this is an argument, not only a pari,—from an equal case, as they say, but a fortiori,—from a stronger case.' If Abraham, a man so famous for works, so eminent in holiness and obedience, was nevertheless justified by faith only, and not by those works, how much less can any other, especially any of those that spring from him, and come so far short of him in works, set up for a justification by their own works? And it proves likewise, ex abundanti,—the more abundantly, as some observe, that we are not justified, no, not by those good works which flow from faith, as the matter of our righteousness; for such were Abraham's works, and are we better than he? The whole chapter is taken up with his discourse upon this instance, and there is in it which hath a particular reference to the close of the foregoing chapter, where he had asserted that, in the business of justification, Jews and Gentiles stand upon the same level. Now in this chapter, with a great deal of cogency of argument, I. He proves that Abraham was justified, not by works, but by faith, ver. 1—8. II. He observes when and why he was so justified, ver. 9—17. III. He describes and commends that faith of his, ver. 17—22. IV. He applies all this to us, ver. 22—25. And, if he had now been in the school of Tyrannus, he could not have disputed more argumentatively.

WHAT shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found? 2 For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God. 3 For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. 4 Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt. 5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. 6 Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, 7 Saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 8 Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin.

Here the apostle proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith. Those that of all men contended most vigorously for a share in righteousness by the privileges they enjoyed, and the works they performed, were the Jews, and therefore he appeals to the case of Abraham their father, and puts his own name to the relation, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews; "Abraham our father." Now surely his prerogative must needs be as great as theirs who claim it as his seed according to the flesh. Now what has he found? All the world is seeking; but, while the most are wearying themselves for very vanity, none can be truly reckoned to have found but those who are justified before God; and thus Abraham, like a wise merchant, seeking goodly pearls, found this one pearl of great price. What has he found, κατα σάρκα—as pertaining to the flesh, that is, by circumcision and his external privileges and performances? These the apostle calls flesh, Phil. iii. 3. Now what did he get by these? Was he justified by them? Was it the merit of his works that recommended him to God's acceptance? No, by no means, which he proves by several arguments.

First, if he had been justified by works, room would have been left for boasting, which must for ever be excluded. If so, "he hath whereof to glory," ver. 2, which is not to be allowed. But, might the Jews say, "was not his name made great, (Gen. xii. 2), and then might not he glory?" Yes, "but not before God;" he might deserve well of men, but he could never merit of God. Paul himself had whereof to glory before men, and we have him sometimes glorying in it, yet with humility; but nothing to glory in before God, 1 Cor. iv. 4; Phil. iii. 8, 9: so Abraham. Observe. He takes it for granted that man must not pretend to glory in anything before God; no, not Abraham, as great as and as good a man as he was; and therefore he fetches an argument from it: it would be absurd for him that glorieth to glory in any but the Lord.

Secondly, it is expressly said that Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness; "What saith the Scripture?" ver. 3. In all controversies in religion this must be our question, "What saith the Scripture?" It is not what this great man and the other good man say, but what saith the Scripture? Ask counsel at this Abel, and so end the matter, 2 Sam. xx. 18. "To the law and the testimony," Isa. viii. 20, thither is the last appeal. Now the Scripture saith that "Abraham believed, and this was counted to him for righteousness," Gen. xv. 6; therefore he had not whereof to glory before God, it being purely of free grace that it was so imputed, and having not in itself anything of the formal nature of a righteousness, farther than as God himself was graciously pleased so to count it to him. It is mentioned in Genesis, upon occasion of a very signal and remarkable act of faith concerning the promised seed, and is the more observable in that it followed upon a grievous conflict he had had with unbelief; his faith was now a victorious faith, newly returned from the battle. It is not the perfect faith that is required to justification,—there may be acceptable faith where there are remainders of unbelief,—but the prevailing faith, the faith that has the upper hand of unbelief.

["Righteousness" means here, as it does in many other passages, justification. The sense then is, "Faith was imputed to him for justification," that is, that he might be justified, or in order to his becoming and being treated as righteous; see ch. x. 4, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness," that is, in order that every one that believes may be regarded as righteous." Nothing is more familiar than this use of the preposition here used by the apostle. It points out the design with which any thing is done as "unto repentance," that men may repent, Mat. iii. 11; "unto death," that we may die, ch. vi. 3. So "unto salvation," ch. xi. 1; "unto condemnation," Lu. xxiv. 20. Or it indicates the result, ch. x. 10, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness," that is, so that he is justified, regarded, and treated as righteous. This view of the passage expresses accurately the apostle's meaning. It was not as 'one who works, but as a believer, that Abraham was regarded in his justification. It was not works, but faith, that was imputed to him, in order to his being introduced into the number and blessings of the righteous. Faith, therefore, was not the ground of his justification, but the means of his being justified.—H.]

Thirdly, if he had been justified by faith the reward would have been of debt, and not of grace, which is not to be imagined. This is his argument, ver. 4, 5: Abraham's reward was God himself; so he had told him but just before, Gen. xv. 1, "I am thy exceeding great reward." Now, if Abraham had merited this by the perfection of his obedience, it had not been an act of grace in God, but Abraham might have demanded it with as much confidence as ever any labourer in the vineyard demanded the penny he had earned. But this cannot be; it is impossible for man, much more guilty man, to make God a debtor to him, ch. xi. 35. No, God will have free grace to have all the glory, grace for grace's sake, Jno. i. 16. And therefore to him that worketh not, that can pretend to no such merit, nor shew any worth or value in his work, which may answer such a reward, but disclaiming any such pretension, casts himself wholly upon the free grace of God in Christ by a lively, active, obedient faith,—to such a one "faith is counted for righteousness," is accepted of God as the qualification required in all that shall be pardoned and saved. "Him that justifieth the ungodly," that is, him that was before ungodly. His former ungodliness was no bar to his justification upon his believing: τὸν ἀσεβή,—that ungodly one, that is, Abraham, who, before his conversion, it should seem, was carried down the stream of the Chaldean idolatry, Jos. xxiv. 2. No room, therefore, is left for despair, though God clears not the impenitent guilty, yet through Christ he justifies the ungodly.

Fourthly, He farther illustrates this by a passage out of the Psalms, where David speaks of the remission of sins, the prime branch of justification, as constituting the happiness and blessedness of a man, pronouncing blessed, not the man who has no sin, or none which deserved death,—for then, while man is so sinful, and God so righteous, where would be the blessed man?—but "the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin," who, though he cannot plead, yet guilty, pleads the act of indemnity, and his plea is allowed. It is quoted from Ps. xxxii. 1, 2, where observe, 1. The nature of forgiveness. It is the remission of a debt or a crime; it is the covering of sin, as a filthy thing, as the nakedness and shame of the soul. God is said to cast sin behind his back, to hide his face from it, which, and the like expressions, imply that the ground of our blessedness is not our innocency, or our not having sinned,—a thing is, and is filthy, though covered; justification does not make the sin not to have been, or not to have been sin,—but God's not laying it to our charge, as it follows here; it is God's not imputing sin, ver. 8, which makes it wholly a gracious act of God, not dealing with us in strict justice, as we have deserved, not entering into judgment, not marking iniquities; all which, being purely acts of grace, the acceptance and the reward cannot be expected as due debts; and therefore Paul infers, ver. 6, that it is the imputing of righteousness without works. 2. The blessedness of it; Blessed are they. When it is said, "Blessed are the undefiled in the way, blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked," &c., the design is to shew the characters of those that are blessed; but when it is said, "Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven," the design is to shew what that blessedness is, and what is the ground and foundation of it. Pardoned people are the only blessed people. The sentiments of the world are, those are happy that have a clear estate, and are out of debt to man; but the sentence of the word is, Those are happy that have their debts to God discharged. O how much therefore is it our interest to make it sure to ourselves that our sins are pardoned! For this is the foundation of all other benefits. So and so I will do for them; for I will be merciful. Heb. viii. 12.

9 Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. 10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision. 11 And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed unto them also: 12 And the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised. 13 For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. 14 For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect: 15 Because the law worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. 16 Therefore it is of faith, that it might embrace all who show the same faith. It is not birth, nor circumcision, but faith which constitutes the heirship.

iv. 16. "Therefore it," &c.: for which reason "it (i.e., the inheritance) was by faith, that it might be (the purpose again, not the consequence) by grace, in order that (purpose once more) the promise might be sure to all the seed."

iv. 17. "Before God:" connect with last clause of verse 16—"father of us all before God." In the estimation of the Almighty, Abraham is the father of all the faithful, for with God there is no past or future. All generations—the dead and the unborn, and, by implication, those now alive—are embraced in one view. (Compare 2 Pet. iii. 8.)

iv. 19. "He considered not:" in some MSS. the word "not" is omitted. Taking the Authorised Version, the sense is, "he took no account of." Without the "not" the faith of Abraham appears in a stronger light. "Being not weak, he took notice of, &c.; yet be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the father of us all, 17 (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,)

St. Paul observes in this paragraph when and why Abraham was thus justified, for he has several things to remark upon that. It was before he was circumcised, and before the giving of the law, and there was a reason for both.

First. It was before he was circumcised, ver. 10. His faith was counted to him for righteousness while he was in uncircumcision. It was imputed, Gen. xv. 6, and he was not circumcised till ch. xvii. Abraham is expressly said to be justified by faith fourteen years, some say twenty-five years, before he was circumcised. Now this the apostle takes notice of in answer to the question, ver. 9, "Cometh this blessedness then on the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also?" Abraham was pardoned and accepted in uncircumcision, a circumstance which, as it might silence the fears of the poor uncircumcised Gentiles, so it might lower the pride and conceitedness of the Jews, who gloried in their circumcision, as if they had the monopoly of all happiness. Here are two reasons why Abraham was justified by faith in uncircumcision:

1. That circumcision might be "a seal of the righteousness of faith," ver. 11. The tenor of the covenants must first be settled before the seal can be annexed. Sealing supposes a previous bargain, which is confirmed and ratified by that ceremony. After Abraham's justification by faith had continued several years only a grant by parole, for the confirmation of Abraham's faith God was pleased to appoint a sealing ordinance, and Abraham received it; though it was a bloody ordinance, yet he submitted to it, and even received it as a special favour, "the sign of circumcision," &c. Now we may hence observe, 1st. The nature of sacraments in general; they are signs and seals, signs to represent and instruct, seals to ratify and confirm. They are signs of absolute grace and favour; they are seals of the conditional promises; nay, they are mutual seals; God does in the sacraments seal to us to be to us a God, and we do therein seal to him to be to him a people. 2nd. The nature of circumcision in particular; it was the initiating sacrament of the Old Testament; and it is here said to be, First, "A sign" a sign of that original corruption which we are all born with, and which is cut off by spiritual circumcision, a commemorating sign of God's covenant with Abraham, a distinguishing sign between Jews and Gentiles, a sign of admission into the visible church, a sign prefiguring baptism, which comes in the room of circumcision, now under the Gospel, when, the blood of Christ being shed, all bloody ordinances are abolished; it was "an outward and sensible sign of an inward and spiritual grace signified thereby." Secondly, "A seal of the righteousness of the faith." In general it was a seal of the covenant of grace, particularly of justification by faith, the covenant of grace, called "the righteousness which is of faith," ch. x. 6, and it refers to an Old Testament promise, Deu. xxx. 12. Now if infants were then capable of receiving a seal of the covenant of grace, which proves that they then were within the verge of that covenant, how they come to be now cast out of the covenant and incapable of the seal, and by what severe sentence they were thus rejected and incapacitated, those are concerned to make out that not only reject, but nullify and reproach, the baptism of the seed of believers.

[This affords, we think, something more than a dubious glimpse into the question that is often put by a distracted mother, when her babe is taken away from her—when all the converse it ever had with the world amounted to the gaze upon it of a few months or a few opening smiles, which marked the dawn of felt enjoyment; and ere it had reached perhaps the lisp of infancy, it, all unconscious of death, had to wrestle through a period of sickness with its power, and at length to be overcome by it. Oh, it little knew what an interest it had created in that home where it was so passing a visitant; nor, when carried to its early grave, what a tide of emotion it would raise among the few acquaintances it left behind it! On it too baptism was impressed as a seal, and as a sign it was never falsified. There was no positive unbelief in its little bosom—no resistance yet put forth to the truth—no love at all for the darkness rather than the light—nor had it yet fallen into that great condemnation which will attach to all who perish because of unbelief, that their deeds are evil. It is interesting to know that God instituted circumcision for the infant children of Jews, and at least suffered baptism for the infant children of those who profess Christianity. Should the child die in infancy, the use of baptism as a sign has never been thwarted by it; and may we not be permitted to indulge a hope so pleasing, as that the use of baptism as a seal remains in all its entirety—that he who sanctioned the affixing of it to a babe will fulfil upon it the whole expression of this ordinance? And when we couple with this the known disposition of our great Forerunner—the love that he manifested to children on earth—how he suffered them to approach his person—and, lavishing endearment and kindness upon them in the streets of Jerusalem, told his disciples that the presence and company of such as these in heaven formed one ingredient of the joy that was set before him—tell us if Christianity do not throw a pleasing radiance around an infant's tomb? And should any parent who hears us feel softened by the touching remembrance of a light that twinkled a few short months under his roof, and at the end of its little period expired—we cannot think that we venture too far when we say that he has only to persevere in the faith and in the following of the Gospel, and that very light will again shine upon him in heaven. The blossom which withered here upon its stalk has been transplanted there to a place of endurance; and it will then gladden that eye which now weeps out the agony of an affection that has been sorely wounded; and in the name of him who, if on earth, would have wept along with them, do we bid all believers present, to sorrow not even as others which have no hope, but to take comfort in the thought of that country where there is no sorrow and no separation.]

"Oh, when a mother meets on high
The babe she lost in infancy,
Hath she not then, for pains and fears—
The day of woe, the watchful night—
For all her sorrow, all her tears—
An overpayment of delight?"—C.]

2. "That he might be the father of all those that believe." Not but that there were those that were justified by faith before Abraham; but of Abraham first it is particularly observed, and in him commenced a much clearer and fuller dispensation of the covenant of grace than any that had been before extant; and therefore he is called "the father of all that believe," because he was so eminent a believer, and so eminently justified by faith, as Jabel was the father of shepherds, and Jubal of musicians, Gen. iv. 4, 21. "The father of all those that believe;" that is, a standing pattern of faith, as parents are examples to their children; and a standing precedent of justification by faith, as the liberties, privileges, honours, and estates of the fathers descend to their children. Abraham was the father of believers, because to him particularly the Magna Charta was renewed. 1st. The father of believing Gentiles, "though they be not circumcised." Zaccheus, a publican, if he believe, is reckoned a son of Abraham, Lu. xix. 9. Abraham being himself uncircumcised when he was justified by faith, uncircumcision can never be a bar. Thus were the doubts and fears of the poor Gentiles anticipated, and no room left to question but that righteousness might be imputed to them also, Col. iii. 11; Gal. v. 6. 2nd. The father of believing Jews, not merely as circumcised, and of the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, but because believers, because they "are not of the circumcision only," that is, are not only circumcised, "but walk in the steps of that faith;" have not only the sign, but the thing signified; not only are of Abraham's family, but follow the example of Abraham's faith. See here who are the genuine children and lawful successors of those that were the church's fathers; not those that sit in their chairs and bear their names, but those that tread in their steps; this is the line of succession which holds, notwithstanding interruptions. It seems, then, those were most loud and forward to call Abraham father that had least title to the honours and privileges of his children. Thus, those have most reason to call Christ father, not that bear his name in being Christians in profession, but that tread in his steps.

Secondly. It was before the giving of the law, ver. 13—16. The former observation is levelled against those that confined justification to the circumcision, this against those that expected it by the law; now the promise was made to Abraham long before the law. Compare Gal. iii. 17, 18. Now observe.

1. What that promise was; "that he should be the heir of the world" that is, of the land of Canaan, the choicest spot of ground in the world; or the father of many nations of the world who sprang from him besides the Israelites; or the heir of the comforts of the life which now is. The meek are said to inherit the earth, and the world is theirs. Though Abraham had so little of the world in possession, yet he was heir of it all. Or, rather, it points at Christ, the seed here mentioned: compare Gal. iii. 16. "To thy seed, which is Christ." Now Christ is the heir of the world, the ends of the earth are his possession, and it is in him that Abraham was so. And it refers to that promise, Gen. xii. 3, "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

2. How it was made to him; "Not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." "Not through the law," for that was not yet given; but it was upon that believing which was counted to him for righteousness; it was upon his trusting God in his leaving his own country when God commanded him, Heb. xi. 8. Now being by faith it could not be by the law, which he proves by the opposition there is between them, ver. 14, 15, "If those who are of the law be heirs;" that is, those, and those only, and they by virtue of the law,—the Jews did, and still do, boast that they are the rightful heirs of the world, because to them the law was given,—then "faith is made void;" for, if it were requisite to an interest in the promise that there should be a perfect performance of the whole law, then the promise can never take its effect, nor is it to any purpose for us to depend upon it, since the way to life by perfect obedience to the law, and spotless, sinless innocency, is wholly blocked up, and the law in itself opens no other way. This he proves, ver. 15, "The law worketh wrath," wrath in us to God; it irritates and provokes that carnal mind which is enmity to God, as the damming up of a stream makes it swell; wrath in God against us: it works this, that is, it discovers it, or our breach of the law works it. Now it is certain that we can never expect the inheritance by a law that worketh wrath. How the law works wrath he shews very concisely in the latter part of the verse, "Where no law is there is no transgression," an acknowledged maxim, which implies, where there is a law there is transgression, and that transgression is provoking, and so the law worketh wrath.

3. Why the promise was made to him by faith; for three reasons, ver. 16. 1st. "That it might be by grace," that grace might have the honour of it; "by grace, and not by the law; by grace, and not of debt, not of merit;" that Grace, grace, might be cried to every stone, especially to the top-stone in this building. Faith hath particular reference to grace granting, as grace hath reference to faith receiving. By grace, and therefore through faith, Eph. ii. 8. For God will have every crown thrown at the feet of grace, free grace, and every song in heaven sung to that tune, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name, be the praise." 2nd. "That the promise might be sure." The first covenant, being a covenant of works, was not sure; but, through man's failure, the benefits designed by it were cut off; and therefore the more effectually to ascertain and ensure the conveyance of the new covenant, there is another way found out, "not by works;" were it so, the promise would not be sure, because of the continual frailty and infirmity of the flesh; "but by faith," which receives all from Christ, and acts in a continual dependence upon him, as the great trustee of our salvation, and in whose keeping it is safe. The covenant is therefore sure, because it is so well ordered in all things, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. 3rd. "That it might be sure to all the seed." If it had been by the law, it had been limited to the Jews, "to whom pertained the glory," and the covenants, and the giving of the law," ch. ix. 4; but therefore it was by faith, that Gentiles as well as Jews might become interested in it, the spiritual as well as the natural seed of faithful Abraham. God would contrive the promise in such a way as might make it most extensive, to comprehend all true believers, that circumcision and uncircumcision might break no squares; and for this, ver. 17, he refers us to Gen. xvii. 5, where the reason of the change of his name from Abram, "a high father," to Abraham, "the high father of a multitude," is thus rendered; "For a father of many nations have I made thee;" that is, all believers, both before and since the coming of Christ in the flesh, should take Abraham for their pattern, and call him father. The Jews say Abraham was the father of all proselytes to the Jewish religion. "Behold, he is the father of all the world, which are gathered under the wings of the Divine majesty."—Maimonides.

17 — Before him whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 18 Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. 19 And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: 20 He staggered not staggered not:" he estimated the natural difficulties, but his confidence in God's promise and power surmounted them all.

iv. 25. "For our offences," &c.: for the sake of our offences. "Justification:" this word is used only here and in chap. v. 18, and signifies the act of absolving, acquitting, or clearing from guilt. (See Dr. Vaughan's Note in loco.)

v. 1—5. The sense of unforgiven sin causes alienation of mind, and even the feeling of enmity; the sense of forgiveness brings peace. (Compare Col. i. 20, 21.) "We have peace:" in the best MSS. the word is "let us have." Perhaps this reading presses the application of the truth more closely. "Being justified by faith there is no hindrance to our experiencing true peace; let us have and use it." "By whom we have access:" the perfect tense is used, and should be rendered as in Commentary: "we have had." The access is spoken of as having taken place; we have entered by virtue of that faith into this state of grace, or gratuitous acceptance. "The same representaat the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; 21 And being fully persuaded that, what he had promised, he was able also to perform. 22 And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness.

Having observed when Abraham was justified by faith, and why, for the honour of Abraham, and for example to us who call him father, the apostle here describes and commends the faith of Abraham, where observe,

First. Whom he believed; "God who quickeneth." It is God himself that faith fastens upon; "other foundation can no man lay." Now observe what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to; to that, certainly, which would be most likely to confirm his faith concerning the things promised: 1. "God who quickeneth the dead." It was promised that he should be "the father of many nations," when he and his wife were now as good as dead, Heb. xi. 11, 12; and therefore he looks upon God as a God that could breathe life into dry bones. He that quickeneth the dead can do any thing, can give a child to Abraham when he is old, can bring the Gentiles, who are dead in trespasses and sins, to a Divine and spiritual life, Eph. ii. 1; compare Eph. i. 19, 20. 2. "Who calleth things which are not as though they were;" that is, creates all things by the word of his power, as in the beginning, Gen. i. 3; 2 Cor. iv. 6. The justification and salvation of sinners, the espousing of the Gentiles that had not been a people, were a gracious calling of things which are not as though they were, giving being to things that were not. This expresses the sovereignty of God and his absolute power and dominion, a mighty stay to faith when all other props sink and totter. It is the holy wisdom and policy of faith to fasten particularly on that in God which is accommodated to the difficulties wherewith it is to wrestle, and will most effectually answer the objections. It is faith indeed to build upon the all-sufficiency of God for the accomplishment of that which is impossible to any thing but that all-sufficiency. Thus Abraham became "the father of many nations before him whom he believed," that is, in the eye and account of God; or 'like him whom he believed;' as God was a common Father, so was Abraham. It is by faith in God that we become accepted of him and conformable to him.

Secondly. How he believed. He here greatly magnifies the strength of Abraham's faith, in several expressions. 1. "Against hope, he believed in hope," ver. 18. There was a hope against him, a natural hope. All the arguments of sense, and reason, and experience, which in such cases usually beget and support hope, were against him; no second causes smiled upon him, nor in the least favoured his hope. But against all those inducements to the contrary he believed, for he had a hope for him; "He believed in hope," which arose, as his faith did, from the consideration of God's all-sufficiency. "That he might become the father of many nations." Therefore God, by his almighty grace, enabled him thus to believe against hope, that he might pass for a pattern of great and strong faith to all generations. It was fit that he who was to be the father of the faithful should have something more than ordinary in his faith; that in him faith should be set in its highest elevation, and so the endeavours of all succeeding believers be directed, raised, and quickened. Or this is mentioned as the matter of the promise that he believed; and he refers to Gen. xv. 5, "So shall thy seed be," as the stars of heaven, so innumerable, so illustrious. This was that which he believed, when it was counted to him for righteousness, ver. 6. And it is observable that this particular instance of his faith was against hope, against the surmises and suggestions of his unbelief. He had just before been concluding hardly that he should go childless, that one born in his house was his heir, ver. 2, 3; and this unbelief was a foil to his faith, and bespeaks it a believing against hope. 2. "Being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body," ver. 19. Observe, His own body was now dead, become utterly unlikely to beget a child, though the new life and vigour that God gave him continued after Sarah was dead, witness his children by Keturah. When God intends some special blessing, some child of promise, for his people, he commonly puts a sentence of death upon the blessing itself, and upon all the ways that lead to it. Joseph must be enslaved and imprisoned before he be advanced. But Abraham did not consider this, οὐ κατενόησεν, "he did not dwell in his thoughts upon it." He said indeed, "Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old," Gen. xvii. 17. But that was the language of his admiration, and his desire to be farther satisfied, not of his doubting and distrust; his faith passed by that consideration, and thought of nothing but the faithfulness of the promise, with the contemplation whereof he was swallowed up, and this kept up his faith. "Being not weak in faith, he considered not." It is mere weakness of faith that makes a man lie poring upon the difficulties and seeming impossibilities that lie in the way of a promise. Though it may seem to be the wisdom and policy of carnal reason, yet it is the weakness of faith, to look into the bottom of all the difficulties that arise against the promise. 3. "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief," ver. 20; and he therefore staggered not because he considered not the frowns and discouragements of second causes; οὐ διεκρίθη, "he disputed not;" he did not hold any self-consultation about it, did not take time to consider whether he should close with it or no, did not hesitate or stumble at it, but, by a resolute and pre-emptory act of his soul, with a holy boldness ventured all upon the promise. He took it not for a point that would admit of argument or debate, but presently determined it as a ruled case, did not at all hang in suspense about it; "he staggered not through unbelief." Unbelief is at the bottom of all our staggerings at God's promises. It is not the promise that fails, but our faith that fails when we stagger. 4. He "was strong in faith, giving glory to God;" ἐνδυναμώθη, "he was strengthened" in faith, his faith "got ground by exercise," creciti eundo. Though weak faith shall not be rejected, the bruised reed not broken, the smoking flax not quenched, yet strong faith shall be commended and honoured. The strength of his faith appeared in the victory it won over his fears. And hereby he gave glory to God; for as unbelief dishonours God by making him a liar, 1 Jno. v. 10, so faith honours God by setting to its seal that he is true, Jno. iii. 33. Abraham's faith gave God the glory of his wisdom, power, holiness, goodness, and especially of his faithfulness, resting upon the word that he had spoken. Among men we say, "He that trusts another gives him credit, and honours him by taking his word;" thus Abraham gave glory to God by trusting him. We never heard our Lord Jesus commending any thing so much as great faith, Mat. viii. 10, and xv. 28; therefore God gives honour to faith, great faith, because faith, great faith, gives honour to God. 5. He was "fully persuaded that what God had promised he was able also to perform;" πληροθυμώμενος, "was carried on with the greatest confidence" and assurance; it is a metaphor taken from ships that come into the harbour with full sail. Abraham saw the storms of doubts, and fears, and temptations likely to rise against the promise, upon which many a one would have shrunk back, and lain by for fairer days, and waited a smiling gale of sense and reason. But Abraham, having taken God for his pilot, and the promise for his card and compass, resolves to weather his point, and, like a bold adventurer, sets up all his sails, breaks through all the difficulties, regards neither winds, nor clouds, but trusts to the strength of his bottom and the wisdom and faithfulness of his pilot, and bravely makes to the harbour, and comes home an unspeakable gainer. Such was his full persuasion, and it was built on the omnipotence of God; "He was able." Our waverings rise mainly from our distrust of the Divine power; and therefore to fix us it is requisite we believe, not only that he is faithful, but that he is able that hath promised. "And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness," ver. 22. Because with such a confidence he ventured his all in the Divine promise, God graciously accepted him, and not only answered, but outdid his expectation. This way of glorifying God by a firm reliance on his bare promise was so very agreeable to God's design, and so very conducive to his honour, that he graciously accepted it as a righteousness, and justified him, though there was not that in the thing itself which could merit such an acceptance. This shews why faith is chosen to be the prime condition of our justification, because it is a grace that of all others gives glory to God.

[It is common in Scripture to put the act for the object, especially with regard to faith and hope. And that this is the sense in which we are to understand the apostle when he says here, and ver. 5, that Abraham's believing and his faith were counted for righteousness, appears from its being opposed to our works, and from the reward being reckoned of grace and not of debt. Whereas the act of faith itself is as much a work as any other duty commanded in the moral law, and were that to be reckoned to us for righteousness, the reward in justifying us would be a debt, due to us on account of our having performed that work, as a servant's wages are for having done his master's business. We find Abraham's faith had reference to Christ the promised Seed, and to what should be done by him, that all nations might be blessed in him. What is here called faith's being imputed or counted for righteousness, is in the next chapter, ver. 2—11, 18, 19, called being justified by Christ's blood, and reconciled to God by the death of his Son, by whom we have received the atonement, and the righteousness of Christ coming upon us unto justification, and our being made or constituted righteous by his obedience. The typical sacrifices were spoken of as accepted for, or imputed to, the offerers to make atonement for them, or not, according as they were or were not presented to God, in the way of his appointment, Lev. i. 4; vii. 18; xxii. 25.—Guyse.—When believers are justified by faith, "their faith being counted for righteousness," their faith does not justify them as a part, small or great, of their righteousness; but as the appointed means of uniting them to Him who has chosen, as the name whereby he shall be called, "the Lord our Righteousness." And this is a fit appointment, even according to what we can see of it; for if we are to be justified altogether by another's merits, and not in any degree by our own, cordial trust in that Being, and a hearty renunciation of all trust in ourselves, would seem to be the precise state of mind to which an efficacious interest in those merits ought to be annexed. Now, whether this be an act of the mind or not, would not seem of much importance; so long as it is so clearly distinguished from all other acts, and so clearly fitted for its place in the free justification of sinners.—O'Brien, Bishop of Ossory. Quoted in Religious Tract Society's Commentary.]

23 Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; 24 But for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; 25 Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.

In the close of the chapter he applies all to us; and, having abundantly proved that Abraham was justified by faith, he here concludes that his justification was to be the pattern or sampler of ours; "It was not written for his sake alone." It was not intended only for an historical commendation of Abraham, or a relation of something peculiar to him,—as some antipedobaptists will needs understand that circumcision was "a seal of the righteousness of the faith" (ver. 11) only to Abraham himself, and no other;—no, the Scripture did not intend hereby to describe some singular way of justification that belonged to Abraham as his prerogative. The accounts we have of the Old Testament saints were not intended for histories only, barely to inform and divert us, but for precedents to direct us, for examples (1 Cor. x. 11) for our learning, ch. xv. 4. And this particularly concerning Abraham was written for us also, to assure us what that righteousness is which God requireth and accepteth to our salvation,—for us also, that are mean and vile, that come so far short of Abraham in privileges and performances,—us Gentiles as well as the Jews, for the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles through Christ,—for us on whom the ends of the world are come, as well as for the patriarchs; for the grace of God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. His application of it is but short. Only we may observe,

First. Our common privilege; it shall be imputed to us, that is, righteousness shall. The gospel way of justification is by an imputed righteousness, μέλλει λογίζεσθαι,—"it shall be imputed;" he uses a future verb to signify the continuation of this mercy in the church, that as it is the same now so it will be while God has a church in the world, and there are any of the children of men to be justified; for there is a fountain opened that is inexhaustible.

Secondly. Our common duty, the condition of this privilege, and that is believing. The proper object of this believing is a Divine revelation. The revelation to Abraham was concerning a Christ to come, the revelation to us is concerning a Christ already come, which difference in the revelation does not alter the case. Abraham believed the power of God in raising up an Isaac from the dead womb of Sarah; we are to believe the same power exerted in a higher instance, the resurrection of Christ from the dead. The resurrection of Isaac was in a figure, Heb. xi. 19, the resurrection of Christ was real. Now we are to believe on him that raised up Christ; not only believe his power, that he could do it, but depend upon his grace in raising up Christ as our surety; so he explains it, ver. 25, where we have a brief account of the meaning of Christ's death and resurrection, which are the two main hinges on which the door of salvation turns. 1. He "was delivered for our offences." God the Father delivered him, he delivered up himself as a sacrifice for sin. He died indeed as a malefactor, because he died for sin; but it was not his own sin, but the sins of the people. He died to make atonement for our sins, to expiate our guilt, to satisfy Divine justice. 2. He was "raised again for our justification," for the perfecting and completing of our justification. By the merit of his death he paid our debt, in his resurrection he took out our acquaintance. When he was buried he lay a prisoner in execution for our debt, which as a surety he had undertaken to pay; on the third day an angel was sent to roll away the stone, and so to discharge the prisoner, which was the greatest assurance possible that Divine justice was satisfied, the debt paid, or else he would never have released tion of grace under the figure of a place of safety into which a Christian man enters, in which he abides, and out of which he must take heed lest he fall, is found, for example, in Gal. v. 4 and 1 Pet. v. 12" (Vaughan). "We rejoice;" rather, "we glory, or triumph." This gains significance by comparing chaps. ii. 17, iii. 27, and iv. 2. "In tribulations;" literally, "in the tribulations"—i.e., "those which we shall meet with: we glory also, or better, even in these, because we know," &c. In the words which follow Alford substitutes "endurance" for "patience," and "approval" for "experience." The sorrow of the world worketh death, or despondency, which is death to the spirit. Suffering works to the Christian a higher hopefulness, because an educated trust. (Compare Hos. ii. 15.)

v. 6. "Without strength;" weak or powerless to obey or please God. (Compare chap. viii. 3; Ezek. xvi. 6.) "In due time;" at the fulness of time, as Gal. iv. 4; Eph. i. 10. "For the ungodly;" we should have expected the apostle to say "for us;" but he says "for the prisoner; and therefore the apostle puts a special emphasis on Christ's resurrection; "It is Christ that died, yea rather, that has risen again," ch. viii. 34.

["And was raised again for our justification," that is, that we might be justified. The resurrection of Christ was necessary for our justification, inasmuch as it was the formal acceptance of his sufferings, as the expiation for our sins. Had he not risen we should yet be under condemnation, 1 Cor. xv. 17. But as he rose from the dead he was accepted of the Father, and appeared as the firstfruits; that is, the forerunner and pledge of the resurrection, and complete salvation of all his people. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the apostle presents this idea under another form. As it was necessary, on the great day of atonement, that the high priest should not only slay the victim at the altar, but enter into the most holy place, and sprinkle the blood upon the mercy-seat, so our high priest, having suffered in the outer court, has passed into the heavens with his own blood, there to appear for our justification; that is, to secure for us the continued application of the merits of his death. Either, therefore, as the evidence of the acceptance of his sufferings as our substitute, or as a necessary step towards securing the application of their merit to our benefit, the resurrection of Christ was essential to our justification.—H.]

So that upon the whole matter it is very evident that we are not justified by the merit of our own works, but by a fiducial obdiential dependence upon Jesus Christ and his righteousness, as the condition on our part of our right to impunity and salvation, which was the truth that Paul in this and the foregoing chapter had been fixing as the great spring and foundation of all our comfort.

[Under the law, obedience would have been that personal thing in us which stood connected with our right to eternal life. Under the Gospel, faith is that personal thing in us which stands connected with this right; but just as the act of stretching forth his hand to the offered alms is that personal doing of the mendicant that stands connected with his possession of the money received by him. Any other view of faith than that which excludes boasting must be altogether unscriptural, and will mislead the inquirer, and may involve his mind in much darkness, and in very serious difficulties. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of faith. It is of faith that it might be by grace—not that it might be a thing of merit, but a thing of freeness—a present. We are saved by grace through faith. Conceive it a question, whether a dwelling house is enlightened by a candle from within or by an open window. The answer may justly enough be, that it is by the window—and yet the window does not enlighten the house. It is the sun which enlightens it. The window is a mere opening for the transmission of that which is from without. Christ hath wrought out a righteousness for us that is freely offered to us of God. By faith we discern the reality of this offer; and all that it does is to strike out, as it were, an avenue of conveyance, by which the righteousness of another passes to us; and through faith we are saved by this righteousness.—C.]

CHAPTER V.

The apostle, having made good his point, and fully proved justification by faith. "In this chapter proceeds in the explication, illustration, and application of that truth. 1. He shews the fruits of justification, ver. 1–5. 2. He shews the fountain and foundation of justification in the death of Jesus Christ, which he discourses of at large in the rest of the chapter.

HEREFORE being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: 2 By whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. 3 And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience; 4 And patience, experience; and experience, hope: 5 And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.

The precious benefits and privileges which flow from justification are such as should quicken us all to give diligence to make it sure to ourselves that we are justified, and then to take the comfort it renders to us, and to do the duty it calls for from us. The fruits of this tree of life are exceedingly precious.

First, "We have peace with God," ver. 1. It is sin that breeds the quarrel between us and God, creates not only a strangeness, but an enmity; the holy righteous God cannot in honour be at peace with a sinner while he continues under the guilt of sin. Justification takes away the guilt, and so makes way for peace. And such are the benignity and good-will of God to man that, immediately upon the removing of that obstacle, the peace is made. By faith we lay hold of God's arm, and of his strength, and so are at peace, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5. There is more in this peace than barely a cessation of enmity; there is friendship and lovingkindness, for God is either the worst enemy or the best friend. Abraham, being justified by faith, was called "the friend of God," Jas. ii. 23, which was his honour, but not his peculiar honour; Christ has called his disciples friends, Jno. xv. 13–15. And surely a man needs no more to make him happy than to have God his friend! But this is "through our Lord Jesus Christ," through him as the great peacemaker, the "Mediator between God and man," that blessed Daysman that has laid his hand upon us both. Adam, in innocence, had peace with God immediately; there needed no such mediator. But to guilty sinful man it is a very dreadful thing to think of God out of Christ; for he is our peace, Eph. ii. 14, not only the maker, but the matter and maintainer of our peace, Col. i. 20.

Secondly, "We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand," ver. 2. This is a farther privilege, not only peace, but grace, "this grace," that is, this favour. Observe, 1. The saints' happy state. It is a state of grace, God's lovingkindness to us, and our conformity to God; he that hath God's love and God's likeness is in a state of grace. Now into this grace we have access, προσπαύμεν,—"an introduction," which implies that we were not born in this state; we are

"by nature children of wrath," and "the carnal mind is enmity against God;" but we are brought into it. We could not have got into it of ourselves, nor have conquered the difficulties in the way, but we have a manuduction, a leading by the hand,—are led into it as blind, or lame, or weak people are led,—are introduced as pardoned offenders,—are introduced by some favourite at court to kiss the king's hand, as strangers, that are to have audience, are conducted. προσπαύμεν εὐχρησται,—"We have had access." He speaks of those that have been already brought out of a state of nature into a state of grace. Paul, in his conversion, had this access; then he was made nigh. Barnabas introduced him to the apostles, Acts ix. 27, and there were others that led him by the hand to Damascus, ver. 8, but it was Christ that introduced and led him by the hand into this grace. "By whom we have access by faith." By Christ as the author and principal agent, by faith as the means of this access; not by Christ in consideration of any merit or desert of ours, but in consideration of our believing dependence upon him, and resignation of ourselves to him.

[It would seem obvious, from the use of the word "also," that this verse expresses a distinct idea from the preceding. The most common and natural construction of this passage is to connect the word grace with access, that is, "access into this grace." Grace then, or favour, expresses the same idea as peace with God in the preceding verse; and the difference between the two verses is to be found in the word access or introduction. The meaning then is, "We are not only indebted to Jesus Christ for peace with God, but also for our introduction into this state of favour," which includes, of course, liberty of access to God.—H.]

2. Their happy standing in this state; "Wherein we stand." Not only wherein we are, but wherein we stand, a posture that denotes our discharge from guilt; we stand in the judgment, Ps. i. 5, not cast, as convicted criminals, but our dignity and honour secured,—not thrown to the ground, as abjects. The phrase denotes also our progress; while we stand, we are going. We must not lie down, as if we had already attained, but stand as those that are pressing forward, stand as servants attending on Christ our Master. The phrase denotes, farther, our perseverance: we stand firmly and safely, upheld by the power of God; stand as soldiers stand that keep their ground, not borne down by the power of the enemy. It denotes not only our admission to, but our confirmation in, the favour of God. It is not in the court of heaven as in earthly courts, where high places are slippery places; but we stand in an humble confidence "of this very thing, that he who has begun the good work will perform it." Phil. i. 6.

[The word "wherein" must refer to grace, the immediate antecedent, and not to faith, the more remote one. The figurative language here used is peculiarly expressive and appropriate. As those only who were in the favour of ancient monarchs could freely approach them, and even such had generally to be led forward by an 'introducer;' so Christ, our introducer, secures access for us into the favour and presence of God. We come not of ourselves, but, abashed and humbled, are led along by our kind Mediator.—H.]

Thirdly, We "rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Besides the happiness in hand, there is a happiness in hope, "the glory of God," the glory which God will put upon the saints in heaven, glory which will consist in the vision and fruition of God. 1. Those, and those only, that have access by faith into the grace of God now, may hope for the glory of God hereafter. There is no good hope of glory but what is founded in grace; grace is glory begun, the earnest and assurance of glory; "He will give grace and glory," Ps. lxxxiv. 11. 2. Those who hope for the glory of God hereafter have enough to rejoice in now. It is the duty of those that hope for heaven to rejoice in that hope.

Fourthly, "We glory in tribulations also;" not only notwithstanding our tribulations (these do not hinder our rejoicing in hope of the glory of God,) but even in our tribulations, as they are working for us the weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17. Observe, What a growing increasing happiness the happiness of the saints is; "Not only so." One would think such peace, such grace, such glory, and such a joy in hope of it, were more than such poor undeserving creatures as we are could pretend to; and yet it is "not only so." There are more instances of our happiness. "We glory in tribulations also," especially tribulations for righteousness' sake, which seemed the greatest objection against the saints' happiness, whereas really their happiness did not only consist with, but take rise from, those tribulations; "They rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer," Acts v. 41. This being the hardest point, he sets himself to shew the grounds and reasons of it. How come we to glory in tribulations? Why, because tribulations, by a chain of causes, greatly befriending hope, which he shews in the method of its influence. 1. "Tribulation worketh patience," not in and of itself, but the powerful grace of God working in and with the tribulation. It proves, and by proving improves, patience, as parts and gifts increase by exercise. It is not the efficient cause, but yields the occasion, as steel is hardened by the fire. See how God brings meat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong. That which worketh patience is matter of joy; for patience does us more good than tribulations can do us hurt. "Tribulation in itself worketh impatience; but, as it is sanctified to the saints, it worketh patience." 2. "Patience, experience," ver. 4. It works an experience of God, and the songs he gives in the night. The patient sufferers have the greatest experience of the Divine consolations, which abound as afflictions abound. It works an experience of ourselves. It is by tribulation that we make an experiment of our own sincerity, and therefore such tribulations are called trials. It works, δοκιμῆς,—"an approbation," as he is approved that has passed the test. Thus Job's tribulation wrought patience, and that patience produced an approbation, that still he holds fast his integrity, Job ii. 3. 3. "Experience, hope." He who, being thus tried, comes forth as gold, will thereby be encouraged to hope. This experiment, or approbation, is not so much the ground as the evidence of our hope, and a special friend to it. Experience of God is a prop to our hope; he that hath delivered doth and will. Experience of ourselves helps to evidence our sincerity. 4. This "hope maketh not ashamed;" that is, it is a hope that will not deceive us. Nothing confounds more than disappointment. Everlasting shame and confusion will be caused by the perishing of the expectation of the wicked, "but the hope of the righteous shall be gladness," Psa. x. 28; see Psa. xxii. 5; lxxi. 1. Or, it maketh not ashamed of our sufferings. Though we are counted as the offscouring of all things, and trodden under foot as the mire in the streets, yet, having hopes of glory, we are not ashamed of these sufferings. It is in a good cause, for a good Master, and in good hope, and therefore we are not ashamed. We will never think ourselves disparaged by sufferings that are likely to end so well. "Because the love of God is shed abroad." This hope will not disappoint us, because it is sealed with the Holy Spirit as a spirit of love. It is the gracious work of the blessed Spirit to shed abroad the love of God in the hearts of all the saints. "The love of God," that is, the sense of God's love to us, drawing out love in us to him again. Or, the great effects of his love: 1st. Special grace; and, 2nd. The pleasant gust or sense of it. It is shed abroad, "as sweet ointment, perfuming the soul, as rain watering it and making it fruitful. The ground of all our comfort and holiness, and perseverance in both, is laid in the shinning abroad of the love of God in our hearts; it is this which constrains us, 2 Cor. v. 14. Thus are we drawn and held by the bonds of love. Sense of God's love to us will make us not ashamed either of our hope in him or our sufferings for him.

the ungodly," to heighten the contrast here and in verse 7, where he speaks of "a good man."

v. 8. "Commendeth:" or, rather, "gives proof of," "establishes," "Yet sinners" stands in contrast to the "now justified" of verse 9.

v. 9, 10. "Much more:" St. Paul argues from the greater to the less here, as in chap. viii. 32. "By his blood:" the preposition is "in" ("in his blood"), and expresses, says Dr. Vaughan, the idea of our justification or absolution having been, as it were, contained in the blood, the outpoured life-blood of Christ. "We shall be saved:" the salvation here spoken of is from "wrath"—literally, "the wrath;" i.e., "the wrath to come," as in 1 Thess. i. 10. "By his life:" here, too, the preposition is "in;" "we shall be saved in his life; for he is our life." (Compare John xiv. 19; 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11.)

v. 11. "We have now received:" "now" in contrast with the future glory spoken of in verse 2, and the future salvation (verse 9). "Received:" a single act, probably referring to the individual appro-

6 For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. 7 For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. 8 But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. 9 Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. 10 For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. 11 And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement. 12 Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: 13 (For until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. 14 Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come. 15 But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many. 16 And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. 17 For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.) 18 Therefore as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. 19 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. 20 Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound: 21 That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle here describes the fountain and foundation of justification, laid in the death of the Lord Jesus. The streams are very sweet, but if you run them up to the spring-head, you will find it to be Christ's dying for us; it is in the precious stream of Christ's blood that all these privileges come flowing to us; and therefore he enlarges upon this instance of the love of God which is shed abroad. Three things he takes notice of for the explication and illustration of this doctrine: 1. The persons he died for, ver. 6-8. 2. The precious fruits of his death, ver. 9-11. 3. The parallel he runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, ver. 12, to the end.

First. The character we were under when Christ died for us.

1. "We were without strength," ver. 6; in a sad condition; and, which is worse, altogether unable to help ourselves out of that condition—lost, and no visible way open for our recovery; our condition deplorable, and in a manner desperate; and therefore our salvation is here said to come "in due time." God's time to help and save is when those that are to be saved are without strength, that his own power and grace may be the more magnified, Deu. xxxii. 36. It is the manner of God to help at a dead lift.

2. He "died for the ungodly;" not only helpless creatures, and therefore likely to perish, but guilty sinful creatures, and therefore deserving to perish; not only mean and worthless, but vile and obnoxious, unworthy of such favour with the holy God. Being ungodly, they had need of one to die for them, to satisfy for guilt, and to bring in a righteousness. This he illustrates (ver. 7, 8,) as an unparalleled instance of love; herein God's thoughts and ways were above ours: compare Jno. xv. 13, 14, "Greater love has no man." 1st. One would hardly die for a righteous man, that is, an innocent man, one that is unjustly condemned; every body will pity such a one, but few will put such a value upon his life as either to hazard, or much less to deposit, their own in his stead. 2nd. It may be, one might perhaps be persuaded to die for a good man, that is, a useful man, who is more than barely a righteous man. Many that are good themselves yet do but little good to others; but those that are useful commonly get themselves well-beloved, and meet with some that in a case of necessity would venture to be their ἀντιψυχοί,—"would engage life for life," would be their bail, body for body. Paul was, in this sense, a very good man, one that was very useful, and he met with some that for his life laid down their own necks, ch. xvi. 4; and yet observe how he qualifies this: it is but some that would do so, and it is a daring act if they do it,—it must be some bold venturing soul; and, after all, it is but a peradventure, 3rd. But Christ died for sinners, ver. 8, neither righteous nor good; not only such as were useless but such as were guilty and obnoxious; not only such as there would be no loss of should they perish, but such whose destruction would greatly redound to the glory of God's justice, being malefactors and criminals that ought to die. Some think he alludes to a common distinction the Jews had of their people into צדיקים—"righteous," חוטאים—"merciful" (compare Isa. lvii. 1), and רשעים—"wicked." Now herein "God commended his love," not only proved or evidenced his love, (he might have done that at a cheaper rate,) but magnified it and made it illustrious. This circumstance did greatly magnify and advance his love, not only put it past dispute, but rendered it the object of the greatest wonder and admiration; "Now my creatures shall see that I love them, I will give them such an instance of it as shall be without parallel." "Commendeth his love," as merchants commend their goods when they would put them off. This commending of his love was in order to the shedding abroad of his love in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. He evinces his love in the most winning, affecting, endearing way imaginable. "While we were yet sinners," implying that we were not to be always sinners, there should be a change wrought; for he died to save us, not in our sins, but from our sins; but we were yet sinners when he died for us. 4th. Nay, which is more, "we were enemies," ver. 10; not only malefactors, but traitors and rebels, in arms against the government; the worst kind of malefactors, and of all malefactors the most obnoxious. The carnal mind is not only an enemy to God, but enmity itself, ch. viii. 7; Col. i. 21. This enmity is a mutual enmity; God loathing the sinner and the sinner loathing God, Zec. xi. 8; and that for such as these Christ should die is such a mystery, such a paradox, such an unprecedented instance of love, that it may well be our business to eternity to adore and wonder at it. This is a commendation of love indeed. Justly might he who had thus loved us make it one of the laws of his kingdom that we should love our enemies.

Secondly. The precious fruits of his death.

1. Justification and reconciliation are the first and primary fruit of the death of Christ; "We are justified by his blood, ver. 9; reconciled by his death," ver. 10. Sin is pardoned, the sinner accepted as righteous, the quarrel taken up, the enmity slain, an end made of iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. This is done, that is, Christ has done all that was requisite on his part to be done in order hereunto, and, immediately upon our believing we are actually put into a state of justification and reconciliation. "Justified by his blood." Our justification is ascribed to the blood of Christ, because "without blood there is no remission," Heb. ix. 22. "The blood is the life," and that must go to make atonement. In all the propitiatory sacrifices, the sprinkling of the blood was of the essence of the sacrifice. It was "the blood that made an atonement for the soul," Lev. xvii. 11.

2. Hence results salvation from wrath; "Saved from wrath," (ver. 9,) "saved by his life," ver. 10. When that which hinders our salvation is taken away, the salvation must needs follow. Nay, the argument holds very strongly; if God justified and reconciled us when we were enemies, and put himself to so much charge to do it, much more will he save us when we are justified and reconciled. He that has done the greater, which is of enemies to make us friends, will certainly do the less, which is when we are friends to use us friendly and to be kind to us; and therefore the apostle, once and again, speaks of it with a "much more." He that hath digged so deep to lay the foundation will no doubt build upon that foundation. "We shall be saved from wrath" from hell and damnation. It is the wrath of God that is the fire of hell; "the wrath to come," so it is called, 1 Thes. i. 10. The final justification and absolution of believers at the great day, together with the fitting and preparing of them for it, are the salvation from wrath here spoken of; it is the perfecting of the work of grace. "Reconciled by his death, saved by his life." His life here spoken of is not to be understood of his life in the flesh, but his life in heaven, that life which ensued after his death: compare ch. xiv. 9; "He was dead, and is alive," Rev. i. 18. We are reconciled by Christ humbled, we are saved by Christ exalted. The dying Jesus laid the foundation, in satisfying for sin, and slaying the enmity, and so making us salvageable; thus is the partition wall broken down, atonement made, and the attainer reversed; but it is the living Jesus that perfects the work: "he lives to make intercession," Heb. vii. 25. It is Christ, in his exaltation, that by his word and Spirit effectually calls, and changes, and reconciles us to God, is our Advocate with the Father, and so completes and consummates our salvation: compare ch. iv. 25; viii. 34. Christ dying was the testator, who bequeathed us the legacy; but Christ living is the executor, who pays it. Now the arguing is very strong. He that puts himself to the charge of purchasing our salvation will not decline the trouble of applying it.

[The death of a crucified Saviour, when beheld under such a view, is the firm stepping-stone to confidence in a risen Saviour. You may learn from it, that his desire and your salvation are most thoroughly at one. Of his good-will to have you into heaven he has given the strongest pledge and demonstration, by consecrating, with his own blood, a way of access, through which sinners may draw nigh; and now that, as our forerunner, he is already there—now that he has gone up again to the place from which he arose—now that, to the very place which he left to die, and that, that the barrier to its entrance from our world may be moved away, he has ascended alive and in glory, without another death to endure, for death has no more the dominion over him—will ever he do any thing to close that entrance which it has cost him so much to open? Will he thus throw away the toil and the travail of his own soul, and reduce to impotency that apparatus of reconciliation which he himself has reared, and at an expense too, equal to the penance of many millions through eternity? What he died to begin will he not now live to carry forward, and will not the love which could force a way through the grave to its accomplishments—now that it has reached the summit of triumph and of elevation which he at present occupies, burst forth and around the field of that mighty enterprise, which was begun in deepest suffering, and will end in full and finished glory?—C.]

3. All this produces, as a farther privilege, our joy in God, ver. 11. God is now so far from being a terror to us that he is our joy, and our hope in the day of evil, Jer. xvii. 17; we are reconciled and saved from wrath. Iniquity, blessed be God, shall not be our ruin; and not only so, there is more in it yet, a constant stream of favours. We not only go to heaven, but go to heaven triumphantly; not only get into the harbour, but come in with full sail: "We joy in God," not only saved from his wrath, but solacing ourselves in his love, and this "through Jesus Christ," who is the Alpha and the Omega, the foundation stone and the top stone of all our comforts and hopes, not only our salvation, but our strength and our song; and all this (which he repeats as a string he priation of the atonement, or reconciliation. "We have now received our reconciliation."

v. 12-19. These verses trace the parallel between Christ and Adam. In it both likenesses and contrasts appear. "Christ, like Adam, has become the head and ancestor of a whole race, who are involved in the consequences of his act. Most unlike, indeed, are the two cases: the one an act of transgression, involving judgment and death; the other of obedience, leading to acceptance and life."

v. 17. "Reigned by one . . . in life by one;" translate not "one," but "the one;" so in verse 19. The one and the many are contrasted.

v. 18. The words "judgment came" and "free gift came" are not in the original, but are supplied from verse 16. Alford supplies "the issue was" in both cases.

v. 21. "Unto death;" rather, "in death." Sin was the sovereign, death the kingdom over which sin reigned.

loved to be harping upon) by virtue of the atonement, for by him we Christians, we believers, have now, now in gospel times, or now in this life, "received the atonement," which was typified by the sacrifices under the law, and is an earnest of our happiness in heaven. True believers do by Jesus Christ receive the atonement. Receiving the atonement is our actual reconciliation to God in justification, grounded upon Christ's satisfaction. To receive the atonement is, 1st. To give our consent to the atonement, approving of, and agreeing to, those methods which Infinite Wisdom has taken of saving a guilty world by the blood of a crucified Jesus, being willing and glad to be saved in a gospel way and upon gospel terms. 2nd. To take the comfort of the atonement, which is the fountain and the foundation of our joy in God. Now we joy in God, now we do indeed receive the atonement, καυχόμενοι,—"glorying" in it. God hath received the atonement, Mat. iii. 17; xvii. 5; xviii. 2; if we but receive it the work is done.

Thirdly. The parallel that the apostle runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam (ver. 12, to the end), which not only illustrates the truth he is discoursing of, but tends very much to the commending of the love of God and the comforting of the hearts of true believers, in shewing a correspondence between our fall and our recovery, and not only a like, but a much greater power in the second Adam to make us happy, than there was in the first to make us miserable. Now, for the opening of this observe,

1. A general truth laid down as the foundation of his discourse, that Adam was a type of Christ; ver. 14, "Who is the figure of him that was to come." Christ is therefore called the last Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 45; compare ver. 22. In this Adam was a type of Christ, that in the covenant transactions that were between God and him, and in the consequent events of those transactions, Adam was a public person. God dealt with Adam, and Adam acted, as such a one, as a common father and factor, root and representative, of and for all his posterity; so that what he did in that station, as agent for us, we may be said to have done in him, and what was done to him may be said to have been done to us in him. Thus Jesus Christ, the Mediator, acted as a public person, the head of all the elect, dealt with God for them, as their father, factor, root, and representative—died for them, rose for them, entered within the veil for them, did all for them. When Adam failed, we failed with him; when Christ performed, he performed for us. Thus was Adam τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος,—"the figure of him that was to come," to come to repair that breach which Adam had made.

[The word translated "figure" means properly a print, or impression of any thing, Jno. xx. 25, where it is used of the print of the nails; then more generally an image, model, likeness, type. The simple meaning is, that Adam was like Christ, him that was to come, that is, the Messiah, who is called the second Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 45; and, from the fact that he had been long expected, "He that was to come," Mat. xi. 3. The point of resemblance between Adam and Christ is to be gathered from the context. It is this: each stood as the head and representative of all connected with them. By the offence of the one all connected with him are subject to death; and by the righteousness of the other all connected with him are justified and saved.—H.]

2. A more particular explication of the parallel, in which observe, 1st. How Adam as a public person, communicated sin and death to all his posterity; ver. 12, "By one man sin entered." We see the world under a deluge of sin and death, full of iniquities and full of calamities. Now, it is worth while to inquire what is the spring that feeds it, and you will find it to be the general corruption of nature; and at what gap it entered, and you will find it to have been Adam's first sin. It was by one man, and he the first man, (for if any had been before him they would have been free,) that one man from whom as from the root, we all spring. First. By him sin entered. When God pronounced all very good, Gen. i. 31, there was no sin in the world; it was when Adam ate forbidden fruit that sin made its entry. Sin had before entered into the world of angels, when many of them revolted from their allegiance, and left their first estate; but it never entered into the world of mankind till Adam sinned. Then it entered as an enemy, to kill and destroy, as a thief, to rob and despoil; and a dismal entry it was. Then entered the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to posterity, and a general corruption and depravedness of nature. Ἐφ' ᾧ,—"for that," (so we read it,) rather "in whom, all have sinned." Sin entered into the world by Adam, for in him we all sinned. As, 1 Cor. xv. 22, "in Adam all die," so here, "in him all have sinned;" for it is agreeable to the law of all nations that the acts of a public person be accounted theirs whom they represent; and what a whole body does every member of the same body may be said to do. Now Adam acted thus as a public person, by the sovereign ordination and appointment of God, and yet that founded upon a natural necessity; for God, as the Author of nature, had made this the law of nature, that man should beget in his own likeness, and so the other creatures. In Adam, therefore, as in a common receptacle, the whole nature of man was reposit, from him to flow down in a channel to his posterity; for all mankind are made of one blood, Acts xvii. 26, so that according as this nature proves through his standing or falling, before he puts it out of his hands, accordingly it is propagated from him. Adam therefore sinning and falling, the nature became guilty and corrupt, and is so derived. Thus in him all have sinned. Secondly. "Death by sin," for death is the wages of sin. Sin, when it is finished, brings forth death. When sin came, of course death came with it. Death is here put for all that misery which is the due desert of sin, temporal, spiritual, eternal death. If Adam had not sinned, he had not died; the threatening was, "In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die," Gen. ii. 17. Thirdly. "So death passed," that is, a sentence of death was passed, as upon a criminal, ἀπαθὲν,—"passed through" all men, as an infectious disease passes through a town, so that none escape it. It is the universal fate, without exception: death passes upon all. There are common calamities incident to human life which do abundantly prove this. "Death reigned," ver. 14. He speaks of death as a mighty prince, and his monarchy the most absolute, universal, and lasting monarchy. None are exempted from its sceptre; it is a monarchy that will survive all other earthly rule, authority, and power, for it is the last enemy, 1 Cor. xv. 26. Those sons of Belial that will be subject to no other rule cannot avoid being subject to this. Now all this we may thank Adam for; from him sin and death descend. Well may we say, as that good man, observing the change that a fit of sickness had made in his countenance, "O Adam! what hast thou done?"

Further, to clear this, he shews that sin did not commence with the law of Moses, but was in the world until, or before, that law; therefore that law of Moses is not the only rule of life, for there was a rule, and that rule was transgressed, before the law was given. It likewise intimates that we cannot be justified by our obedience to the law of Moses, any more than we were condemned by and for our disobedience to it. Sin was in the world before the law; witness Cain's murder, the apostasy of the old world, the wickedness of Sodom. His inference hence is, Therefore there was a law; for "sin is not imputed where there is no law." Original sin is a want of conformity to, and actual sin is a transgression of, the law of God: therefore all were under some law. His proof of it is, "Death reigned from Adam to Moses," ver. 14. It is certain that death could not have reigned if sin had not set up the throne for him. This proves that sin was in the world before the law, and original sin, for death reigned over those that had not sinned any actual sin, "that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression," never sinned in their own persons as Adam did—which is to be understood of infants, that were never guilty of actual sin, and yet died, because Adam's sin was imputed to them. This reign of death seems especially to refer to those violent and extraordinary judgments which were long before Moses, as the deluge, and the destruction of Sodom, which involved infants. It is a great proof of original sin that little children, who were never guilty of any actual transgression, are yet liable to very terrible diseases, casualties, and deaths, which could by no means be reconciled with the justice and righteousness of God if they were not chargeable with guilt.

[The simple doctrine and argument of the apostle is, that there are penal evils which come upon men antecedently to any transgressions of their own; and, as the infliction of these evils implies a violation of law, it follows that they are regarded and treated as sinners on the ground of the disobedience of another. In other words, that it was by the offence of one man that judgment came on all men to condemnation. It is of course not implied in this statement or argument, that men are not now, or were not from Adam to Moses, punishable for their own sins, but simply that they are subject to penal evils which cannot be accounted for on the ground of their personal transgressions. This statement, which contains the whole doctrine of imputation, is so obviously contained in the argument of the apostle, and stands out so conspicuously in the Bible, and is so fully established by the history of the world, that it is frequently and freely admitted by the great majority of commentators.—H.]

2nd. How, in correspondence to this, Christ, as a public person, communicates righteousness and life to all true believers, who are his spiritual seed. And in this he shews not only wherein the resemblance holds, but ex abundanti, wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ "goes beyond" the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam. Observe,

First. Wherein the resemblance holds. This is laid down most fully, ver. 18, 19. 1st. "By the offence and disobedience of one man were made sinners, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation." Here observe, (1.) That Adam's sin was disobedience, disobedience to a plain and express command; and it was a command of trial. The thing he did was therefore evil because it was forbidden, and not otherwise; but this opened the door to other sins, though itself seemingly small. (2.) That the malignity and poison of sin are very strong and spreading, else the guilt of Adam's sin would not have reached so far, nor have been so deep and long a stream. Who would think there should be so much evil in sin? (3.) That by Adam's sin many are made sinners; many, that is, all his posterity; said to be many, in opposition to the one that offended. "Made sinners," καταστήσαντες. It denotes the making of us such by a judicial act: we were cast as sinners by due course of law. (4.) That judgment is come to condemnation upon all those that by Adam's disobedience were made sinners. Being convicted, we are condemned. All the race of mankind lie under a sentence, like an attainder upon a family. There is judgment given and recorded against us in the court of heaven; and, if the judgment be not reversed, we are likely to sink under it to eternity.

2nd. In like manner, "by the righteousness and obedience of one" (and that one is Jesus Christ, the second Adam) "are many made righteous," and so "the free gift comes upon all." It is observable how the apostle inculcates this truth, and repeats it again and again, as a truth of very great consequence. Here observe, (1.) The nature of Christ's righteousness, how it is brought in; it is by his obedience. The disobedience of the first Adam ruined us, the obedience of the second Adam saves us,—his obedience to the law of mediation, which was that he should fulfil all righteousness, and then make his soul an offering for sin. By his obedience to this law he wrought out a righteousness for us, satisfied God's justice, and so made a way for us into his favour. (2.) The fruit of it. (1st.) There is a "free gift come upon all men," that is, it is made and offered promiscuously to all. The salvation wrought is a common salvation; the proposals are general, the tender free; whoever will may come, and take of these waters of life. This free gift is to all believers, upon their believing, "unto justification of life." It is not only a justification that frees from death, but that entitles to life. (2nd.) "Many shall be made righteous," many compared with one, or as many as belong to the election of grace, which, though but a few as they are scattered up and down in the world, yet will be a great many were they come all together. Καταστήσαντες,—"they shall be constituted" righteous, as by letters patent. Now the antithesis between these two, our ruin by Adam and our recovery by Christ, is obvious enough.

Secondly. Wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam; and this he shews, ver. 15–17. It is designed for the magnifying of the riches of Christ's love, and for the comfort and encouragement of believers, who, considering what a wound Adam's sin has made, might begin to despair of a proportionable remedy. His expressions are a little intricate, but this he seems to intend. 1st. If guilt and wrath be communicated, much more shall grace and love; for it is agreeable to the idea we have of the Divine goodness to suppose that he should be more ready to save upon an imputed righteousness than to condemn upon an imputed guilt; "Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace." God's goodness is, of all his attributes, in a special manner his glory, and it is that grace that is the root, (his favour to us in Christ,) and the gift is by grace. We know that God is rather inclined to shew mercy; punishing is his strange work. 2nd. If there was so much power and efficacy, as it seems there was, in the sin of a man, who was of the earth, earthy, to condemn us, much more are there power and efficacy in the righteousness and grace of Christ, who is the Lord from heaven, to justify and save us. The one man that saves us is Jesus Christ. Surely Adam could not propagate so strong a poison, but Jesus Christ could propagate as strong an antidote, and much stronger. 3rd. It is but the guilt of one single offence of Adam's that is laid to our charge; "The judgment was" ἐξ ἑνός ἐκ κατακρίμα "by one," that is, by one offence, ver. 16, 17, margin. But from Jesus Christ we receive and derive an "abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness." The stream of grace and righteousness is deeper and broader than the stream of guilt; for this righteousness does not only take away the guilt of that one offence, but of many other offences, even of all. God in Christ forgives all trespasses, Col. ii. 13. 4th. By Adam's sin "death reigned;" but by Christ's righteousness there is not only a period put to the reign of death, but believers are preferred to "reign in life," ver. 17. In and by the righteousness of Christ we have not only a charter of pardon, but a patent of honour, are not only freed from our chains, but, like Joseph, advanced to the second chariot, and made unto our God kings and priests—not only pardoned, but preferred. See this observed, Rev. i. 5, 6; v. 9, 10. We are by Christ and his righteousness entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges than we lost by the offence of Adam. The plaster is wider than the wound, and more healing than the wound is killing.

[The words "righteousness unto eternal life" should not be separated by a comma, as is commonly done in our Bibles. And the word translated righteousness should be rendered justification, as appears by a comparison with the preceding verses. "Justification unto eternal life" is the same with the "justification of life," in ver. 18; both expressions mean "that justification which is connected with eternal life." It will be remarked, that these words answer to the death spoken of in the preceding clause. As death is the consequence and attendant of sin, so the justification of life is the consequence and attendant of the grace of the Gospel. "By Jesus Christ our Lord." To him, and him alone, vi. 1. The design of the chapter is to show the moral effects of justification by faith. The gratuitous acceptance of man apart from works might appear to sanction a continuance in sin, since the increase of sin would be the magnifying of grace. (Compare chap. v. 20.) This difficulty St. Paul meets by showing that life in Christ is death to sin.

vi. 2. "That are dead to sin:" render "died." The reference is to a particular time—viz., when Christ died. The Christian is reckoned to have passed through death to life (compare chap. v. 11); to be one with Christ, crucified with him. (Compare 2 Cor. v. 15; Gal. ii. 20; Col. iii. 3.) Alford refers the time when this took place to the time of baptism. This, it is true, was with the converted heathen the moment of personal acknowledgment and appropriation of it, as indicated in verses 3, 4; but this derives its force from the death of Christ.

vi. 4. "Buried:" if baptised into Christ's death, our baptism was do we owe it that the reign of sin and death has not produced universal and perpetual desolation. He has brought deliverance from both, and introduction into eternal life. "Grace much more abounds than sin." 1. Because we have reason to believe, taking into view those who die in infancy, and the probable future state of the church, that the number of the saved will greatly exceed that of the lost. 2. Because Christ does far more than merely repair the evils of sin. He not only delivers us from its power and penalty, but exalts our natures and persons to a state to which we have no reason to suppose they would otherwise ever have attained. 3. Through the redeemed church is to be manifested, in ages to come, to principalities and powers, the manifold wisdom of God. The results of redemption no tongue can tell, no heart conceive.—In the meantime we should open our hearts to the large prospects of purity and blessedness presented in the Gospel; the victory of grace over sin and death, which is to be consummated in the triumph of true religion, and in the eternal salvation of those multitudes, out of every tribe and kindred, which no man can number, ver. 21.—H.]

Fourthly. In the last two verses the apostle seems to anticipate an objection which is expressed, Gal. iii. 19, "Wherefore then serveth the law?" Answer, 1. "The law entered that the offence might abound." Not to make sin to abound the more in itself, otherwise than as sin takes occasion by the commandment, but to discover the abounding sinfulness of it. The glass discovers the spots, but does not cause them. When the commandment came into the world sin revived, as the letting of a clearer light into a room discovers the dust and filth which were there before, but were not seen. It was like the searching of a wound, which is necessary to the cure. "The offence" το παραπτώμα.—"that offence," the sin of Adam, the extending of the guilt of it to us, and the effect of the corruption in us, are the abounding of that offence which appeared upon the entry of the law. 2. "That grace might much more abound;" that the terrors of the law might make gospel comforts so much the sweeter. Sin abounded among the Jews; and, to those of them that were converted to the faith of Christ, did not grace much more abound in the remitting of so much guilt and the subduing of so much corruption? The greater the strength of the enemy, the greater the honour of the conqueror. This abounding of grace he illustrates, ver. 21. As the reign of a tyrant and oppressor is a foil to set off the succeeding reign of a just and gentle prince and to make it the more illustrious, so doth the reign of sin set off the reign of grace. "Sin reigned unto death;" it was a cruel, bloody reign. But grace reigns to life, eternal life, and this through righteousness, righteousness imputed to us for justification, implanted in us for sanctification; and both "by Jesus Christ our Lord" through the power and efficacy of Christ, the great prophet, priest, and king, of his church.

[This chapter is a most precious portion of Divine revelation. It brings into view the amazing evils which have resulted from the apostasy. The apostle does not attempt to deny or palliate those evils; he admits them fully; admits them in their deepest, widest, most melancholy extent; just as the physician admits the extent and ravages of disease which he hopes to cure. At the same time, Christianity is not responsible for those evils. It did not introduce them. It finds them in existence, as a matter of sober and melancholy fact pertaining to all the race. Christianity is no more answerable for the introduction and extent of sin than the science of medicine is responsible for the introduction and extent of disease. Like that science, it finds a state of widespread evils in existence; and, like that science, it is strictly a remedial system.—Christianity proposes a remedy; and it is permitted to the Christian to rejoice that the remedy is ample to meet all the evils; that it is just fitted to recover our alienated world; and that it is destined yet to raise the race up to life, and peace, and heaven. In the provisions of that scheme we may and should triumph; and on the same principle as we may rejoice in the triumph of medicine over disease so may we triumph in the ascendancy of the Christian plan over all the evils of the fall. And while Christians thus rejoice, the infidel, the deist, the pagan, and the scoffer shall contend with these evils which their systems cannot alleviate or remove, and sink under the chilly reign of sin and death; just as men pant, and struggle, and expire under the visitations of disease, because they will not apply the proper remedies of medicine, but choose rather to leave themselves to its unchecked ravages, or to use all the nostrums of quackery in a vain attempt to arrest evils which are coming upon them.—A. B.]

CHAPTER VI.

The apostle having at large asserted, opened, and proved, the great doctrine of justification by faith, for fear lest any should suck poison out of that sweet flower, and turn that grace of God into wantonness and licentiousness, he, with a like zeal, copiousness of expression, and cogency of argument, presses the absolute necessity of sanctification and a holy life, as the inseparable fruit and companion of justification; for, wherever Jesus Christ is made of God unto any soul righteousness, he is made of God unto that soul sanctification, 1 Cor. i. 30. The water and the blood came streaming together out of the pierced side of the dying Jesus. And what God hath thus joined together let not us dare to put asunder.

WHAT shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? 2 God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein? 3 Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? 4 Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. 5 For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: 6 Knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. 7 For he that is dead is freed from sin. 8 Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: 9 Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. 10 For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. 11 Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. 12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. 13 Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. 14 For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. 15 What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. 16 Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? 17 But God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. 18 Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness. 19 I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. 20 For when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. 21 What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death. 22 But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. 23 For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle's transition, which joins this discourse with the former, is observable: "What shall we say then?" ver. 1. What use shall we make of this sweet and comfortable doctrine? Shall we do evil that good may come, as some say we do? ch. iii. 8. "Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" Shall we hence take encouragement to sin with so much the more boldness, because the more sin we commit the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? Is this a use to be made of it? No; it is an abuse, and the apostle startles at the thought of it, ver. 2, "God forbid;" far be it from us to think such a thought. He entertains the objection as Christ did the devil's blackest temptation; Mat. iv. 10, "Get thee hence, Satan." Those opinions that give any countenance to sin, or open a door to practical immoralities, how specious and plausible soever they be rendered, by the pretension of advancing free grace, are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence; for the truth as it is in Jesus is a truth according to godliness, Tit. i. 1. The apostle is very full in pressing the necessity of holiness in this chapter, which may be reduced to two heads. His exhortations to holiness, which shew the nature of it; and his motives or arguments to enforce those exhortations, which shew the necessity of it.

First. For the first, we may hence observe the nature of sanctification, what it is, and wherein it consists. In general it has two things in it, mortification and vivification; dying to sin and living to righteousness, elsewhere expressed by putting off the old man and putting on the new, ceasing to do evil and learning to do well.

1. Mortification; putting off the old man. Several ways this is expressed: 1st. We must live no longer in sin, ver. 2; we must not be as we have been, nor do as we have done. The time past of our life must suffice, 1 Pet. iv. 3. Though there are none that live without sin, yet, blessed be God, there are those that do not live in sin, do not live in it as their element, do not make a trade of it: this is to be sanctified. 2nd. The body of sin must be destroyed, ver. 6. The corruption that dwelleth in us is the body of sin, consisting of many parts and members, as a body. This is the root to which the axe must a kind of burial, "a solemn act of consigning us to that death of Christ in which we are made one with him; and with this object, not that we might remain dead, but that we might rise with him from death, experience (even in this world) the power of his resurrection, and live the life which we now live in the flesh as men who have already died and risen again. Compare Col. ii. 12, 13, iii. 1" (Dr. Vaughan).

vi. 6. "That the body of sin might be destroyed:" this strange expression must not be understood as equivalent to the whole of sin, but as describing the body as the sphere in which sin manifests itself. The apostle does not sanction the idea that the body, or material part, is the source of sin; this, the Scripture shows us, lies in the will: but the body is the agent through which sin in the will shows itself; hence we are constantly urged to bring this powerful agent into subjection to the new nature, that it may no longer be the slave of the old sinful disposition. (Compare Col. ii. 11, 12;

he laid. We must not only cease from the acts of sin, (this may be done through the influence of outward restraints, or other inducements,) but we must get away the vicious habits and inclinations weakened and destroyed; not only cast away the idols out of the sanctuary, but the idols of iniquity out of the heart. "That henceforth we should not serve sin." The actual transgression is certainly in a great measure prevented by the crucifying and killing of the original corruption. Destroy the body of sin, and then, though there should be Canaanites remaining in the land, yet the Israelites will not be slaves to them. It is the body of sin that sways the sceptre, wields the iron rod; destroy this, and the yoke is broken. The destruction of Eglon the tyrant is the deliverance of oppressed Israel from the Moabites. 3rd. We must "be dead indeed unto sin," ver. 11; as the death of the oppressor is a release, so much more is the death of the oppressed, Job iii. 17, 18. Death brings a writ of ease to the weary. Thus must we be dead to sin; obey it, observe it, regard it, fulfil it will no more than he that is dead doth his quondam taskmasters; be as indifferent to the pleasures and delights of sin as a man that is dying is to his former diversions. He that is dead is separated from his former company, converse, business, enjoyments, employments, is not what he was, does not what he did, has not what he had. Death makes a mighty change; such a change doth sanctification make in the soul, it cuts off all correspondence with sin. 4th. Sin must not reign in our mortal bodies that we should obey it, ver. 12; though sin may remain as an outlaw, though it may oppress as a tyrant, yet let it not reign as a king. Let it not make laws, nor preside in councils, nor command the militia; let it not be uppermost in the soul, so as that we should obey it. Though we may be sometimes overtaken and overcome by it, yet let us never be obedient to it in the lusts thereof; let not sinful lusts be a law to you, to which you would yield a consenting obedience. "In the lusts thereof," ἐν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτοῦ. It refers to the body, not to sin. Sin lies very much in the gratifying of the body, and humouring that. And there is a reason implied in the phrase, "your mortal body;" because it is a mortal body, and hastening apace to the dust, therefore let not sin reign in it. It was sin that made our bodies mortal; and therefore do not yield obedience to such an enemy. 5th. We must not yield our members as instruments of unrighteousness, ver. 13. The members of the body are made use of by the corrupt nature as tools, by which the wills of the flesh are fulfilled; but we must not consent to that abuse. The members of the body are fearfully and wonderfully made; it is a pity they should be the devil's tools of unrighteousness unto sin, instruments of the sinful actions, according to the sinful dispositions. Unrighteousness is unto sin; the sinful acts confirm and strengthen the sinful habits,—one sin begets another, it is like the letting forth of water,—therefore leave it before it be meddled with. The members of the body may be tempted to be instruments of sin; but do not yield them to be so, do not consent to it. In the strength of Christ resist the devil, and he will flee from you. This is one branch of sanctification, the mortification of sin.

2. Vivification, or living to righteousness; and what is that? 1st. It is to "walk in newness of life," ver. 4. Newness of life supposes newness of heart; for out of the heart are the issues of life, and there is no way to make the stream sweet but by making the spring so. Walking, in Scripture, is put for the course and tenor of the conversation, which must be new. Walk by new rules towards new ends, from new principles. Make a new choice of the way. Choose new paths to walk in, new leaders to walk after, new companions to walk with. Old things should pass away, and all things become new. The man is what he was not, does what he did not. 2nd. It is to be "alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord," ver. 11. To converse with God, to have a regard to him, a delight in him, a concern for him; the soul upon all occasions carried out towards him as towards an agreeable object, in which it takes a complacency: this is to be alive to God. The love of God reigning in the heart is the life of the soul towards God. Animæ est ubi amat, non ubi animat.—The soul is where it loves, rather than where it lives. It is to have the affections and desires alive towards God; or, living (our life in the flesh) unto God, to his honour and glory as our end, by his word and will as our rule; in all our ways to acknowledge him, and to have our eyes ever towards him; this is to live unto God. "Through Jesus Christ our Lord;" Christ is our spiritual life, there is no living to God but through him. He is the Mediator; there can be no comfortable receivings from God, not acceptable regards to God, but in and through Jesus Christ; no intercourse between sinful souls and a holy God, but by the mediation of the Lord Jesus. Through Christ as the author and maintainer of this life; through Christ as the head from whom we receive vital influence; through Christ as the root by which we derive sap and nourishment, and so live. In living to God, Christ is all in all. 3rd. It is to "yield ourselves to God as those that are alive from the dead," ver. 13. The very life and being of holiness lie in the dedication of ourselves to the Lord, giving our ourselves to the Lord, 2 Cor. viii. 5. "Yield yourselves to him, not only as the conquered yields to the conqueror, because he can stand it out no longer; but as the wife yields herself to her husband, to whom her desire is, as the scholar yields himself to the teacher, the apprentice to his master, to be taught and ruled by him. Not only yield your estates to him, but yield yourselves; nothing less than your whole selves," παρατίθεσθε τὰ πάντα, accommodate vos ipsos Deo.—accommodate yourselves to God; so Tremellius, from the Syriac. 'Not only submit to him, but comply with him; not only present yourselves to him once for all, but be always ready to serve him. Yield yourselves to him as wax to the seal, to take any impression; to be, and have, and do, what he pleases.' When Paul said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Acts ix. 6, he was then yielded to God. "As those that are alive from the dead." To yield a dead carcass to a living God is not to please him, but to mock him; 'Yield yourselves as those that are alive and good for something, a living sacrifice,' ch. xii. 1. The surest evidence of our spiritual life is the dedication of ourselves to God. It becomes those that are alive from the dead, (it may be understood of a death in law,) that are justified and delivered from death, to give themselves to him that hath so redeemed them.

"As those that are alive from the dead." This clause, which is descriptive both of the state and character of believers, is evidently derived from the preceding representation of Christians as being dead with Christ unto sin, and living with him unto God. They are required to act as those who are partakers of the life of Christ; as those whom God has quickened and made to sit together in heavenly places with Christ Jesus, Eph. ii. 5, 6. "And your members," your faculties of mind and body, "as instruments of righteousness unto God." This clause is simply explanatory of the former in same verse.—H.]

4th. It is to yield "our members as instruments of righteousness to God." The members of our bodies, when withdrawn from the service of sin, are not to lie idle, but to be made use of in the service of God. When the strong man armed is dispossessed, let him whose right it is divide the spoils. Though the powers and faculties of the soul be the immediate subjects of holiness and righteousness, yet the members of the body are to be instruments; the body must be always ready to serve the soul in the service of God. Thus, ver. 19, "Yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness." Let them be under the conduct and at the command of the righteous law of God, and that principle of inherent righteousness which the Spirit, as a sanctifier, plants in the soul. "Righteousness unto holiness," which intimates growth, and progress, and ground obtained. As every sinful act confirms the sinful habit, and makes the nature more and more prone to sin, (hence the members of a natural man are here said to be "servants to iniquity unto iniquity;" one sin makes the heart more disposed for another,) so every gracious act confirms the gracious habit. Serving righteousness is unto holiness; one duty fits us for another, and the more we do the more we may do for God. Our serving righteousness, εἰς ἁγιασμόν,—as an evidence of sanctification.

Secondly. The motives or arguments here used to shew the necessity of sanctification. There is such an antipathy in our hearts by nature to holiness that it is no easy matter to bring them to submit to it; it is the Spirit's work, who persuades by such inducements as these set home upon the soul.

1. He argues from our sacramental conformity to Jesus Christ. Our baptism, with the design and intention of it, carries in it a great reason why we should die to sin, and live to righteousness. Thus we must improve our baptism as a bride of restraint to keep us in from sin, as a spur of constraint to quicken us to duty. Observe his reasoning.

1st. In general, we are "dead to sin;" that is, in profession and in obligation. Our baptism signifies our cutting off from the kingdom of sin. We profess to have no more to do with sin. We are dead to sin by a participation of virtue and power for the killing of it, and by our union with Christ and interest in him, in and by whom it is killed. All this is in vain if we persist in sin; we contradict a profession, violate an obligation, return to that to which we were dead, like walking ghosts, than which nothing is more unbecoming and absurd. For, ver. 7, "he that is dead is freed from sin;" that is, he that is dead to it is freed from the rule and dominion of it, as the servant that is dead is freed from his master, Job iii. 19. Now shall we be such fools as to return to that slavery from which we are discharged? When we are delivered out of Egypt, shall we talk of going back to it again?

[The expression, "dead to sin," which signifies justified from sin, ver. 7, has no reference whatever to the character of believers, as seems to be so generally understood, but exclusively to their state before God, as the ground on which their sanctification is secured. As justified persons they are dead to sin, being delivered from its condemning power by the death of Christ, their head and surety. In proof that this is the correct view of the subject, let it be observed that the whole of the apostle's answer to the objection, from this 2nd verse to the end of the 10th, with which he concludes it, rests not on the circumstance that sin is mortified in himself and those whom he is addressing, or that they are dead to any propensity to sin, but on the fact of their being one with Jesus Christ. They were united to Christ in his death, and consequently in his life, which was communicated to them by him who is "a quickening Spirit"—and thus their walking in newness of life and their resurrection with him are secured. These ideas are exhibited in the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th verses. In the 7th verse, the reason of the whole is summed up; "for he who is dead" (with Christ) "is justified from sin;" and in the 8th verse, that which follows our being justified from sin is stated. "If we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him." Finally, in the 9th and 10th verses, the apostle declares the consequence of Christ's dying to sin to be, that he liveth unto God. The same effect in respect to the members must follow, as to the head with whom believers are one; and, therefore, he immediately proceeds to assure them, in the 14th verse, that sin shall not have dominion over them. The effect, then, of the doctrine of justification by grace, is the very reverse of giving not merely license, but even place to continue in sin. On the contrary, according to that doctrine, the power of God is engaged to secure a life of holiness—"freed from sin." The original word, which is here translated freed, different from that rendered free in verses 18, 20, 22, is literally, justified. It occurs fifteen times in this epistle, and twenty-five times in other parts of the New Testament; and, except in this verse, and one other where it is translated righteous, is uniformly rendered by the word justified. Hence it appears, that, in this verse, as in all the other passages, its proper rendering ought to be retained, and not exchanged for the term "freed," which has evidently been selected to convey a different sense. Retaining its proper translation in this place is absolutely necessary, in order clearly to perceive the great and cheering truth here announced, as well as to apprehend the full force of the apostle's answer to the objection stated in the 1st verse. As to the phrase "justified from sin," we find the apostle expressing himself in the same manner, Acts xiii. 39, "By him all that believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses"—R. H.]

2nd. In particular, being "baptized into Jesus Christ," we were baptized into his death, ver. 3. We were baptized εἰς Χριστόν—unto Christ; as 1 Cor. x. 2, εἰς Μωϋσέως,—unto Moses. Baptism binds us to Christ, it binds us up apprentice to Christ as our teacher; it is our allegiance to Christ as our Sovereign. Baptism is externa arcta Christi,—the external handle of Christ; by which Christ lays hold on men, and men offer themselves to Christ. Particularly, we were baptized into his death, into a participation of the privileges purchased by his death, and into an obligation both to comply with the design of his death, which was to redeem us from all iniquity, and to conform to the pattern of his death; that, as Christ died for sin, so we should die to sin. This was the profession and promise of our baptism, and we do not do well if we do not answer this profession, and make good this promise.

"Baptized into Jesus Christ." By faith believers are made one with Christ; they become members of his body. This oneness is represented emblematically by baptism. "Baptized into his death." In baptism, they are also represented as dying with Christ. This rite, then, proceeds on the fact that they have died with him who bore their sins. Thus, the satisfaction rendered to the justice of God by him, is a satisfaction from them, as they are constituent parts of his body. The believer is one with Christ as truly as he was one with Adam—he dies with Christ as truly as he died with Adam. Christ's righteousness is his as truly as Adam's sin was his. By a Divine constitution, all Adam's posterity are one with him, and so his first sin is really and truly theirs. By a similar Divine constitution, all Christ's people are one with him, and his work is as truly theirs as if they had performed it, and his death as if they had suffered it. When it is said that Christians have died with Christ, there is no more figure than when it is said that they have died in Adam.—R. H.]

First. Our conformity, we repeat, to the death of Christ obliges us to die unto sin; thereby we know "the fellowship of his sufferings," Phil. iii. 10. Thus we are here said to "be planted together in the likeness of his death," ver. 5; τῇ ἐνομομασίᾳ, not only a conformity, but a conformation, as the engrafted stock is planted together into the likeness of the shoot, of the nature of which it doth participate. Planting is in order to life and fruitfulness; we are planted in the vineyard in a likeness to Christ, which likeness we should evidence in sanctification.

["Planted together." The word in the original, when it refers to trees, does not designate the operation of grafting, but to planting them in the same place or bed. It signifies the closest union of any kind, as being incorporated, growing together, united, joined with. The meaning then is, that as in baptism we have been exhibited as one with Christ in his death, so in due time we shall be conformed to him in the likeness of his resurrection.—R. H.]

Our creed concerning Jesus Christ is, among other things, that he was crucified, dead, and buried; now baptism is a sacramental conformity to him

1 Cor. ix. 27.) "Be destroyed:" this scarcely conveys the correct impression; the expression rather signifies "be rendered powerless," "reduced to impotence."

vi. 7. "He that is dead:" rather, "he that died" hath been set free—i.e., judicially released from sin. The meaning seems to be that, as death cancels all legal claims, so the Christian, who has died with Christ, is out of the power of sin.

vi. 10. "In that he died," &c.: Alford renders, "For the death that he died, he died unto sin once." There is a contrast between the death and the life of Christ; the death was unto sin, the life is unto God. Christ died to sin, not in the sense in which we die to sin, but as signifying that his personal work with respect to sin ceased with his death. The efforts of the tempter, the contradiction of sinners, were at an end; or, better still, because more consistent with the passage, sin needed no more atonement. "Once;" emphatic, "once for all." (Compare Heb. vii. 27, ix. 12, 26, 28, x. 10; 1 Pet.

in each of these, as the apostle here takes notice. 1st. "Our old man is crucified with him," ver. 6. The death of the cross was a slow death: the body, after it was nailed to the cross, gave many a throe and many a struggle; but it was a sure death, long in expiring, but expired at last; such is the mortification of sin in believers. It was a cursed death, Gal. iii. 13. Sin dies as a malefactor, devoted to destruction; it is an accursed thing. Though it be a slow death, yet this must needs hasten it, that it is an old man that is crucified; not in the prime of its strength, but decaying; that which waxeth old is ready to vanish away, Heb. viii. 13. "Crucified with him"—co-crucifixio, not in respect of time, but in respect of causality. The crucifying of Christ for us has an influence upon the crucifying of sin in us.

"That our old man is crucified with him." Paul draws here the same conclusion from the believer's crucifixion with Christ that he had previously drawn from his baptism into Christ's death. All believers died with Christ on the cross, as they were all one in him, and represented by him. Their old man, (Eph. iv. 22, Col. iii. 9.) or sinful nature, is crucified together with Christ. If, then, their old man has been crucified with him, it cannot be that they will for the future live according to their old nature.—R. H.

2nd. We are dead with Christ, ver. 8. Christ was obedient to death; when he died, we might be said to die with him, as our dying to sin is an act of conformity both to the design and to the example of Christ's dying for sin. Baptism signifies and seals our union with Christ, our engraving into Christ; so that we are dead with him, and engaged to have no more to do with sin than he had.

[By the death of Christ a full penalty was rendered for sin, inasmuch that he could no more be reckoned with on account of it. He undertook to be surety for all who should believe; and having finished his undertaking, the matter was closed, and the creditor now ceased from putting in any farther claim, or preferring any farther challenge against him. For us to be dead with Christ is just to share in this very exoneration. It was for us that the account was settled; and, just as much as if by death, the appointed penalty, we had settled in ourselves, do we now stand acquitted of all farther count and reckoning because of sin.—C.]

3rd. "We are buried with him by baptism," ver. 4. Our conformity is complete. We are in profession quite cut off from all commerce and communion with sin, as those that are buried are quite cut off from all the world; not only not of the living, but no more among the living, have nothing more to do with them. Thus must we be, as Christ was, separate from sin and sinners. We are buried, namely, in profession and obligation; we profess to be so, and we are bound to be so: it was our covenant and engagement in baptism; we are sealed to be the Lord's, therefore to be cut off from sin. Why this burying in baptism should so much as allude to any custom of dipping under water in baptism, any more than our baptismal crucifixion and death should have any such references, I confess I cannot see. It is plain that it is not the sign, but the thing signified, in baptism, that the apostle here calls being buried with Christ, and the expression of burying alludes to Christ's burial. As Christ was buried, that he might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are in baptism buried, that is, cut off from the life of sin, that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

[Ver. 4, "Therefore," &c. This particle refers to the reason why believers are buried with Christ, namely, that they may rise with him. The death of Christ was the means by which sin was destroyed, and his being laid in the grave the proof of the reality of his death. In the same way, Christians are represented as buried with him by baptism into his death, in token that they really died with him; and, if buried with him, it is not that they should remain in the grave, but that as Christ arose from the dead they should also rise. Their baptism, then, is the figure of their complete deliverance from sin, signifying that God places to their account the death of Christ as their own death: it is also a figure of their purification and resurrection for the service of God.—R. H.]

Secondly. Our conformity to the resurrection of Christ obliges us to rise again to newness of life. This is "the power of his resurrection" which Paul was so desirous to know, Phil. iii. 10. "Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father," that is, by the power of the Father. The power of God is his glory; it is glorious power, Col. i. 11. Now in baptism we are obliged to conform to that pattern, to be planted "in the likeness of his resurrection," ver. 5; to "live with him," ver. 8: see Col. ii. 12. Conversion is the first resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and this resurrection is conformable to Christ's resurrection. This conformity of the saints to the resurrection of Christ seems to be intimated in the rising of so many of the bodies of the saints, which, though mentioned before by anticipation, is supposed to have been concomitant with Christ's resurrection, Mat. xxvii. 52. We have all risen with Christ. In two things we must conform to the resurrection of Christ: 1st. He rose to die no more, ver. 9. We read of many others that were raised from the dead, but they rose to die again. But, when Christ rose, he rose to die no more; therefore, he left his graveclothes behind him, whereas Lazarus, who was to die again, brought them out with him, as one that should have occasion to use them again: but over Christ "death has no more dominion;" he was dead indeed, but he is alive, and so alive that he lives for evermore, Rev. i. 18. Thus we must rise from the grave of sin never again to return to it, nor to have any more fellowship with the works of darkness, having quitted that grave, that land of darkness as darkness itself.

[The perpetuity of Christ's life is presented, 1. As the ground of assurance of the perpetuity of the life of believers. We shall partake of the life of Christ, that is, of the spiritual and eternal blessings of redemption, because he ever lives to make intercession for us, and to grant us those supplies of grace which we need: see ch. v. 10; Jno. xiv. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 23, &c., &c. As death has no more dominion over him, there is no ground of apprehension that our supplies of life shall be cut off. This verse, therefore, is introduced as the ground of the declaration, "we shall live with him," at the close of ver. 8. 2. The perpetuity of the life of Christ is one of the points in which our life is to be conformed to his.—H.]

2nd. He rose to live unto God, ver. 10; to live a heavenly life, to receive that glory which was set before him. Others that were raised from the dead returned to the same life in every respect which they had before lived; but so did not Christ: he rose again to leave the world. "Now I am no more in the world," Jno. xiii. 1; xvii. 11. He rose to live to God, that is, to intercede and rule, and all to the glory of the Father. Thus must we rise to live to God; this is what he calls "newness of life," ver. 4. To live from other principles, by other rules, with other aims, than we have done. A life devoted to God is a new life; before, self was the chief and highest end, but now God. To live indeed is to live to God, with our eyes ever towards him, making him the centre of all our actions.

2. He argues from the precious promises and privileges of the new covenant, ver. 14. It might be objected that we cannot conquer and subdue sin, it is unavoidably too hard for us: "No," says he, "you wrestle with an enemy that may be dealt with and subdued, if you will but keep your ground and stand to your arms; it is an enemy that is already foiled and baffled; there is strength laid up in the covenant of grace for your assistance, if you will but use it. "Sin shall not have dominion." God's promises to us are more powerful and effectual for the mortifying of sin than our promises to God. Sin may struggle in a believer, and may create him a great deal of trouble, but it shall not have dominion; it may vex him, but shall not rule over him. "For we are not under the law, but under grace," not under the law of sin and death, but under the law of the Spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus. We are actuated by other principles than we have been. New lords, new laws. Or, not under the covenant of works, which requires brick, and gives no straw, which condemns upon the least failure, which runs thus, "Do this, and live; do it not, and die;" but under the covenant of grace, which accepts sincerity as our gospel perfection, which requires nothing but what it promises strength to perform, which is herein well ordered, that every transgression in the covenant does not put us out of covenant, and especially that it does not leave our salvation in our own keeping, but lays it up in the hands of the Mediator, who undertakes for us that sin shall not have dominion over us, who hath himself condemned it, and will destroy it; so that, if we pursue the victory, we shall come off more than conquerors. Christ rules by the golden sceptre of grace, and he will not let sin have dominion over those that are willing subjects to that rule. This is a very comfortable word to all true believers. If we were under the law, we were undone, for the law curses every one that continues not in every thing; but we are under grace, grace which accepts the willing mind, which is not extreme to mark what we do amiss, which leaves room for repentance, which promises pardon upon repentance; and what can be to an ingenuous mind a stronger motive than this to have nothing to do with sin?

"But under grace." Believers are not under the covenant of works, but under the covenant of grace, by which they enjoy all the blessings of that gracious covenant. They are in a state of reconciliation with God. They know the Lord. His law is written in their hearts, and his fear is put within them, so that as he has promised not to depart from them, they shall not depart from him, Jer. xxxii. 40. Being made partakers of the favour of God through Jesus Christ, in whom grace was given them before the world began, 2 Tim. i. 9, they have every spiritual supply through him who is full of grace. His grace is sufficient for them, 2 Cor. xii. 9. The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, that hath appeared to all men, teacheth them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, Tit. ii. 11; and not only is it manifested to them, but it operates within them. God works in them what is well pleasing in his sight, both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Those who are under the law have nothing but their own strength for their obedience. But they who are under grace are by God himself thoroughly furnished unto all good works. Sin, therefore, shall not have dominion over them. The great principle of evangelical obedience is taught in this passage. Holiness is not the result of the law, but of the liberty wherewith Christ has made his people free. He sends forth the Spirit of grace into the hearts of all who belong to the election of grace, whom God hath from the beginning chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth; and the word of God worketh effectually in all who believe, 1 Thes. ii. 13. Jesus Christ is the absolute master of the hearts of his people, of which he has taken possession, and in whom he reigns by the invincible power of the Spirit of grace. The new covenant made with him, for those whom he has redeemed, and which is ratified with his blood, is immutable and irreversible.—R. H.

Shall we sin against so much goodness, abuse such love? Some, perhaps, might suck poison out of this flower, and disingenuously use this as an encouragement to sin. See how the apostle starts at such a thought; ver. 15. "Shall we sin because we are not under law, but under grace? God forbid." What can be more black and ill-natured than from a friend's extraordinary expressions of kindness and good-will to take occasion to affront and offend him? To spurn at such bowels, to spit in the face of such love, is that which, between man and man, all the world would cry out shame on.

"What then," &c. Paul evinces constantly his anxiety to avoid misapprehension, and to shew that freedom from the law is very different from being free from moral obligation. He, therefore, for the second time, denies that the liberty of the Gospel is a liberty to sin. As the illustration and confirmation of the principle of ver. 14, are formally resumed at the beginning of the next chapter, the apostle contents himself here with proving the unsoundness of the objection presented in this verse, by shewing (in following verses) that it is as impossible for the Christian to live in sin as for the slave of one man to be obedient to another, or for a man to serve two masters at the same time.—H.

3. He argues from the evidence that this will be of our state, making for us, or against us; ver. 16. "To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants you are." All the children of men are either the servants of God or the servants of sin; these are the two families. Now, if we would know to which of these families we belong, we must inquire to which of these masters we yield obedience. Our obeying the laws of sin will be an evidence against us that we belong to that family on which death is entailed; as, on the contrary, our obeying the laws of Christ will evidence our relation to Christ's family.

4. He argues from their former sinfulness, ver. 17–21, where we may observe,

1st. What they had been and done formerly. We have need to be often reminded of our former state. Paul frequently remembers it concerning himself, and those to whom he writes. First. "You were the servants of sin." Those that are now the servants of God would do well to remember the time when they were the servants of sin, to keep them humble, penitent, and watchful, and to quicken them in the service of God. It is a reproach to the service of sin that so many thousands have quitted the service, and shaken off the yoke and never any that sincerely deserted it, and gave up themselves to the service of God, have returned to the former drudgery. "God be thanked that you were so," that is, that though you were so, yet you have obeyed. You were so; God be thanked that we can speak of it as a thing past: you were so, but you are not now so. Nay, your having been so formerly tends much to the magnifying of Divine mercy and grace in the happy change. God be thanked that the former sinfulness is such a foil and such a spur to your present holiness. Secondly. "You have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity," ver. 19. It is the misery of a sinful state that the body is made a drudge to sin, than which there could not be a baser or a harder slavery, like that of the prodigal that was sent into the fields to feed swine. "You have yielded." Sinners are voluntary in the service of sin. The devil could not force them into the service, if they did not yield themselves to it. This will justify God in the ruin of sinners, that they sold themselves to work wickedness; it was their own act and deed. "To iniquity unto iniquity." Every sinful act strengthens and confirms the sinful habit. "To iniquity as the work, unto iniquity as the wages." Sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind; growing worse and worse, more and more hardened. This he speaks "after the manner of men;" that is, he fetches a similitude from that which is common among men, even the change of services and subjections. Thirdly. "You were free from righteousness," ver. 20; not free by any liberty given, but by a liberty taken, which is licentiousness. "You were altogether void of that which is good,—void of any good principles, motions, or inclinations,—void of all subjection to the law and will of God, of all conformity to his image; and this you

iii. 18.) In contrast with the death once for all, the life that he liveth he liveth (perpetually, eternally) unto God. (Compare Luke xx. 38.)

vi. 17. "God be thanked:" the stress is on the past tense, "ye were." The apostle is thankful that the service of sin is a thing of the past. "Which was delivered;" rather, "unto which ye were delivered." They were handed over to the Christian teaching that their life might be moulded by it.

vii. 1. The majority of commentators seem to connect the beginning of this chapter, as in the Commentary, with chap. vi. 14. The connection with verse 23 must not be overlooked, for the expressions of this verse imply that freedom from the law which is the topic of the earlier part of this chapter. Our hope is not in the law (verse 23); we are free from it (verse 14). This need not shock those who know that the power of the law ceases with death. We as Christians (we have seen, chap. vi. 3–11) are dead.

were highly pleased with, as a freedom and a liberty; but a freedom from righteousness is the worst kind of slavery.

2nd. How the blessed change was made, and wherein it did consist. First. "You have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered to you," ver. 17. This describes conversion, what it is; it is our conformity to, and compliance with, the Gospel which was delivered to us by Christ and his ministers. Margin, "Whereto you were delivered;" εἰς ὃν κατεδόθητε, "into which you were delivered." And so observe, 1st. The rule of grace, "that form of doctrine," τύπον διδασκῆς. The Gospel is the great rule both of truth and holiness; it is the stamp, grace is the impression of that stamp; it is the form of healing words, 2 Tim. i. 13. 2nd. The nature of grace, as it is our conformity to that rule. (1.) It is to "obey it from the heart." The Gospel is a doctrine not only to be believed, but to be obeyed, and that from the heart, which denotes the sincerity and reality of that obedience; not in profession only, but in power, from the heart, the innermost part, the commanding part of us. (2.) It is to be delivered into it, as into a mould, as the wax is cast into the impression of the seal, answering it line for line, stroke for stroke, and wholly representing the shape and figure of it. To be a Christian indeed is to be transformed into the likeness and similitude of the Gospel, our souls answering to it, complying with it, conformed to it; understanding, will, affections, aims, principles, actions, all according to that form of doctrine. Secondly. "Being made free from sin, you became servants of righteousness," ver. 18; "servants to God," ver. 22. Conversion is, 1st. A freedom from the service of sin; it is the shaking off of that yoke, resolving to have no more to do with it. 2nd. A resignation of ourselves to the service of God and righteousness, to God as our master, to righteousness as our work. When we are made free from sin, it is not that we may live as we list, and be our own masters. No, when we are delivered out of Egypt, we are, as Israel, led to the holy mountain to receive the law, and are there brought into the bond of the covenant. Observe. We cannot be made the servants of God till we are freed from the power and dominion of sin; we cannot serve two masters so directly opposite one to another as God and sin are. We must, with the prodigal, quit the drudgery of the citizen of the country before we can come to our Father's house.

3rd. What apprehensions they now had of their former work and way. He appeals to themselves (ver. 21) whether they had not found the service of sin. First. An unfruitful service. "What fruit had you then?" Did you ever get any thing by it? Sit down and cast up the account, reckon your gains, what fruit had you then? Besides the future losses, which are infinitely great, the very present gains of sin are not worth mentioning. "What fruit." Nothing that deserves the name of fruit. The present pleasure and profit of sin do not deserve to be called fruit; they are but chaff, ploughing iniquity, sowing vanity, and reaping the same. Secondly. It is an unbecoming service. It is that of which we "are now ashamed,"—ashamed of the folly, ashamed of the filth of it. Shame came into the world with sin, and is still the certain product of it,—either the shame of repentance, or, if not that, eternal shame and contempt. Who would wilfully do that which sooner or later he is sure to be ashamed of?

5. He argues from the end of all these things. It is the prerogative of rational creatures that they are endued with a power of prospect, are capable of looking forward, considering the latter end of things. To persuade us from sin to holiness, here are blessing and cursing, good and evil, life and death, set before us; and we are put to our choice. 1st. The end of sin is death; ver. 21. "The end of those things is death." Though the way may seem pleasant and inviting, yet the end is dismal: at the last it bites; it will be bitterness in the latter end. "The wages of sin is death," ver. 23. Death is as due to a sinner when he hath sinned as wages are to a servant when he hath done his work. This is true of every sin. There is no sin in its own nature venial. Death is the wages of the least sin. Sin is here represented either as the work for which the wages are given or as the master by whom the wages are given; all that are sin's servants and do sin's work must expect to be thus paid. 2nd. If the fruit be unto holiness, if there be an active principle of true and growing grace, the end will be everlasting life,—a very happy end! Though the way be uphill, though it be narrow, and thorny, and beset, yet everlasting life at the end of it is sure. So, ver. 23, "The gift of God is eternal life." Heaven is life, consisting in the vision and fruition of God; and it is eternal life, no infirmities attending it, no death to put a period to it. This is the gift of God. The death is the wages of sin, it comes by desert; but the life is a gift, it comes by favour. Sinners merit hell, but saints do not merit heaven. There is no proportion between the glory of heaven and our obedience; we must thank God, and not ourselves, if ever we get to heaven. And this gift is "through Jesus Christ our Lord." It is Christ that purchased it, prepared it, prepares us for it, preserves us to it; he is the Alpha and Omega, all in all in our salvation.

CHAPTER VII.

We may observe in this chapter. I. Our freedom from the law farther urged as an argument to press upon us sanctification, ver. 1—6. II. The excellency and usefulness of the law asserted and proved from the apostle's own experience, notwithstanding, ver. 7—14. III. A description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, ver. 14, to the end.

NOW ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? 2 For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. 3 So then if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man.

vii. 4. "Become dead to the law:" the original word has a more active sense than is expressed by "dead;" better, "were put to death," or "slain."

vii. 5. "Motions," or "stirrings," "incitements," which were by means of the law. The law occasioned not the sin, but the incitements which led to the sin. "Did work," or, "were active."

vii. 7—25 contain, according to Alford, "an explanation of the part which the law has in bringing out sin, by example of the 4 Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God.

5 For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sins, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. 6 But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.

Among other arguments used in the foregoing chapter to persuade us against sin and to holiness this was one, ver. 14, that "we are not under the law;" and this argument is here farther insisted upon and explained; ver. 6, "We are delivered from the law." What is meant by this? And how is it an argument why sin should not reign over us, and why we should walk in newness of life? 1. We are delivered from that power of the law which curses and condemns us for the sin committed by us. The sentence of the law against us is vacated and reversed, by the death of Christ, to all true believers. The law saith, "The soul that sins shall die;" but we are delivered from the law. "The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die." "We are redeemed from the curse of the law," Gal. iii. 13. 2. We are delivered from that power of the law which irritates and provokes the sin that dwelleth in us. This the apostle seems especially to refer to, ver. 5. "The motions of sins which were by the law." The law, by commanding, forbidding, threatening, corrupt and fallen man, but offering no grace to cure and strengthen, did but stir up the corruption, and, like the sun shining upon a dunghill, excite and draw up the filthy steams. We being lamed by the fall, the law comes and directs us, but provides nothing to heal and help our lameness, and so makes us halt and stumble the more. Understand this of the law not as a rule, but as a covenant of works. Now each of these is an argument why we should be holy; for here is encouragement to endeavours, though in many things we come short. We are under grace, which promises strength to do what it commands, and pardon upon repentance when we do amiss. This is the scope of these verses in general, that in point of profession and privilege we are under a covenant of grace, and not under a covenant of works—under the Gospel of Christ, and not under the law of Moses. The difference between a law state and a Gospel state he had before illustrated by the similitude of rising to a new life, and serving a new master; now here he speaks of it under the similitude of being married to a new husband.

First. Our first marriage was to the law, which, according to the law of marriage, was to continue only during the life of the law. The law of marriage is binding till the death of one of the parties, no matter which, and no longer. The death of either discharges both. For this he appeals to themselves, as persons knowing the law, ver. 1, "I speak to those that know the law." It is a great advantage to discourse with those that have knowledge, for such can more readily understand and apprehend a truth. Many of the Christians at Rome were such as had been Jews, and so were well acquainted with the law. One has some hold of knowing people. "The law hath power over a man as long as he liveth;" in particular, the law of marriage hath power; or, in general, every law is so limited—the laws of nations, of relations, of families, &c. 1. The obligation of laws extends no farther; by death the servant who, while he lived, was under the yoke, is freed from his master, Job iii. 19. 2. The condemnation of laws extends no farther; death is the finishing of the law. Acto mortuorum cum persona.—The action expires with the person. The severest laws could but kill the body, and after that there is no more that they can do. Thus while we were alive to the law we were under the power of it—while we were in our Old-Testament state, before the Gospel came into the world, and before it came with power into our hearts. Such is the law of marriage, ver. 2, the woman is bound to her husband during life, so bound to him that she cannot marry another; if she do, she shall be reckoned an adulteress, ver. 3. It will make her an adulteress, not only to be defiled by, but to be married to, another man; for that is so much the worse, upon this account, that it abuses an ordinance of God, by making it to patronize the uncleanness. Thus were we married to the law, ver. 5, "When we were in the flesh," that is, in a carnal state, under the reigning power of sin and corruption—in the flesh as in our element—then "the motions of sins which were by the law did work in our members," we were carried down the stream of sin, and the law was but as an imperfect dam, which made the stream to swell the higher, and rage the more. Our desire was towards sin, as that of the wife towards her husband, and sin ruled over us. We embraced it, loved it, devoted all to it, conversed daily with it, made it our care to please it. We were under a law of sin and death, as the wife under the law of marriage; and the product of this marriage was fruit brought forth unto death, that is, actual transgressions were produced by the original corruptions, such as deserve death. Lust, having conceived by the law, (which is the strength of sin, 1 Cor. xv. 56,) "bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death," Jas. i. 15. This is the posterity that springs from this marriage to sin and the law. This comes of the motions of sin working in our members. And this continues during life, while the law is alive to us, and we are alive to the law.

Secondly. Our second marriage is to Christ; and how comes this about? Why, 1. We are freed, by death, from our obligation to the law as a covenant, as the wife is from her obligation to her husband, ver. 3. This resemblance is not very close, nor needed it to be. "You are become dead to the law," ver. 4. He does not say, "The law is dead," (some think because he would avoid giving offence to those who were yet zealous for the law,) but, which comes all to one, "You are dead to the law." As the crucifying of the world to us, and of us to the world, amounts to one and the same thing, so doth the law dying, and our dying to it. "We are delivered from the law," ver. 6, κατηργήθημεν—"we are null'd" as to the law; our obligation to it as a husband is cassated and made void. And then he speaks of the law being dead as far as it was a law of bondage to us: "That being dead wherein we were held;" not the law itself, but its obligation to punishment and its provocation to sin. It is dead, it has lost its power; and this, ver. 4, "by the body of Christ," that is, by the sufferings of Christ in his body, by his crucified body, which abrogated the law, answered the demands of it, made satisfaction for our violation of it, purchased for us a covenant of grace, in which righteousness and strength are laid up for us, such as were not, nor could be, by the law. We are dead to the law by our union with the mystical body of Christ. By being incorporated into Christ in our baptism professedly, in our believing powerfully and effectually, we are apostle's own case." His view is, that from verse 7—13 inclusive is historical, or, in other words, exhibits the carnal self in the transition state, under the first motions towards God generated by the law, which the law could never have perfected; and that at verse 14 St. Paul transfers himself into his present position, altering the past tense into the present, still, however, meaning by "I" (verse 14) "my flesh." At verse 20 this carnal "I" passes altogether out of sight, and its place is taken by the actual then existing complex self, dead to the law, have no more to do with it than the dead servant, that is free from his master, hath to do with his master's yoke.

2. We are married to Christ. The day of our believing is the day of our espousals to the Lord Jesus. We enter upon a life of dependence on him and duty to him: "Married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead," a periphrasis of Christ very pertinent here; for as our dying to sin and the law is in conformity to the death of Christ, and the crucifying of his body, so our devotedness to Christ in newness of life is in conformity to the resurrection of Christ. We are married to the raised exalted Jesus, a very honourable marriage: compare 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 29. Now we are thus married to Christ, 1st. "That we should bring forth fruit unto God," ver. 4. One end of marriage is fruitfulness: God instituted the ordinance that he might seek a godly seed, Mal. ii. 15. The wife is compared to the fruitful vine, and children are called the fruit of the womb. Now the great end of our marriage to Christ is our fruitfulness in love, and grace, and every good work. This is fruit unto God, pleasing to God, according to his will, aiming at his glory. As our old marriage to sin produced fruit unto death, so our second marriage to Christ produces fruit unto God, fruits of righteousness. Good works are the children of the new nature, the products of our union with Christ, as the fruitfulness of the vine is the product of its union with the root. Whatever our professions and pretensions may be, there is no fruit brought forth to God till we are married to Christ; it is in Christ Jesus that we are created unto good works, Eph. ii. 10. The only fruit which turns to a good account is that which is brought forth in Christ. This distinguishes the good works of believers from the good works of hypocrites and self-justifiers, that they are brought forth in marriage, done in union with Christ, in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. iii. 17. This is, without controversy, one of the great mysteries of godliness. 2nd. "That we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," ver. 6. Being married to a new husband, we must change our way. Still we must serve, but it is a service that is perfect freedom, whereas the service of sin was a perfect drudgery: we must now serve in newness of spirit, by new spiritual rules, from new spiritual principles, in spirit and in truth, Jno. iv. 24. There must be a renovation of our spirits wrought by the Spirit of God, and in that we must serve. "Not in the oldness of the letter:" that is, we must not rest in mere external services, as the carnal Jews did, who gloried in their adherence to the letter of the law, and minded not the spiritual part of worship. The letter is said to kill with its bondage and terror, but we are delivered from that yoke that we may serve God without fear, in holiness and righteousness, Lu. i. 74, 75. We are under the dispensation of the Spirit, and therefore must be spiritual, and serve in the spirit. Compare with this 2 Cor. iii. 3, 6, &c. It becomes us to worship within the veil, and no longer in the outward court.

7 What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. 8 But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. 9 For I was alive without the law once: but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. 10 And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death. 11 For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me. 12 Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. 13 Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful. 14 For we know that the law is spiritual:

To what he had said in the former paragraph the apostle here raises an objection, which he answers very fully. "What shall we say then? Is the law sin?" When he had been speaking of the dominion of sin he had said so much of the influence of the law as a covenant upon that dominion that it might easily be misinterpreted as a reflection upon the law, to prevent which he shews from his own experience the great excellency and usefulness of the law, not as a covenant, but as a guide; and farther discovers how sin took occasion by the commandment. Observe in particular,

First. The great excellency of the law in itself. Far be it from Paul to reflect upon the law; no, he speaks honourably of it. 1. It "is holy, just, and good," ver. 12. The law in general is so, and every particular commandment is so. Laws are as the law-makers are. God, the great lawgiver, is holy, just, and good, therefore his law must needs be so. The matter of it is holy; it commands holiness, encourages holiness; it is holy, for it is agreeable to the holy will of God, the original of holiness. It is just; for it is consonant to the rules of equity and right reason: the ways of the Lord are right. It is good in the design of it; it was given for the good of mankind, for the conservation of peace and order in the world. It makes the observers of it good; the intention of it was to better and reform mankind. Wherever there is true grace there is an assent to this—that the law is holy, just, and good. 2. "The law is spiritual," ver. 14, not only in regard to the effect of it, as it is a means of making us spiritual, but in regard to the extent of it; it reaches our spirits, it lays a restraint upon, and gives a direction to, the motions of the inward man; "it is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart," Heb. iv. 12. It forbids spiritual wickedness, heart-murder, and heart-adultery. It commands spiritual service, requires the heart, obliges us to worship God in the spirit. It is a spiritual law; for it is given by God, who is a Spirit and the Father of spirits; it is given to man, whose principal part is spiritual. The soul is the best part, and the leading part of the man, and therefore the law to the man must needs be a law to the soul. Herein the law of God is above all other laws, that it is a spiritual law. Other laws may forbid compassing and imagining, &c., which are treason in the heart, but cannot take cognizance thereof, unless there be some overt act; but the law of God takes notice of the iniquity regarded in the heart, though it go no farther. "Wash thy heart from wickedness," Jer. iv. 14. "We know that. Wherever there is true grace there is an experimental knowledge of the spirituality of the law of God."

Secondly. The great advantage that he had found by the law. 1. It was discovering. "I had not known sin but by the law," ver. 7. As that which is straight discovers that which is crooked, as the looking-glass shews us our natural face with all its spots and deformities, so there is no way of coming to that knowledge of sin which is necessary to repentance, and consequently to peace and pardon, but by comparing our hearts and lives with the law. Particularly he came to the knowledge of the sinfulness of lust by the law of the tenth commandment. By lust he means sin dwelling in us, sin in its first motions and workings, the corrupt principle. This he came to know when the law said, "Thou shalt not covet." The law spoke in other language than the scribes and Pharisees made it to speak in; it spoke in the spiritual sense and meaning of it. By this he knew that lust was sin, and a very sinful sin, that those motions and desires of the heart towards sin which never came into act were sinful, exceedingly sinful. Paul had a very quick and piercing judgment, all the advantages and improvements of education, and yet never attained the right knowledge of indwelling sin till the Spirit by the law made it known to him. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind than about original corruption, concerning which the understanding is altogether in the dark till the Spirit by the law reveal it, and make it known. Thus "the law is a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ," opens and searches the wound, and so prepares it for healing. Thus sin by the commandment does appear sin, ver. 13; it appears in its own colours, appears to be what it is, and you cannot call it by a worse name than its own. Thus by the commandment it becomes exceeding sinful; that is, it appears to be so. We never see the desperate venom or malignity there is in sin till we come to compare it with the law, and the spiritual nature of the law, and then we see it to be an evil and a bitter thing. 2. It was humbling, ver. 9. "I was alive." He thought himself in a very good condition; he was alive in his own opinion and apprehension, very secure and confident of the goodness of his state. Thus he was "once," scilicet in times past, when he was a Pharisee; for it was the common temper of that generation of men that they had a very good conceit of themselves; and Paul was then like the rest of them, and the reason was he was then without the law. Though brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, though himself a great student in the law, a strict observer of it, and a zealous stickler for it, yet without the law. He had the letter of the law, but he had not the spiritual meaning of it—the shell, but not the kernel. He had the law in his hand and in his head, but he had it not in his heart; the notion of it, but not the power of it. There are a great many who are spiritually dead in sin that yet are alive in their own opinion of themselves, and it is their strangeness to the law that is the cause of the mistake. "But when the commandment came," came in the power of it, not to his eyes only, but to his heart, "sin revived," as the dust in a room rises, (that is, appears,) when the sunshine is let into it. Paul then saw in sin which he had never seen before; he then saw in sin its causes, the bitter root, the corrupt bias, the bent to backside,—sin in its colours, deforming, defiling, breaking a righteous law, affronting an awful Majesty, profaning a sovereign crown by casting it to the ground,—sin in its consequences, sin with death at the heels of it, sin and the curse entailed upon it. "Thus sin revived, and then I died; I lost that good opinion which I had had of myself, and came to be of another mind. "Sin revived, and I died;" that is, the Spirit, by the commandment, convinced me that I was in a state of sin, and in a state of death because of sin." Of this excellent use is the law; it is a lamp and a light; it converts the soul, opens the eyes, prepares the way of the Lord in the desert, renders the rocks, levels the mountains, makes ready a people prepared for the Lord.

Thirdly. The ill use that his corrupt nature made of the law notwithstanding. 1. "Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence," ver. 8. Observe, Paul had in him "all manner of concupiscence," though one of the best unregenerate men that ever was; "as touching the righteousness of the law, blameless," and yet sensible of "all manner of concupiscence." And it was sin that wrought it, indwelling sin, his corrupt nature, (he speaks of a sin that did work sin,) and it took occasion by the commandment. The corrupt nature would not have swelled and raged so much if it had not been for the restraints of the law; as the peccant humours in the body are raised, and more inflamed, by a purge that is not strong enough to carry them off. It is incident to corrupt nature, in velutini siti,—"to lean towards what is forbidden." Ever since Adam ate forbidden fruit we have all been fond of forbidden paths; the diseased appetite is carried out most strongly towards that which is hurtful and prohibited. "Without the law sin was dead," as a snake in winter, which the sunbeams of the law quicken and irritate. 2. It "deceived me." Sin puts a cheat upon the sinner, and it is a fatal cheat, ver. 11. "By it," by the commandment, "slew me." There being in the law no such express threatening against sinful lustings, sin, that is, his own corrupt nature, took occasion thence to promise him impunity, and to say, as the serpent to our first parents, "You shall not surely die." Thus it deceived and slew him. 3. It "wrought death in me by that which is good," ver. 13. That which works concupiscence works death, for sin bringeth forth death. Nothing so good but a corrupt and vicious nature will pervert it, and make it an occasion of sin; no flower so sweet but sin will suck poison out of it. Now in this sin appears sin. The worst thing that sin does, and most like itself, is the perverting of the law, and taking occasion from it to be so much the more malignant. Thus the commandment, which was ordained to life, was intended as a guide in the way to comfort and happiness, proved unto death, through the corruption of nature, ver. 10. Many a precious soul splits upon the rock of salvation; and the same word which to some is an occasion of life unto life is to others an occasion of death unto death. The same sun that makes the garden of flowers more fragrant makes the dunghill more noisome; the same heat that softens wax hardens clay; and the same child was set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel. The way to prevent this mischief is to bow our souls to the commanding authority of the word and law of God, not striving against, but submitting to it.

14 — But I am carnal, sold under sin. 15 For that which I do I allow not: for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. 16 If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good. 17 Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. 18 For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good

vii. 9. "I was alive:" Observe in this passage the alternations of the 'I' and the 'sin;' (1) sin dead, I alive; (2) sin alive, I dead; (3) sin condemned, I emancipated (chap. viii. 2, 3). The first is the condition of nature; the second is the condition of law; the third is the condition of grace" (Vaughan).

vii. 13. "Was then that which is good," &c.: to make the sense clearer, supply, after "sin," the words "became death to me." "It was not that which is good, but sin which became death to me, that it might be shown to be (appear) sin."

vii. 14. "Sold under sin:" i.e., sold so as to become under the power of sin—enslaved to it.

vii. 23. "Another law:" properly, "a different law"—viz., as explained afterwards, the law of sin. "The law of my mind:" "the law accepted by my mind." "Bringing me into captivity:" rather, thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. 19 For the good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. 20 Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. 21 I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me. 22 For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: 23 But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. 24 O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? 25 I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

Here is a description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, between the law of God and the law of sin; and it is applicable two ways: 1. To the struggles that are in a convinced soul, but yet unregenerate, in the person of whom it is supposed, by some, that Paul speaks. 2. To the struggles that are in a renewed sanctified soul, but yet in a state of imperfection, as others apprehend; and a great controversy there is of which of these we are to understand the apostle. So far does the evil prevail here, when he speaks of one sold under sin, doing it, not performing that which is good, that it seems difficult to apply it to the regenerate, who are described to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; and yet so far does the good prevail in hating sin, consenting to the law, delighting in it, serving the law of God with the mind, that it is more difficult to apply it to the unregenerate that are dead in trespasses and sins.

First. Apply it to the struggles that are felt in a convinced soul, that is yet in a state of sin, knows his Lord's will, but does it not; approves the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the law, and yet lives in the constant breach of it, ch. ii. 17-23. Though he has that within him that witnesses against the sin he commits and it is not without a great deal of reluctance that he does commit it, the superior faculties striving against it, natural conscience warning against it before it is committed, and sniting for it afterwards, yet the man continues a slave to his reigning lusts. It is not thus with every unregenerate man, but with those only that are convinced by the law, but not changed by the Gospel. The apostle had said, ch. vi. 14, "Sin shall not have dominion, because you are not under the law, but under grace," for the proof of which he here shews that a man under the law, and not under grace, may be, and is, under the dominion of sin. The law may discover sin, and convince of sin, but it cannot conquer and subdue sin; witness the predominancy of sin in many that are under very strong legal convictions. It discovers the defilement, but will not wash it off. It makes a man weary and heavy laden, Mat. xi. 28, burthens him with his sin, and yet, if rested in, it yields no help towards the shaken off of that burthen; this is to be had only in Christ. The law may make a man cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me?" and yet leave him thus fettered and captivated, as being too weak to deliver him, ch. viii. 3; give him a spirit of bondage to fear, ch. viii. 15. Now a soul advanced thus far by the law is in a fair way towards a state of liberty by Christ, though many rest here and go no farther. Felix trembled, but never came to Christ. It is possible for a man to go to hell with his eyes open, (Nim. xxiv. 3, 4) illuminated with common convictions, and to carry about with him a self-accusing conscience, even in the service of the devil. He may "consent to the law that it is good," delight to know God's ways, (as they, Isa. lviii. 2) may have that within him that witnesses against sin and for holiness; and yet all this overpowered by the reigning love of sin. Drunkards and unclean persons have some faint desires to leave off their sins, and yet persist in them notwithstanding, such is the impotency and such the insufficiency of their convictions. Of such as these there are many that will needs have all this understood, and contend earnestly for it. Though it is very hard to imagine why, if the apostle intended this, he should speak all along in his own person; and not only so, but in the present tense. Of his own state under conviction he had spoken at large, as of a thing past, ver. 7, &c. "I died; the commandment I found to be unto death;" and if here he speaks of the same state as his present state, and the condition he was now in, surely he did not intend to be so understood; and therefore.

Secondly. It seems rather to be understood of the struggles that are maintained between grace and corruption in sanctified souls.

(That Paul throughout the latter part of this chapter is describing his own feelings when writing, appears evident from the following considerations. a. Because he uses the first person and the present tense throughout the passage, and says, "I consent to the law that it is good;" "I delight in the law of God;" "I see another law in my members;" "O wretched man that I am;" "So then I myself serve the law of God;" &c., &c. He does this with an earnestness and warmth which shew that he is expressing the feelings of his own heart. No example is to be found in all the apostle's writings analogous to this, if it be assumed that he is here personating another. b. Because there is nothing in this inconsistent with the experience of the holiest of men. The inward conflict here described every Christian understands and experiences. There are remainders of indwelling corruption, even where there is a living principle of grace, is past dispute; that this corruption is daily breaking forth in sins of infirmity (such as are consistent with a state of grace) is no less certain; "If we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves," 1 Jno. i. 8, 10. c. The passage contains many declarations inconsistent with the Scriptural account of unregenerate men. The Bible does not speak of unregenerate men as consenting to the law, as hating sin, and struggling against it, groaning under it as a tyrant's yoke, as delighting in the law of God, and doing all this as to the inward or new man. d. That true grace strives against these sins and corruptions, does not allow of them, hates them, mourns over them, groans under them as a burden, is likewise certain; Gal. v. 17, "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that you cannot do the things that you would."—H. chiefly.)

These are the truths which I think are contained in this discourse of the apostle; and his design is farther to open the nature of sanctification, that it does not attain to a sinless perfection in this life; and therefore to quicken us to, and encourage us in, our conflicts with remaining corruptions. Our case is not singular, that which we do sincerely strive against shall not be laid to our charge, and through grace the victory is sure at last. The struggle here is like that between Jacob and Esau in the womb, between the Canaanites and Israelites in the land, between the house of Saul and the house of David; but great is the truth and will prevail. Understanding it thus, we may observe here.

What he complains of. The remainder of indwelling corruptions, which he here speaks of, to shew that the law is insufficient to justify even a regenerate man, that the best man in the world hath enough in him to condemn him, if God should deal with him according to the law, which is not the fault of the law, but of our own corrupt nature, which cannot fulfil the law. The repetition of the same things over and over again in this discourse shews how much Paul's heart was affected with what he wrote, and how deep his sentiments were. Observe the particulars of this complaint. 1. "I am carnal, sold under sin," ver. 14; he speaks of the Corinthians as carnal, 1 Cor. iii. 1. Even where there is spiritual life, there are remainders of carnal affection, and so far a man may be sold under sin; he does not sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did, 1 Kin. xxi. 25, but he was sold by Adam when he sinned and fell; sold, as a poor slave that does his master's will against his own will; sold under sin, because conceived in iniquity and born in sin. 2nd. "What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I," ver. 15; and to the same purport, ver. 19, 21. "When I would do good, evil is present with me." Such was the strength of corruptions, that he could not attain that perfection in holiness which he desired and breathed after. Thus, while he was pressing forward towards perfection, yet he acknowledges that he had not already attained, neither was already perfect, Phil. iii. 12. Fain he would be free from all sin, and perfectly do the will of God; such was his settled judgment, but his corrupt nature drew him another way; it was like a clog, that checked and kept him down when he would have soared upward like an eagle, the bias in a bowl, which when it is thrown straight, yet draws it aside. 3rd. "In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good," ver. 18. Here he explains himself concerning the corrupt nature, which he calls flesh; and as far as that goes there is no good to be expected, any more than in the seaside. As the new nature, as far as that goes, cannot commit sin (1 Jno. iii. 9), so the flesh, the old nature, as far as that goes, cannot perform a good duty. How should it? For the flesh serveth the law of sin, ver. 25; it is not likely to do any good. The corrupt nature is elsewhere called flesh, Gen. vi. 3; Jno. iii. 6; and, though there may be good things dwelling in those that have this flesh, yet, as far as the flesh goes, there is no good; the flesh is not a subject capable of any good. 4th. "I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind," ver. 23. The corrupt and sinful inclination is here compared to a law, because it controlled and checked him in his good motions. It is said to be seated in his members, because, Christ having set up his throne in his heart, it was only the rebellious members of the body that were the instruments of sin—in the sensitive appetite; or we may take it more generally for all that corrupt nature which is the seat not only sensual but of more refined lusts. This war against the law of the mind, the new nature; it draws the contrary way, drives on a contrary interest, which corrupt disposition and inclination are as great a burthen and grief to the soul as the worst drudgery and captivity could be. "It brings me into captivity." To the same purport, ver. 25. "With the flesh I serve the law of sin;" that is, the corrupt nature, the unregenerate part, is continually working towards sin. 5th. His general complaint we have, ver. 24, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The thing he complains of is a body of death, either the body of flesh, which is a mortal dying body, (while we carry this body about with us, we shall be troubled with corruption, when we are dead, we shall be freed from sin, and not before,) or the body of sin, the old man, the corrupt nature, which tends to death, that is, to the ruin of the soul. Or, comparing it to a dead body, the touch of which was by the ceremonial law defiling, if actual transgressions be dead works, Heb. ix. 14, original corruption is a dead body. It was as troublesome to Paul as if he had had a dead body tied to him, which he must have carried about with him. (Dr. Doddridge considers that the apostle alludes to the practice of some ancient tyrants, who bound the living bodies of their miserable captives to the dead bodies of others, as represented in the engraving.) This made him cry out, "O wretched man that I am!" A man, that had learned it, every state to be content yet complains thus of his equipped peak of Paul, I

"leading me captive in (as if encircled by the chain of) the law of sin" (Vaughan).

viii. 1. "Therefore:" the immediate inference is drawn from chap. vii. 25; but the general force of it is due to the whole scope of the preceding chapters. "Now" is emphatic; now that in Christ Jesus there is deliverance from this body of sin and death (chap. vii. 24, 25).

viii. 2. "The law of the Spirit of life:" the Holy Spirit is the giver of life. It is to be noted that he speaks not of the Spirit of life, but of the law of the Spirit of life. The force of this expression is to be found by bearing in mind the different laws which St. Paul has spoken of having experienced. There is the law of sin, the law of mind, the law of God, in chap. vii. 22, 23. The law of mind assented to the law of God (verses 16, 22); the law of sin opposed that assent, and carried captive the will (verse 23). The law of the Spirit of life now is shown entering the field of combat, and assuring should have said, "O blessed man that thou art, an ambassador of Christ, a favourite of heaven, a spiritual father of thousands!" But in his own account he was a wretched man, because of the corruption of nature, because he was not so good as he fain would be, had not yet attained, neither was already perfect. Thus miserably does he complain. "Who shall deliver me?" He speaks like one that was sick of it, that would give any thing to be rid of it, looks to the right hand and to the left for some friend that would part between him and his corruptions. The remainders of indwelling sin are a very grievous burthen to a gracious soul.

2. What he comforts himself with. The case was sad, but there were some allays. Three things comforted him:

1st. That his conscience witnessed for him that he had a good principle ruling and prevailing in him notwithstanding. It is well when all does not go one way in the soul. The rule of this good principle which he had was the law of God, to which he here speaks of having a threefold regard, which is certainly to be found in all that are sanctified, and no others: First, "I consent unto the law that it is good," ver. 16; συνιμι.—"I give my vote to the law; here is the approbation of the judgment. Wherever there is grace, there is not only a dread of the severity of the law, but a consent to the goodness of the law." "It is good in itself, it is good for me." This is a sign that the law is written in the heart, that the soul is delivered into the mould of it. To consent to the law is so far to approve of it, as not to wish it otherwise constituted than it is. The sanctified judgment not only concurs to the equity of the law, but to the excellency of it, as convinced that a conformity to the law is the highest perfection of human nature, and the greatest honour and happiness we are capable of. Secondly, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man," ver. 22. His conscience bore witness to a complacency in the law. He delighted not only in the promises of the word, but in the precepts and prohibitions of the word; συνιμι expresses a becoming delight. He did herein concur in affection with all the saints. All that are savingly regenerate, or born again, do truly delight in the law of God, delight to know it, to do it—cheerfully submit to the authority of it, and take a complacency in that submission, never better pleased than when heart and life are in the strictest conformity to the law and will of God. "After the inward man," that is, 1st. The mind or rational faculties, in opposition to the sensitive appetites and wills of the flesh. The soul is the inward man, and that is the seat of gracious delights, which are therefore sincere and serious, but secret; it is the renewing of the inward man, 2 Cor. iv. 16. 2nd. The new nature. The new man is called "the inner man," Eph. iii. 16, "the hidden man of the heart," 1 Pet. iii. 4. Paul, as far as he was sanctified, had a delight in the law of God. Thirdly, "With the mind I myself serve the law of God," ver. 25. It is not enough to consent to the law, and to delight in the law, but we must serve the law; our souls must be entirely delivered up into the obedience of it. Thus it was with Paul's mind; thus it is with every sanctified renewed mind; this is the ordinary course and way; thitherward goes the bent of the soul. "I myself"—αυτός ἐγώ, plainly intimating that he speaks in his own person, and not in the person of another.

2nd. That the fault lay in that corruption of his nature which he did really bewail and strive against: "It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." This he mentions twice, ver. 17, 20, not as an excuse for the guilt of his sin, (it is enough to condemn us if we were under the law, that the sin which does the evil dwelleth in us,) but as a salvo for his evidences, that he might not sink in despair, but take comfort from the covenant of grace, which accepts the willingness of the spirit, and has provided pardon for the weakness of the flesh. He likewise herein enters a protestation against all that which this indwelling sin produced. Having professed his consent to the law of God, he here professes his dissent from the law of sin. "It is not I; I disown the fact; it is against my mind that it is done." As when in the senate the major part are bad, and carry every thing the wrong way, it is indeed the act of the senate, but the honest party strive against it, bewail what is done, and enter their protestation against it, so that it is no more they that do it. "Dwelleth in me," as the Canaanites among the Israelites, though they were put under tribute; dwelleth in me, and is likely to dwell there, while I live.

3rd. His great comfort lay in Jesus Christ; ver. 25, "I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." In the midst of his complaints he breaks out into praises. It is a special remedy against fears and sorrows to be much in praise; many a poor drooping soul hath found it so. And, in all our praises, this should be the burthen of the song, "Blessed be God for Jesus Christ." "Who shall deliver me?" says he, ver. 24, as one at a loss for help. At length he finds an all-sufficient friend, even Jesus Christ. When we are under the sense of the remaining power of sin and corruption, we shall see reason to bless God through Christ,—for, as he is the Mediator of all our prayers, so he is of all our praises,—to bless God for Christ; it is he that stands between us and the wrath due to us for this sin. If it were not for Christ, that iniquity that dwells in us would certainly be our ruin. He is our Advocate with the Father, and through him God pities, and spares, and pardons, and lays not our iniquities to our charge. It is Christ that has purchased deliverance for us in due time. Through Christ death will put an end to all these complaints, and wait us to an eternity which we shall spend without sin or sigh. "Blessed be God that giveth us this victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

[Paul cries out in the agonies of his internal conflict, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" And I would have you to mark how instantaneous the transition is, from the cry of distress to the gratitude of his felt and immediate deliverance; "I thank God through Jesus Christ my Lord." This we hold to be the exercise of every true Christian in the world. Evil is present with him; and he blames none but himself for its hateful and degrading instigations. But grace is in readiness, not to sweep away this evil as to its existence, but to subdue it as to its prevalency and power; and, while he blames none but himself for all that is corrupt, he thanks none but God in Christ for all that is gracious and good in him.—C.]

CHAPTER VIII.

The apostle, having fully explained the doctrine of justification, and pressed the necessity of sanctification, in this chapter applies himself to the consolation of the Lord's people. Ministers are helpers of the joy of the saints. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people," so runs our commission, Isa. xl. 1. It is the will of God that his people should be a comforted people. And we have here such a draught of the gospel charter, such a display of the unspeakable privileges of true believers, as may furnish us with abundant matter for joy and peace in believing, that by all these immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation. Many of the people of God have, accordingly, found this chapter a well-spring of comfort to their souls, living and dying, and have sucked and been satisfied from these breasts of consolation and with joy drawn water out of these wells of salvation. There are three things in this chapter: I. The particular instances of Christians' privileges, ver. 1—28. "The ground thereof laid in predestination, ver. 29, 30. III. The apostle's triumph herein in the name of all the saints, ver. 31, to the end.

the emancipated one (Christ having rescued from condemnation) of final victory. "Hath made me free:" the historic tense here used should be rendered "freed me," or "set me free." The words "in Christ Jesus" must be connected with the idea of freedom—"in Christ Jesus set me free."

viii. 3. "Sinful flesh;" rather, "the likeness of the flesh of sin"—i.e., in a body like to that of sinful men. (Compare Phil. ii. 7.) "Condemned sin in the flesh;" rather, "condemned the sin in the

HERE is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. 2 For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. 3 For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: 4 That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. 5 For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit. 6 For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. 7 Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. 8 So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. 9 But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

First. The apostle here begins with one signal privilege of true Christians, and describes the character of those to whom it belongs: "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus," ver. 1. This is his triumph after that melancholy complaint and conflict in the foregoing chapter: sin remaining, disturbing, vexing, but, blessed be God, not ruining. The complaint he takes to himself, but humbly transfers the comfort with himself to all true believers, who are all interested in it. 1. It is the unspeakable privilege and comfort of all those that are in Christ Jesus, that there is therefore now no condemnation to them. He does not say, "There is no accusation against them," for this there is; but the accusation is thrown out, and the indictment quashed. He does not say, "There is nothing in them that deserves condemnation, for this there is, and they see it, and own it, and mourn over it, and condemn themselves for it; but it shall not be their ruin. He does not say, 'There is no cross, no affliction to them, or no displeasure in the affliction,' for this there may be; but 'no condemnation.' They may be chastened of the Lord, but not condemned with the world. Now this arises from their being in Christ Jesus; by virtue of their union with him through faith they are thus secured. They are in Christ Jesus, as in their city of refuge, and so are protected from the avenger of blood. He is their Advocate, and brings them off. There is therefore no condemnation, because they are interested in the satisfaction that Christ by dying made to the law. In Christ, God does not only not condemn them, but is well pleased with them, Mat. xvii. 5. 2. It is the undoubted character of all those who are so in Christ Jesus as to be freed from condemnation, that they "walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Observe. The character is given from their walk, not from any one particular act, but from their course and way. And the great question is, what is the principle of the walk, the flesh or the Spirit, the old or the new nature, corruption or grace? Which of these do we mind, for which of these do we make provision, by which of these are we governed, which of these do we take part with?

Secondly. This great truth, thus laid down, he illustrates in the following verses; and shews how we come by this great privilege, and how we may answer this character.

1. How we come by these privileges—the privilege of justification, that there is no condemnation to us—the privilege of sanctification, that we walk after the Spirit, and not after the flesh, which is no less our privilege than it is our duty. How comes it about?

1st. The law could not do it, ver. 3. It could neither justify nor sanctify; neither free us from the guilt nor from the power of sin, having not the promises either of pardon or grace. The law made nothing perfect; "It was weak." Some attempt the law made towards these blessed ends, but, alas! it was weak, it could not accomplish them; yet that weakness was not through any defect in the law, but "through the flesh," through the corruption of human nature, by which we became incapable either of being justified or sanctified by the law. We had become unable to keep the law, and, in case of failure, the law, as a covenant of works, made no provision, and so left us as it found us. Or, understand it of the ceremonial law; that was a plaister not wide enough for the wound; it could never take away sin, Heb. x. 4.

In the Westminster Confession of Faith, in which an explanation of the verse before us is given, it is said, "Albeit the apostle himself, [brought in here for example's sake,] and all other true believers in Christ, be by nature under the law of sin and death, or under the covenant of works, [called the law of sin and death, because it bindeth sin and death upon us, till Christ set us free,] yet the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, or the covenant of grace, so called because it doth enable and quicken a man to a spiritual life through Christ, doth set the apostle, and all true believers, free from the covenant of works, or the law of sin and death; so that every man may say with him, 'The law of the Spirit of life, or the covenant of grace, hath made me free from the law of sin and death, or covenant of works.' The import then of the verse flesh"—i.e., sentenced all sin to death in the (his, or Christ's) flesh. "The obedience of Christ unto death (Phil. ii. 8) in human flesh was sin's death-warrant. Henceforth sin might linger a few days or centuries, but it is as a condemned thing, doomed to die. Compare John xii. 31; Rev. xii. 5—12; Eph. ii. 15; Col. i. 20, ii. 15" (Vaughan).

viii. 4. "That the righteousness of the law," &c.: better, "That the righteous demand or requirement of the law." "Flesh" and before us is, that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, because, by their union with him—being dead to the law by the body of Christ, and being married to him who is raised from the dead, ch. vii. 4—they have been freed from the curse of that law, which, though good in itself, is the occasion of sin and death to all who remain under it, and are consequently justified before God.—R. H.]

2nd. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" does it, ver. 2. The covenant of grace made with us in Christ is a treasury of merit and grace, and thence we receive pardon and a new nature, are freed "from the law of sin and death," that is, both from the guilt and power of sin,—from the curse of the law, and the dominion of the flesh. We are under another covenant, another master, another husband, under "the law of the Spirit," the law that gives the Spirit, spiritual life, to qualify us for eternal. The foundation of this freedom is laid in Christ's undertaking for us, of which he speaks ver. 3, "God sending his own Son." Observe, When the law failed, God provided another method. Christ comes to do that which the law could not do. Moses brought the children of Israel to the borders of Canaan, and then died, and left them there; but Joshua did that which Moses could not do, and put them in possession of Canaan. Thus what the law could not do Christ did. The best exposition of this verse we have Heb. x. 1–10. To make the sense of the words clear, which in our translation is a little intricate, we may read it thus, with a little transposition: "God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, &c., ver. 4. Observe, First. The Divine nature of Christ.

"His own Son;" him who is a partaker of his nature. This is the meaning of the word Son as applied to Christ: see ch. i. 4; Jno. i. 14; v. 17, &c.; x. 30–39. The greatness of the gift, and the urgency of the necessity are therefore presented in the strongest light by these few words.—H.]

Secondly. How Christ appeared: "In the likeness of sinful flesh." Not sinful, for he was holy, harmless, undefiled, but in the likeness of that flesh which was sinful. He took upon him that nature which was corrupt, though perfectly abstracted from the corruptions of it. His being circumcised, redeemed, baptized with John's baptism, bespeaks the likeness of sinful flesh. The bitings of the fiery serpents were cured by a serpent of brass, which had the shape, though free from the venom, of the serpents that bit them. It was great condescension that he who was God should be made in the likeness of flesh; but much greater that he who was holy should be made in the likeness of sinful flesh. "And for sin;" here the best Greek copies place the comma. God sent him, ἐν ὁμοιότητι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας,—"in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sacrifice for sin." The Seventy call a sacrifice for sin no more than περὶ ἁμαρτίας,—"for sin;" so Christ was a sacrifice; he was sent to be so, Heb. ix. 26.

Thirdly. What was done by this appearance of his. Sin was condemned, that is, God did therein more than ever manifest his hatred of sin; and not only so, but, for all that are Christ's, both the damning and the domineering power of sin is broken and taken out of the way. He that is condemned can neither accuse nor rule; his testimony is null, and his authority null. Thus by Christ is sin condemned; though it live and remain, its life in the saints is still but like that of a condemned malefactor. It was by the condemning of sin that death was disarmed, and the devil, who had the power of death, destroyed. The condemning of sin saved the sinner from condemnation. Christ was made sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21, and, being so made, when he was condemned sin was condemned in the flesh of Christ, condemned in the human nature; so was satisfaction made to Divine justice, and way made for the salvation of the sinner. Fourthly. The happy effect of this upon us; ver. 4, "That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us." Both in our justification and in our sanctification the righteousness of the law is fulfilled. A righteousness of satisfaction for the breach of the law is fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's complete and perfect righteousness, which answers the utmost demands of the law, as the mercy-seat was as long and as broad as the ark. A righteousness of obedience to the commands of the law is fulfilled in us, when by the Spirit the law of love is written upon the heart, and that love is the fulfilling of the law, ch. xiii. 10. Though the righteousness of the law is not fulfilled by us, yet, blessed be God, it is fulfilled in us. There is that to be found upon and in all true believers which answers the intention of the law. "Us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." This is the description of all those that are interested in this privilege, they act from spiritual and not from carnal principles; as for others, the righteousness of the law will be fulfilled upon them in their ruin. Now,

2. Observe how we may answer to this character, ver. 5, &c.

1st. By looking to our minds. How may we know whether we are after the flesh or after the Spirit? By examining what we mind, the things of the flesh, or the things of the Spirit. Carnal pleasure, worldly profit and honour, the things of sense and time, are the things of the flesh, which unregenerate people mind. The favour of God, the welfare of the soul, the concerns of eternity, are the things of the Spirit, which those that are after the Spirit do mind. The man is as the mind is; the mind is the forge of thoughts. "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he," Pr. xxiii. 7. Which way do the thoughts move with most pleasure? On what do they dwell with most satisfaction? The mind is the seat of wisdom. Which way go the projects and contrivances? whether are we more wise for the world or for our souls? φρονέοντες τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς,—"they savour the things of the flesh," so the word is rendered, Mat. xvi. 23. It is a great matter what our savour is, what truths, what tidings, what comforts, we do most relish, and are most agreeable to us. Now, to caution us against this carnal-mindedness, he shews the great misery and malignity of it, and compares it with the unspeakable excellency and comfort of spiritual-mindedness. First. It is death, ver. 6. It is spiritual death, the certain way to eternal death. It is the death of the soul; for it is its alienation from God, in union and communion with whom the life of the soul consists. A carnal soul is a dead soul, dead as a soul can die. "She that liveth in pleasure is dead," 1 Tim. v. 6, not only dead in law as guilty, but dead in state as carnal. Death includes all misery; carnal souls are miserable souls. But "to be spiritually minded," (φρονέοντα τοῦ πνεύματος),—"a spiritual savour," the wisdom that is from above, a principle of grace,—"is life and peace;" it is the felicity and happiness of the soul. The life of the soul consists in its union with spiritual things by the mind; a sanctified soul is a living soul, and that life is peace; it is a very comfortable life. All the paths of spiritual wisdom are paths of peace. It is life and peace in the other world, as well as in this. Spiritual-mindedness is eternal life and peace begun, and an assuring earnest of the perfection of it. Secondly. It is enmity to God, ver. 7, and this is worse than the former. The former speaks the carnal sinner a dead man, which is bad; but this speaks him a devil of a man. It is not only an enemy, but enmity itself. It is not only the alienation of the soul from God, but the opposition of the soul against God; it rebels against his authority, thwarts his design, opposes his interest, spits in his face, spurns at his bowels. Can there be a greater enmity? An enemy may be reconciled, but enmity cannot. How should this humble us for, and warn us against, carnal-mindedness! Shall we harbour and indulge that which is enmity to God our creator, owner, ruler, and benefactor? To prove this, he urges that "it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." The holiness of the law of God, and the unholiness of the carnal mind, are as irreconcilable as light and darkness. The carnal man may, by the power of Divine grace, be made subject to the law of God, but the carnal mind never can; this must be broken and expelled. See how wretchedly the corrupt will of man is enslaved to sin; as far as the carnal mind prevails, there is no inclination to the law of God; therefore, wherever there is a change wrought it is by the power of God's grace, not by the freedom of man's will. Hence he infers, ver. 8, "Those that are in the flesh cannot please God." Those that are in a carnal unregenerate state, under the reigning power of sin, cannot do the things that please God, wanting grace, the pleasing principle, and an interest in Christ, the pleasing Mediator. The very sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination, Pr. xv. 8. Pleasing God is our highest end, of which those that are in the flesh cannot but fall short; they cannot please him, nay, they cannot but displease him. We may know our state and character.

2nd. By inquiring whether we have the Spirit of God and Christ, or not; ver. 9. "You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit." This expresses states and conditions of the soul vastly different. All the saints have flesh and spirit in them, but to be in the flesh and to be in the Spirit are contrary. It denotes our being overcome and subdued by one of these principles. As we say, a man is in love, or in drink, that is, overcome by it. Now the great question is, whether we are in the flesh or in the Spirit; and how may we come to know it? Why, by inquiring whether the Spirit of God dwell in us. The Spirit dwelling in us is the best evidence of our being in the Spirit, for the indwelling is mutual; 1 Jno. iv. 16, "Dwelleth in God, and God in him." The Spirit visits many that are unregenerate with his motions, which they resist and quench; but in all that are sanctified he dwells; there he resides and rules. He is there as a man at his own house, where he is constant and welcome, and has the dominion. Shall we put this question to our hearts, Who dwells, who rules, who keeps house here? Which interest has the ascendant? To this he subjoins a general rule of trial; "If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." To be Christ's (that is, to be a Christian indeed, one of his children, his servants, his friends, in union with him) is a privilege and honour which many pretend to that have no part nor lot in the matter. None are his but those that have his Spirit; that is, First. That are spirited as he was spirited,—are meek, and lowly, and humble, and peaceable, and patient, and charitable, as he was. We cannot tread in his steps unless we have his Spirit; the frame and disposition of our souls must be conformable to Christ's pattern.

[This, perhaps, is the right place for adverting to the way in which it has been endeavoured to make all that is revealed of the Holy Ghost, and of his regenerating influence upon man, more palatable than it naturally is to unregenerate taste,—more fitted to satisfy the demand which obtains for a religion that shall be altogether rational and devoid of mystery. One, it is thought, may be rightly enough said to have the Spirit of God if, from any cause whatever, it so happens that there be a resemblance of character and disposition and principle between him and the Divinity: just as any active and devoted philanthropist of our day may be said to have the spirit of Howard, without its ever being imagined that there has been any transmigration into his body of that soul by which the body of Howard was animated.—To have the Spirit of Christ is here to be understood, not in the light of our possessing a kindred character to that of Christ, but of our being the subjects of an actual and personal inhabitation by the Spirit. The Spirit of God may be denominated the Spirit of Christ, either because the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son, or, more particularly, because the Son, now that he is exalted at the Father's right hand, is intrusted with the dispensation of the Spirit.—Hence the Spirit of God and the Spirit of Christ are equivalent the one to the other. And as the Saviour uniformly regenerates all whom he redeems—as the conjunction is invariable, between the penalty being lifted off from our persons and a purifying influence being laid upon our characters,—as it is true, even in the moral sense of the term, that if he wash us not we have no part in him,—the truth is inevitable, and cannot be too urgently impressed on all our consciences, that if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his.—C.]

Secondly. That are actuated and guided by the Holy Spirit of God, as a sanctifier, teacher, and comforter. Having the Spirit of Christ is the same with having the Spirit of God to dwell in us. But those two come much to one; for all that are actuated by the Spirit of God as their rule are conformable to the Spirit of Christ as their pattern. Now this description of the character of those to whom belongs this first privilege of freedom from condemnation is to be applied to all the other privileges that follow.

10 And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness. 11 But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. 12 Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. 13 For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. 14 For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. 15 For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. 16 The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God:

In these verses the apostle represents two more excellent benefits, which belong to true believers:

First. Life. The happiness is not barely a negative happiness, not to be condemned; but it is positive, it is an advancement to a life that will be the unspeakable happiness of the man, ver. 10, 11. "If Christ be in you." Observe, If the Spirit be in us, Christ is in us. He dwells in the heart by faith, Eph. iii. 17. Now we are here told what becomes of the bodies and souls of those in whom Christ is.

1. We cannot say but that the body is dead; it is a frail, mortal, dying body

"spirit:" the contrast between these is drawn out in the following verses. The word "flesh" includes both what are called in 1 Thess. v. 23 "soul" and "body," and may be taken to embrace all the desires, appetites, and capacities of the natural man (1 Cor. ii. 14); the "spirit" signifies the renovated inner man, quickened and animated by the Holy Spirit.

viii. 10. "Because of sin . . . because of righteousness:" for "because" read "on account of," or "by reason of." The body, with its lusts and passions, is treated by the Christian as a dead thing. The spirit is life, full of energy and vigour, animated by the Spirit of life. "By reason of righteousness:" in the Commentary this righteousness is taken in a wide sense, including the righteousness of justification and of sanctification. Alford limits the meaning to the latter, viz., the implanted righteousness of the sanctification of the Spirit.

viii. 15. "Bondage again to fear:" the spirit received by the

and it will be dead shortly; it is a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust. The life purchased and promised does not immortalize the body in its present state. It is dead, that is, it is appointed to die, it is under a sentence of death; as we say one that is condemned is a dead man. In the midst of life we are in death; be our bodies ever so strong, and healthful, and handsome, they are as good as dead, Heb. xi. 12, and this "because of sin." It is sin that kills the body. This effect the first threatening has, Gen. iii. 19, "Dust thou art." Methinks, were there no other argument, love to our bodies should make us hate sin, because it is such an enemy to our bodies. The death even of the bodies of the saints is a remaining token of God's displeasure against sin.

2. But the spirit, the precious soul, that is life; it is now spiritually alive, nay, it is life. Grace in the soul is its new nature; the life of the saint lies in the soul, while the life of the sinner goes no farther than the body. When the body dies, and returns to the dust, "the spirit is life;" not only living and immortal, but swallowed up of life. Death to the saints is but the freeing of the heaven-born spirit from the clog and load of this body, that it may be fit to partake of eternal life. When Abraham was dead, yet God was the God of Abraham, for even then his spirit was life, Mat. xxii. 31, 32; see Ps. xlix. 15. And this "because of righteousness." The righteousness of Christ imputed to them secures the soul, the better part, from death; the righteousness of Christ inherent in them, the renewed image of God upon the soul, preserves it, and, by God's ordination, at death elevates it, and improves it, and makes it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light. The eternal life of the soul consists in the vision and fruition of God, and both assimilating, for which the soul is qualified by the righteousness of sanctification. I refer to Ps. xvii. 15, "I will behold thy face in righteousness."

3. There is a life reserved, too, for the poor body at last; "He shall also quicken your mortal bodies," ver. 11. The Lord is for the body; and though at death it is cast aside as a despoiled, broken vessel, vessel in which is no pleasure, yet God will have a desire to the work of his hands, Job xiv. 15, will remember his covenant with dust, and will not lose a grain of it; but the body shall be reunited to the soul, and clothed with a glory agreeable to it. Vile bodies shall be newly fashioned, Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 42. Two great assurances of the resurrection of the body are mentioned: 1st. The resurrection of Christ, "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken." Christ rose as the head, and firstfruits, and forerunner of all the saints, 1 Cor. xv. 20. The body of Christ lay in the grave, under the sin of all the elect imputed, and broke through it. "O grave, then, where is thy victory? It is in the virtue of Christ's resurrection that we shall rise." 2nd. The indwelling of the Spirit. The same Spirit that raised the soul now will raise the body shortly, "By his Spirit that dwelleth in you." The bodies of the saints are the temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. Now, though these temples may be suffered for awhile to lie in ruins, yet they shall be rebuilt. The tabernacle of David, which has fallen down, shall be repaired, whatever great mountains may be in the way. The Spirit, breathing upon dead and dry bones, will make them live, and the saints, even in their flesh, shall see God. Hence the apostle by the way, infers how much it is our duty to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, ver. 12, 13. Let not our life be after the wills and motions of the flesh. Two motives he mentions here: First. We are not debtors to the flesh, neither by relation, gratitude, nor any other bond or obligation. We owe no feed nor service to our carnal desires; we are indeed bound to clothe, and feed, and take care of the body, as a servant to the flesh never did use so much kindness as to oblige it to serve it. It is implied then we are debtors to Christ and to the Spirit; there we owe our all, as we have and all we can do, by a thousand bonds and obligations. Being delivered from so great a death by so great a ransom, we are deeply indebted to our deliverer: see Cor. vi. 19, 20. Secondly. Consider the consequences; what will be at the end of the way. Here are life and death, blessing and cursing, set before us. "If you live after the flesh you shall die;" that is, die eternally. It is the pleasing, and serving, and gratifying of the flesh that are the ruin of souls; that is, the second death. Dying indeed is the soul's dying; the death of the saints is but a sleep. But, on the other hand, "You shall live,"—live and be happy to eternity; that is the true life,—"if you through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body," subdue and keep under all fleshly lusts and affections, deny yourselves in the pleasing and humouring of the body, and this through the Spirit. We cannot do it without the Spirit working it in us, and the Spirit will not do it without our doing our endeavour. So that, in a word, we are put upon this dilemma, either to displease the body or destroy the soul.

Secondly. The Spirit of adoption is another privilege belonging to those that are in Christ Jesus, ver. 14—16.

1. All that are Christ's are taken into the relation of children to God, ver. 14. Observe. 1st. Their property. They are "led by the Spirit of God," as a scholar in his learning is led by his tutor, as a traveller in his journey is led by his guide, as a soldier in his engagement is led by his captain; not driven as beasts, but led as rational creatures, drawn with the cords of a man and the bands of love. It is the undoubted character of all true believers that they are led by the Spirit of God. Having submitted themselves in believing to his guidance, they do in their obedience follow that guidance, and are sweetly led into all truth and all duty. 2nd. Their privilege. "They are the sons of God," received into the number of God's children by adoption, owned and loved by him as his children.

2. And those that are the sons of God have the Spirit, 1st. To work in them the disposition of children. First. "You have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear," ver. 15. Understand it, 1st. Of that spirit of bondage which the Old Testament church was under, by reason of the darkness and terror of that dispensation. The veil signified bondage, 2 Cor. iii. 15; compare ver. 17. The spirit of adoption was not then so plentifully poured out as now; for the law opened the wound, but little of the remedy. Now you are not under that dispensation, you have not received that spirit. 2nd. Of that spirit of bondage which many of the saints themselves were under at their conversion, under the convictions of sin and wrath set home by the Spirit; as those in Acts ii. 37; the gaoler, Acts xvi. 30; Paul, says the apostle, "with you this is over." "God as a judge," says Dr. Manton, "by the spirit of bondage, sends us to Christ as Mediator, and Christ as Mediator, by the spirit of adoption, sends us back again to God as a Father." Though a child of God may come under fear of bondage again, and may be questioning his sonship, yet the blessed Spirit is not again a spirit of bondage, for then he would witness an untruth. Secondly. But "you have received the spirit of adoption." Men may give a charter of adoption; but it is God's prerogative, when he adopts, to give a spirit of adoption, the nature of children. The spirit of adoption works in the children of God a filial love to God as a Father, a delight in him and a dependence upon him as a Father. A sanctified soul bears the image of God, as the child bears the image of the father. "Whereby we cry, Abba, Father." Praying is here called crying, which is not only an earnest, but a natural expression of desire; children that cannot speak vent their desires by crying. Now, the Spirit teaches us in prayer to come to God as a Father, with a holy, humble confidence, emboldening the soul in that duty. "Abba, Father."

Christian is not one of bondage, but of sonship and adoption. "Ye did not receive the spirit of bondage (leading) back unto fear" i.e., so as to bring about or result in fear (chap. vi. 19).

viii. 16. "With our spirit:" the idea is harmony of witness between the Spirit of God and our own spirit to the fact of our sonship. The word "with" our spirit suggests the notion of witness given at the same time. Alford renders "to" our spirit, with the view of expressing more strongly the idea of agreement in the fact.

Abba is a Syriac word, signifying 'father,' or 'my father'; πάτερ, a Greek word; and why both, "Abba, Father?" Because Christ said so in prayer, Mar. xiv. 36, "Abba, Father;" and we have received the Spirit of the Son. It denotes an affectionate, endearing importunity, and a believing stress laid upon the relation. Little children begging of their parents can say little but "Father, father," and that is rhetoric enough. It also denotes that the adoption is common both to Jews and Gentiles; the Jews call him Abba in their language, the Greeks may call him πάτερ in their language; for in Christ Jesus there is neither Greek nor Jew.

2nd. To witness to the relation of children, ver. 16. The former is the work of the Spirit as a sanctifier, this as a comforter. "Beareth witness with our spirit." Many a man has the witness of his own spirit to the goodness of his state who has not the concurring testimony of the Spirit. Many speak peace to themselves to whom the God of heaven does not speak peace. But those that are sanctified have God's Spirit witnessing with their spirits, which is to be understood not of any immediate extraordinary revelation, but an ordinary work of the Spirit, in and by the means of comfort, speaking peace to the soul. This testimony is always agreeable to the written word, and is therefore always grounded upon sanctification; for the Spirit in the heart cannot contradict the Spirit in the word. The Spirit witnesses to none the privileges of children who have not the nature and disposition of children.

17 And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. 18 For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. 19 For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. 20 For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, 21 Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. 22 For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. 23 And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. 24 For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? 25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it.

In these words the apostle describes a fourth illustrious branch of the happiness of believers, namely, a title to the future glory. This is fitly annexed to our sonship; for as the adoption of sons entitles us to that of glory, so the disposition of sons fits and prepares us for it. "If children, then heirs," ver. 17. In earthly inheritances this rule does not hold, only the first-born are heirs; but the church is a church of first-born, for they are all heirs. Heaven is an inheritance that all the saints are heirs to. They do not come to it as purchasers, by any merit or procurement of their own; but as heirs, purely by the act of God, for God makes heirs. The saints are heirs, though in this world they are heirs under age: see Gal. iv. 1, 2. Their present state is a state of education and preparation for the inheritance. How comfortable should this be to all the children of God, how little soever they have in possession, that, being heirs, they have enough in reversion! But the honour and happiness of an heir lie in the value and worth of that which he is heir to; we read of those that inherit the wind, and therefore we have here an abstract of the premises. 1. "Heirs of God." The Lord himself is the portion of the saints' inheritance, Ps. xvi. 5, a goodly heritage, ver. 6. The saints are spiritual priests, that have the Lord for their inheritance, Num. xviii. 20. The vision of God and the fruition of God make up the inheritance the saints are heirs to. God himself will be with them, and will be their God, Rev. xxi. 3. 2. "Joint-heirs with Christ." Christ, as Mediator, is said to be the heir of all things, Heb. i. 2, and true believers, by virtue of their union with him, shall inherit all things, Rev. xxi. 7. Those that now partake of the Spirit of Christ, as his brethren, shall, as his brethren, partake of his glory, Jno. xvii. 24; shall sit down with him upon his throne, Rev. iii. 21. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst thus magnify him! Now, this future glory is farther spoken of as the reward of present sufferings, and as the accomplishment of present hopes.

First. As the reward of the saints' present sufferings; and it is a rich reward; "If so be that we suffer with him," ver. 17, or "forasmuch as we suffer with him." The state of the church in this world always is, but was then especially, an afflicted state; to be a Christian was certainly to be a sufferer. Now, to comfort them in reference to those sufferings, he tells them that they suffered with Christ, for his sake, for his honour, and for the testimony of a good conscience, and should be glorified with him. Those that suffered with David in his persecuted state were advanced by him and with him when he came to the crown: see 2 Tim. ii. 12. See the gains of suffering for Christ; though we may be losers for him we shall not, we cannot, be losers by him in the end. This the Gospel is filled with the assurances of. Now that suffering saints may have strong supports and consolations from their hopes of heaven, he holds the balance, ver. 18, in a comparison between the two, which is observable. 1. In one scale he puts "the sufferings of this present time." The sufferings of the saints are but sufferings of this present time, strike no deeper than the things of time, last no longer than the present time, 2 Cor. iv. 17, light affliction, and but for a moment. So that on the sufferings he writes tekel, weighed in the balance, and found light. 2. In the other scale he puts the glory, and finds that viii. 17. "If we suffer with him:" "if we are suffering with him"—i.e., provided that we are found in that course of participation in Christ's sufferings.

viii. 19. "The earnest expectation of the creature:" rather, "of the creation"—the whole earth in its present state, the world of Nature, "all animate and inanimate Nature, as distinguished from mankind." For this renovation of all things compare Isa. xi. 6, &c.; Acts iii. 21; 2 Peter iii. 13.

a weight, an exceeding and eternal weight, "Glory that shall be revealed." In our present state we come short, not only in the enjoyment, but in the knowledge of that glory, 1 Cor. ii. 9; 1 Jno. iii. 2; it shall be revealed. It surpasses all that we have yet seen and known; present vouchsafements are sweet and precious, very precious, very sweet; but there is something to come, something behind the curtain, that will outshine all. "Shall be revealed in us;" not only revealed to us, to be seen, but revealed in us, to be enjoyed. The kingdom of God is within you, and will be so to eternity. 3. He concludes the sufferings "not worthy to be compared with the glory."—οὐκ ἄξια πρὸς τὴν δόξαν. They cannot merit that glory; and if suffering for Christ will not merit, much less will doing. They should not at all deter and frighten us from the diligent and earnest pursuit of that glory. The sufferings are small and short, and concern the body only; but the glory is rich and great, and concerns the soul, and is eternal. This he reckons: "I reckon,"—λογίζομαι. It is not a rash and sudden determination, but the product of a very serious and deliberate consideration. He had reasoned the case within himself, weighed the arguments on both sides, and thus at last resolves the point. O how vastly different is the sentence of the word from the sentiment of the world concerning the sufferings of this present time! "I reckon," as an arithmetician that is balancing an account. He first sums up what is disbursed for Christ in the sufferings of this present time, and finds they come to very little; he then sums up what is secured to us by Christ in the glory that shall be revealed, and this he finds to be an infinite sum, transcending all conception, the disbursement abundantly made up, and the losses infinitely counterbalanced. And who would be afraid then to suffer for Christ, who, as he is beforehand with us in suffering, so he will not be behindhand with us in recompence? Now Paul was as competent a judge of this point as ever any mere man was. He could reckon, not by art only, but by experience, for he knew both. He knew what the sufferings of this present time were: see 2 Cor. xi. 23–28. He knew what the glory of heaven is: see 2 Cor. xii. 3, 4. And, upon the view of both, he gives this judgment here. There is nothing like a believing view of the glory which shall be revealed to support and bear up the spirit under all the sufferings of this present time. The reproach of Christ appears riches to those who have respect to the recompence of reward, Heb. xi. 26.

Secondly. As the accomplishment of the saints' present hopes and expectations, ver. 19, &c. As the saints are suffering for it, so they are waiting for it. Heaven is therefore sure; for God by his Spirit would not raise and encourage those hopes only to defeat and disappoint them. He will establish that word unto his servants on which he has caused them to hope, Ps. cxix. 49, and heaven is therefore sweet; for if hope deferred makes the heart sick, surely when the desire comes, it will be a tree of life, Pr. xiii. 12. Now he observes an expectation of this glory,

1. In the creatures, ver. 19–22. That must needs be a great, a transcendent glory, which all the creatures are so earnestly expecting and longing for. This observation in these verses has some difficulty in it, which puzzles interpreters a little; and the more because it is a remark not made in any other Scripture, with which it might be compared. By the creature here we understand, not as some do, the Gentile world, and their expectation of Christ and the Gospel, which is an exposition very foreign and forced, but the whole frame of nature, especially that of this lower world, the whole creation, the companies of inanimate and insensible creatures, which, because of their harmony and mutual dependence, and because they all constitute and make up one world, are spoken of in the singular number as the creature. The sense of the apostle in these four verses we may take in the following observations: 1st. That there is a present vanity to which the creature, by reason of the sin of man, is made subject, ver. 20. When man sinned, the ground was cursed for man's sake, and with it all the creatures,—especially of this lower world, where our acquaintance lies,—became subject to that curse, became mutable and mortal. "Under the bondage of corruption," ver. 21. There is an impurity, deformity, and infirmity, which the creature has contracted by the fall of man; the creation is sullied and stained, much of the beauty of the world gone. There is an enmity of one creature to another; they are all subject to continual alteration and decay of the individuals, liable to the strokes of God's judgments upon man. When the world was drowned, and almost all the creatures in it, surely then it was subject to vanity indeed. The whole species of creatures is designed for, and is hastening to, a total dissolution by fire. And it is not the least part of their vanity and bondage that they are used, or abused, rather, by men as instruments of sin. The creatures are often abused to the dishonour of their Creator, the hurt of his children, or the service of his enemies. When the creatures are made the food and fuel of our lusts, they are subject to vanity, they are captivated by the law of sin. And this not willingly, but of their own choice. All the creatures desire their own perfection and consummation; when they are made instruments of sin, it is not willingly. Or, they are thus captivated, not for any sin of their own, which they had committed, but for man's sin. "By reason of him who hath subjected the same." Adam did it meritoriously; the creatures being delivered to him, when he by sin delivered himself he delivered them likewise into the bondage of corruption. God did it judicially; he passed a sentence upon the creatures for the sin of man, by which they become subject. And this yoke, poor creatures, they bear in hope that it will not be so always. Ἐν ἁπλῇ ἐλπίδι, &c.,—"in hope that the creature itself," so many Greek copies join the words. We have reason to pity the poor creatures that for our sin have become subject to vanity. 2nd. That the creatures groan and travail in pain together under this vanity and corruption, ver. 22. It is a figurative expression. Sin is a burthen to the whole creation; the sin of the Jews in crucifying Christ, set the earth a quaking under them. The idols were a burthen to the weary breast, Isa. xlvi. 1. There is a general outcry of the whole creation against the sin of man; the stone crieth out of the wall, Hab. ii. 11; the land cries, Job xxxi. 38. 3rd. That the creature that is now thus burthened shall, at the time of the restitution of all things, be "delivered from this bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God," ver. 21; they shall no more be subject to vanity and corruption, and the other fruits of the curse; but, on the contrary, this lower world shall be renewed. When there will be new heavens there will be a new earth, 2 Pet. iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1; and there shall be a glory conferred upon all the creatures, which shall be, in the proportion of their natures, as suitable and as great an advancement as the glory of the children of God shall be to them. The fire at the last day shall be a refining, not a destroying, annihilating fire. What becomes of the souls of brutes, that go downwards, none can tell. But it should seem by the Scripture that there will be some kind of restoration of them. And if it be objected, what use will they be of to glorified saints? we may suppose them of as much use as they were to Adam in innocence; and if it be only to illustrate the wisdom, power, and goodness of their Creator, that is enough; compare with this Ps. xvi. 10–13; Ps. lxxvii. 7–9. "Let the heavens rejoice before the Lord, for he cometh." 4th. That the creature doth therefore earnestly expect and wait for "the manifestation of the children of God," ver. 19. Observe, At the second coming of Christ there will be a manifestation of the children of God. Now the saints are God's hidden ones, the wheat seems lost in a heap of chaff; but then they shall be manifested. "It does not yet appear what we shall be," 1 Jno. iii. 2, but then the glory shall be revealed. The children of God shall appear in their own colours. And this redemption of the creature is reserved till then; for as it was with man and for man that they fell under the curse, so with man and for man they shall be delivered. All the curse and filth that now adhere to the creature shall be done away then when those that have suffered with Christ upon earth shall reign with him upon the earth. This the whole creation looks and longs for; and it may serve as a reason why now a good man should be merciful to his beast.

[The word rendered creature means the act of founding or creating, ch. i. 20; and then that which is created, ch. i. 25; Col. i. 15. The expression "the whole creation" may, according to the context, mean the rational or irrational creation. That in this case it refers to the latter may be argued, 1. Because it cannot be said of mankind generally, or of the rational creation, that they are waiting with earnest desire for the manifestation of the sons of God; that they were made subject to their present state of corruption not of their own accord, but by God; and that they are to be made partakers of the glorious liberty of the sons of God. 2. All this can be said, in strict accordance with the Scriptures, of the external world. The Scriptures frequently speak of the whole creation as a sentient being, rejoicing in God's favour, trembling at his anger, speaking abroad his praise, &c., as Paul here represents it as longing for the great consummation of all things. Again, it is agreeable to Scripture to speak of the earth as cursed for man's sake, as made subject to vanity not on its own account, but by the act of God in punishment of the sins of men. Finally, it is according to the word of God to represent the creation as participating in the blessings and glories of the Messiah's reign: see Isa. xxxv. 1; xxix. 17; xxxii. 15, 16; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 13; Heb. xii. 26, 27. 3. This interpretation is suitable to the design of the apostle. Paul's object is not to confirm the certainty of a future state, but to produce a strong impression of its glorious character. Nothing could be better adapted to this object than the grand and beautiful figure of the whole creation waiting and longing for the glorious revelation of the Son of God, and the consummation of his kingdom.—H.]

2. In the saints, who are new creatures, ver. 23–25. Observe, 1st. The grounds of this expectation in the saints. It is our having received "the firstfruits of the Spirit," which both quickens our desires and encourages our hopes, and both ways raises our expectations. The firstfruits did both sanctify and insure the lump. Grace is the firstfruits of glory, it is glory begun. We, having received such clusters in this wilderness, cannot but long for the full vintage in the heavenly Canaan. "Not only they"—not only the creatures which are not capable of such a happiness as the firstfruits of the Spirit, but even we, who have such present rich receivings, cannot but long for something more and greater. In having the firstfruits of the Spirit we have that which is very precious, but we have not all we would have. "We groan within ourselves," which denotes the strength and secrecy of these desires; not making a loud noise, as the hypocrites howling upon the bed for corn and wine, but with silent groans, which pierce heaven soonest of all. Or, "We groan among ourselves." It is the unanimous vote, the joint desire, of the whole church; all agree in this, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." The groaning denotes a very earnest and importunate desire, the soul pained with the delay. Present receivings and comforts are consistent with a great many groans; not as the pangs of one dying, but as the throes of a woman in travail—groans that are symptoms of life, not of death. 2nd. The object of this expectation. What is it we are thus desiring and waiting for? What would we have? "The adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." Though the soul be the principal part of the man, yet the Lord has declared himself for the body also, and has provided a great deal of honour and happiness for the body. The resurrection is here called "the redemption of the body." It shall then be rescued from the power of death and the grave, and the bondage of corruption; and, though a vile body, yet it shall be refined and beautified, and made like that glorious body of Christ, Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 42. This is called the adoption. First. It is the adoption manifested before all the world, angels and men. Now are we the sons of God, but it does not yet appear, the honour is now clouded; but then God will publicly own all his children. The deed of adoption, which is now written, signed, and sealed, will then be recognised, proclaimed, and published. As Christ was, so the saints will be, declared to be the sons of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, ch. i. 4. It will then be put past dispute. Secondly. It is the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls; and, till those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, the adoption is not perfect. But then it will be complete, when the Captain of our salvation shall bring the many sons to glory, Heb. ii. 10. This is that which we expect, in hope of which our flesh rests, Ps. xvi. 9, 10. All the days of our appointed time we are waiting, till this change shall come, when he shall call, and we shall answer, and he will have a desire to the work of his hands, Job xiv. 14, 15. 3rd. The agreeableness of this to our present state, ver. 24, 25. "Our happiness is not in present possession; "We are saved by hope." In this, as in other things, God hath made our present state a state of trial and probation—that our reward is out of sight. Those that will deal with God must deal upon trust. It is acknowledged that one of the principal graces of a Christian is hope, 1 Cor. xiii. 13, which necessarily implies a good thing to come, which is the object of that hope. Faith respects the promise, hope the thing promised. Faith is the evidence, hope the expectation, of things not seen. Faith is the mother of hope. "We do with patience wait." In hoping for this glory we have need of patience, to bear the sufferings we meet with in the way to it and the delays of it. Our way is rough and long; but he that shall come will come, and will not tarry; and therefore, though he seem to tarry, it becomes us to wait for him.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. 27 And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God. 28 And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

The apostle here suggests two privileges more to which true Christians are entitled:

First. The help of the Spirit in prayer. While we are in this world, hoping and waiting for what we see not, we must be praying. Hope supposes desire, and that desire offered up to God is prayer; we groan. Now observe, viii. 21. "Creature:" here, as in verse 19, "creation," "Bondage of corruption:" the bondage belonging to or arising from corruption. "Glorious liberty:" rather, "the liberty of the glory," &c. The glory of the children of God is their manifested perfection. For this creation waits, and in the liberty connected with it creation will share (verse 19).

viii. 23. "The firstfruits of the Spirit:" even we, though we possess the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, looking anxiously forward for the adoption—rather, the end or fulness of the adoption, or the full manifestation of it—in the redemption of the body, "called, in Eph. i. 14, the redemption of the 'acquisition'—i.e., the final recovery (by resurrection of the body) of that which God has already made his own by the gift of his Son. The spiritual redemption is already ours. Eph. i. 7" (Vaughan).

ix. 1–5. It is worth noting that the apostle, though upholding God's sovereign rights, yet indicates that the blame of failure lies

1. Our weakness in prayer. "We know not what we should pray for as we ought." 1st. As to the matter of our requests, we know not what to ask. We are not competent judges of our own condition. "Who knows what is good for a man in this life?" Ecc. vi. 12. We are shortsighted, and very much blinded in favour of the flesh, and apt to separate the end from the way. "You know not what you ask," Mat. xx. 22. We are like foolish children, that are ready to cry for fruit before it is ripe and fit for them: see Lu. ix. 54, 55. 2nd. As to the manner, we know not how to pray as we ought. It is not enough that we do that which is good, but we must do it well, seek in a due order; and here we are often at a loss—graces are weak, affections cold, thoughts wandering, and it is not always easy to find the heart to pray, 2 Sam. vii. 27. The apostle speaks of this in the first person; "We know not." He puts himself among the rest. Folly, and weakness, and distraction in prayer, are what all the saints are complaining of. If so great a saint as Paul knew not what to pray for, what little reason have we to go forth about that duty in our own strength!

2. The assistances which the Spirit gives us in that duty. He "helps our infirmities," meant especially of our praying infirmities, which most easily beset us in that duty, against which the Spirit helps. The Spirit in the Word helps; many rules and promises there are in the Word for our help. The Spirit in the heart helps, dwelling in us, working in us, as a Spirit of grace and supplication, especially with respect to the infirmities we are under when we are in a suffering state, when our faith is most apt to fail; for this end the Holy Ghost was poured out. "Helpe," σοφισθησεται,—helps with us, over against us, helps as we help one that would lift up a burthen, by lifting over against him at the other end—helps with us, that is, with us doing our endeavour, putting forth the strength we have. We must not sit still, and expect that the Spirit should do all; when the Spirit goes before us we must bestir ourselves. We cannot without God, and he will not without us. What help? Why, "the Spirit itself makes intercession for us," dictates our requests, indites our petitions, draws up our plea for us. Christ intercedes for us in heaven, the Spirit intercedes for us in our hearts; so graciously has God provided for the encouragement of the praying remnant. The Spirit, as an enlightening Spirit, teaches us what to pray for, as a sanctifying Spirit works and excites praying graces, as a comforting Spirit silences our fears, and helps us over all our discouragements. The Holy Spirit is the spring of all our desires and breathings towards God. Now this intercession which the Spirit makes is, 1st. "With groanings that cannot be uttered." The strength and fervency of those desires which the Holy Spirit works are hereby intimated. There may be praying in the Spirit where there is not a word spoken; as Moses prayed, Ex. xiv. 15, and Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 13. It is not the rhetoric and eloquence, but the faith and fervency of our prayers, that the Spirit works, as an intercessor in us. "Cannot be uttered;" they are so confused, the soul is in such a hurry with temptations and troubles, we know not what to say, nor how to express ourselves. Here is the Spirit interceding with groans that cannot be uttered. When we can but cry, "Abba, Father," and refer ourselves to him with a holy humble boldness, this is the work of the Spirit. 2nd. "According to the will of God," ver. 27. The Spirit in the heart never contradicts the Spirit in the word. Those desires that are contrary to the will of God do not come from the Spirit. The Spirit interceding in us evermore melts our wills into the will of God. "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

3. The sure success of these intercessions. "He that searcheth the heart knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit," ver. 27. To a hypocrite, all whose religion lies in his tongue, nothing is more dreadful than that God searches the heart, and sees through all his disguises. To a sincere Christian, who makes heartwork of his duty, nothing is more comfortable than that God searches the heart, for then he will hear and answer those desires which we want words to express. He knows what we have need of before we ask, Mat. vi. 8. He knows what is the mind of his own Spirit in us. And, as he always hears the Spirit interceding for us, so he always hears the Spirit interceding in us, because his intercession is according to the will of God. What could have been done more for the comfort of the Lord's people, in all their addresses to God? Christ had said, "Whatever you ask the Father according to his will he will give it you." But how shall we learn to ask according to his will? Why, the Spirit will teach us that. Therefore it is that the seed of Jacob never seek in vain.

Secondly. The concurrence of all providences for the good of those that are Christ's, ver. 28. It might be objected that, notwithstanding all these privileges, we see believers compassed about with manifold afflictions; though the Spirit makes intercession for them, yet their troubles are continued. It is very true; but in this the Spirit's intercession is always effectual, that, however it goes with them, all this is working together for their good. Observe here.

1. The character of the saints, who are interested in this privilege. They are here described by such properties as are common to all that are truly sanctified. 1st. "They love God." This includes all the outgoings of the soul's affections towards God as the chief good and highest end. It is our love to God that makes every providence sweet, and therefore profitable. Those that love God make the best of all he does, and take all in good part. 2nd. They "are the called according to his purpose," effectually called according to the eternal purpose. The call is effectual, not according to any merit or desert of ours, but according to God's own gracious purpose.

"According to his purpose," or according to his previous design. We now tread on the borders of what is deemed by many to be a great mystery; and, though we have no great respect for that theology which loves to grapple with the incomprehensibilities of lofty speculation, yet we must not shrink from aught that Scripture lays across our path. The purpose signifies a previous design; and this in so far previous, as to be even anterior to the existence of those who are the objects of it. In the Second Epistle to Timothy there is an allusion to this very purpose of our text, and where it stands associated too with the very call that is now under consideration. "God hath saved us," says the apostle, "not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." The purpose then is the prior determination in the mind of the Divinity, that such a one should be converted from the error of his ways—should be called from darkness unto light—should make that transition by which he passes from a state of condemnation to a state of acceptance; and the call, which we have already supposed to be an effectual one, is just as distinguishable from this previous determination, as the execution of a purpose is from the purpose itself—or as a design entertained and resolved upon long ago is from its fulfilment, that may only take place this very day, or at some distant and indefinite futurity before us. "Moreover whom he did predestinate them he also called." By the one he makes the decree—by the other he carries it into effect. And we again repeat, that it is not in the daring spirit of an adventurer we would have you to enter this field, or on a game of strength or of skill with the difficulties of human argument; but in the simple and lowly spirit of genuine disciples would we have you to submit yourselves to the Divine testimony. But let not any feel himself thrown at a distance from salvation, by thus connecting it with the antecedent decree of God respecting it. We are sure that none ought, who feel a true moral earnestness on the subject, and are honestly and desirously embarked on the pursuit of their immortal well-being. For, though the Spirit bioweth where he listeth, yet he listeth so to do on all who court and who aspire after him; and though by his work upon a human soul he is fulfilling a design that hath been conceived from eternity, yet it is not with this past design, but with the present fulfilment, that you have to do. And the matter in hand, the matter with which you should feel yourself urged and occupied is, that by the operation of that Spirit you may indeed be enlightened in the truth of God, and made wise unto your own salvation. For this purpose let me assure you of his readiness to help and to visit all who ask him—let me entreat your attention to that Bible, which with him is the mighty instrument whereby the understanding and the heart and all the faculties of man are gained over to that truth which is able at once to sanctify and to save us—let me press you to awake and be active in the work, putting forth all the strength that is in you, and confident that if you really do so more strength will be given. So that if the whole force which you have now be honestly and heartily directed to the object, by force the kingdom of heaven will be carried.—C. See note by Barnes on ch. ix. 16.]

2. The privilege of the saints, that "all things work together for good to them," that is, all the providences of God that concern them. All that God performs he performs for them, Ps. lvi. 2. Their sins are not of his performing, therefore not intended here, though his permitting sin is made to work for their good, 2 Chr. xxxii. 31. But all the providences of God are theirs—merciful providences, afflicting providences, personal, public. They are all for good; perhaps for temporal good, as Joseph's troubles; at least, for spiritual and eternal good. That is good for them which does their souls good. Either directly or indirectly, every providence has a tendency to the spiritual good of those that love God, breaking them off from sin, bringing them nearer to God, weaning them from the world, fitting them for heaven. "Work together." They work, as physic works upon the body, various ways, according to the intention of the physician; but all for the patient's good. "They work together," as several ingredients in a medicine concur to answer the intention. God hath set the one over against the other, Ecc. vii. 14; σοφισται, a verb singular, with a noun plural, denoting the harmony of Providence and its uniform designs, all the wheels as one wheel, Eze. x. 13. "He worketh all things together for good," so some read it. It is not for any specific quality in the providences themselves, but from the power and grace of God working in, with, and by, these providences. All this "we know"—know it for a certainty, from the word of God, from our own experience, and from the experience of all the saints.

29 For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren.

30 Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

The apostle, having reckoned up so many ingredients of the happiness of true believers, comes here to represent the ground of them all, which he lays in predestination. These precious privileges are conveyed to us by the charter of the covenant, but they are founded in the c-ounsel of God, which infallibly secures the event. That Jesus Christ, the purchaser, might not labour in vain, nor spend his strength and life for nought, and in vain, there is a remnant given him, a seed that he shall see, so that the good pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands. For the explication of this he here sets before us the order of the causes of our salvation, a golden chain, which cannot be broken. There are four links of it:

First. "Whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son." All that God designed for glory and happiness as the end he decreed to grace and holiness as the way. Not whom he did foreknow to be holy those he predestinated to be so. The counsels and decrees of God do not trundle to the frail and fickle will of men; no, God's foreknowledge of the saints is the same with that everlasting love wherewith he is said to have loved them, Jer. xxxi. 3. God's knowing his people is the same with his owning them, Ps. i. 6; Jno. x. 14; 2 Tim. ii. 19; see ch. xi. 2. Words of knowledge often in Scripture denote affection; so here, "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God," 1 Pet. i. 2. And the same word is rendered fore-ordained, 1 Pet. i. 20. "Whom he did foreknow," that is, whom he designed for his friends and favourites. "I know thee by name," said God to Moses, Ex. xxxiii. 12. Now those whom God thus foreknew he did predestinate to be conformed to Christ. 1. Holiness consists in our conformity to the image of Christ. This takes in the whole of sanctification, of which Christ is the great pattern and sampler. To be spirited as Christ was to walk and live as Christ did, to bear our sufferings patiently as Christ did. Christ is the express image of his Father, and the saints are conformed to the image of Christ. Thus it is by the mediation and interposal of Christ that we have God's love restored to us and God's likeness renewed upon us, in which two things consist the happiness of man. 2. All that God hath from eternity foreknown with favour he hath predestinated to this conformity. It is not we that can conform ourselves to Christ. Our giving ourselves to Christ takes rise in God's giving us to him; and, in giving us to him, he predestinated us to be conformable to his image. It is a mere cavil, therefore, to call the doctrine of election a licentious doctrine, and to argue that it gives encouragement to sin, as if the end were separated from the way and happiness from holiness. None can know their election but by their conformity to the image of Christ; for all that are chosen are chosen to sanctification, 2 Thes. ii. 13; and surely it cannot be a temptation to any to be conformed to the world to believe that they were predestinated to be conformed to Christ. 3. That which is herein chiefly designed is the honour of Jesus Christ, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren; that is, that Christ might have the honour of being the great pattern, as well as the great prince, and in this, as in other things, might have pre-eminence. It was in the firstborn that all the children were dedicated to God under the law. The firstborn was the head of the family, on whom all the rest did depend; now in the family of the saints Christ must have the honour of being the firstborn. And blessed be God that there are many brethren, though they seem but a few in one place at one time, yet, when they come all together, they will be a great many. There is, therefore, a certain number predestinated, that the end of Christ's undertaking might be infallibly secured. Had the event been left at uncertainties in the Divine counsels, to depend upon the contingent turn of man's will, Christ might have been the firstborn among but few or no brethren—a captain without soldiers, and a prince without subjects—to prevent which, and to secure to him many brethren, the decree is absolute, the thing ascertained; that he might be sure to with Israel. He had "great sorrow and unceasing anguish" (so Alford renders verse 2) in his heart for Israel; and that sorrow owe I much of its keenness to the reflection that their fall and failure was in spite of rich privileges and opportunities. These he enumerates. "The adoption:" besides Exod. iv. 22, referred to in Commentary, compare Deut. xxxii. 6; Jer. xxxi. 9. "The glory:" generally referred to the Shekinah, or visible manifestation of God between the cherubim. In several passages the word "glory" is applied to it. (Compare Exod. xvi. 10, xiv. 16, xl. 34, 35; 1 Sam. iv. 22; 1 Kings viii. 11.) "The covenants:" the word so translated signifies a disposition or disposal of anything, e.g., by deed or will. It is rendered "testament" in Heb. ix. 15–22, and where the notion of a last will and testament seems to be present to the apostle's mind. Elsewhere it is used as equivalent to the Hebrew word signifying a compact or agreement. Here it is to be understood, not of the tables of the law, nor of the Old and New Testaments, but of the several renewals to Abraham, see his seed, there is a remnant predestinated to be conformed to his image, which decree will certainly have its accomplishment in the holiness and happiness of that chosen race; and so, in spite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness, Christ will be the firstborn among many, very many brethren.

Secondly, "Whom he did predestinate those he also called," not only with the external call, (so many are called that were not chosen, Mat. xx. 16; xxii. 14.) but with the internal and effectual call. The former comes to the ear only, but this to the heart. All that God did from eternity predestinate to grace and glory he does, in the fullness of time, effectually call. The call is then effectual when we come at the call; and we then come at the call when the Spirit draws us, convicts the conscience of guilt and wrath, enlightens the understanding, bows the will, persuades and enables us to embrace Christ in the promises, makes us willing in the day of his power. It is an effectual call from self and earth to God, and Christ, and heaven, as our end—from sin and vanity to grace, and holiness, and seriousness as our way. This is the gospel call. "Them he called," that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand; we are called to that to which we were chosen. So that the only way to make our election sure is to make sure our calling, 2 Pet. i. 10.

Thirdly, "Whom he called those he also justified." All that are effectually called are justified, absolved from guilt, and accepted as righteous through Jesus Christ. They are recti in curia,—"right in court;" no sin that ever they have been guilty of shall come against them, to condemn them. The book is crossed, the bond cancelled, the judgment vacated, the attainder reversed; and they are no longer dealt with as criminals, but owned and loved as friends and favourites. Blessed is the man whose iniquity is thus forgiven. None are thus justified but those that are effectually called. Those that stand it out against the gospel call abide under guilt and wrath.

Fourthly, "Whom he justified those he also glorified." The power of corruption being broken in effectual calling, and the guilt of sin removed in justification, all that which hinders is taken out of the way, and nothing can come between that soul and glory. Observe, It is spoken of as a thing done. "He glorified," because of the certainty of it; he "hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling." In the eternal glorification of all the elect, God's design of love has its full accomplishment. This was what he aimed at all along—to bring them to heaven. Nothing less than that glory would make up the fullness of his covenant relation to them as God; and therefore, in all he does for them, and in them, he has this in his eye. Are they chosen? It is to salvation. Called? It is to his kingdom and glory. Begotten again? It is to an inheritance incorruptible. Afflicted? It is to work for them this exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Observe, The author of all these is the same. It is God himself that predestinated, calleth, justifieth, glorifieth; so "the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him." Created wills are so very fickle, and created powers so very feeble, that, if any of these did depend upon the creature, the whole would shake. But God himself hath undertaken the doing of it from first to last, that we might abide in a constant dependence upon him and subjection to him, and ascribe all the praise to him—that every crown may be cast before the throne. This is a mighty encouragement to our faith and hope; for, as for God, his way, his work, is perfect. He that hath laid the foundation will build upon it, and the top-stone will at length be brought forth with shoutings, and it will be our eternal work to cry, Grace, grace to it.

31 What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? 32 He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? 33 Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. 34 Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. 35 Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? 36 As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. 37 Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. 38 For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, 39 Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The apostle closes this excellent discourse upon the privileges of believers with a holy triumph in the name of all the saints. Having largely set forth the mystery of God's love to us in Christ, and the exceeding great and precious privileges we enjoy by him, he concludes like an orator; "What shall we then say to these things?" What use shall we make of all that has been said? He speaks as one amazed and swallowed up with the contemplation and admiration of it, wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. The more we know of other things the less we wonder at them; but the farther we are led into an acquaintance with gospel mysteries the more we are affected with the admiration of them. If Paul was at a loss what to say to these things, no marvel if we be. And what does he say? Why, if ever Paul rode in a triumphant chariot on this side heaven, here it was; with such a holy height and bravery of spirit, with such a fluency and copiousness of expression, does he here comfort himself and all the people of God upon the consideration of these privileges. In general, he here makes a challenge, throws down the gauntlet, as it were, dares all the enemies of the saints to do their worst; "If God be for us, who can be against us?" The ground of the challenge is God's being for us; in this he sums up all our privileges. This includes all, that God is for us; not only reconciled to us, and so not against us, but in covenant with us, and so engaged for us—all his attributes for us, his promises for us. All that he is, and has, and does, is for his people. He performs all things for them. He is for them, even when he seems to act against them. And, if so, "who can be against us," so as to prevail against us, so as to hinder our happiness? Be they ever so great and strong, ever so many, ever so mighty, ever so malicious, what can they do? While God is for us, and we keep in his love, we may with a holy boldness defy all the powers of darkness. Let Satan do his worst, he is chained; let the world do its worst, it is conquered; principalities and powers are spoiled and disarmed, and triumphed over, in the cross of Christ. Who then dares fight against us, while God himself is fighting for us? And this we say to these things, this is the inference we draw from these premises. More particularly,

First. We have supplies ready in all our wants, ver. 32. "He that spared," &c. Who can be against us, to strip us, to deprive us of our comforts? Who can cut off our streams while we have a fountain to go to? 1. Observe what God has done for us, on which our hopes are built. "He spared not his own Son." When he was to undertake our salvation, the Father was willing to part with him, did not think him too precious a gift to bestow for the salvation of poor souls; now we may know that he loves us, in that he hath not withheld his Son, his only Son, from us, as he said of Abraham, Gen. xxii. 12. If nothing less will save man, rather than man shall perish let him go, though it were out of his bosom. Thus did he deliver him up for us all; that is, for all the elect; for us all, not only for our good, but in our stead, as a sacrifice or atonement to be a propitiation for sin. When he had undertaken it he did not spare him. Though he was his own Son, yet, being made sin for us, it pleased the Lord to bruise him. Ὁὐκ ἐπέλατο, "he did not abate" him a farthing of that great debt, but charged it home. "Awake, O sword." He did not spare his own Son that served him, that he might spare us, though we have done him so much disservice. 2. What we may therefore expect he will do. He will "with him freely give us all things." 1st. It is implied that he will give us Christ, for other things are bestowed with him; not only with him given for us, but with him given to us. He that puts himself to so much charge to make the purchase for us surely will not hesitate at making the application to us. 2nd. He will with him freely give us all things, all things that he sees to be needful and necessary for us, all good things, and more we should not desire, Ps. xxiv. 10. And Infinite Wisdom shall be the judge whether it be good for us and needful for us or no. "Freely give"—freely, without reluctance; he is ready to give, meets us with his favours;—and freely, without recompence, without money, and without price. "How shall he not?" Can it be imagined that he should do the greater, and not do the less; that he should give so great a gift for us when we were enemies, and should deny us any good thing, now that through him we are friends and children? Thus may we by faith argue against our fears of want. He that hath prepared a crown and kingdom for us will be sure to give us enough to bear our charges in the way to it. He that hath designed us for the inheritance of sons when we come to age will not let us want necessities in the meantime.

Secondly. We have an answer ready to all accusations, and a security against all condemnations, ver. 33, 34. "Who shall lay any thing?" Doth the law accuse them? Do their own consciences accuse them? Is the devil, the accuser of the brethren, accusing them before our God day and night? This is enough to answer all those accusations, "It is God that justifieth." Men may justify themselves, as the Pharisees did, and yet the accusations may be in full force against them; but if God justifies, this answers all. He is the judge, the king, the party offended, and his judgment is according to truth, and sooner or later all the world will be brought to be of his mind; so that we may challenge all our accusers to come and put in their charge. This overthrows them all; it is God, the righteous faithful God, that justifieth. "Who is he that condemneth?" Though they cannot make good the charge, yet they will be ready to condemn; but we have a plea ready to move in arrest of judgment, a plea which cannot be overruled. "It is Christ that died," &c. It is by virtue of our interest in Christ, our relation to him, and our union with him, that we are thus secured. 1. His death. "It is Christ that died." By the merit of his death he paid our debt; and the surety's payment is a good plea to an action of debt. It is Christ, an able all-sufficient Saviour. 2. His resurrection. "Yea, rather, that has risen again." This is a much greater encouragement, for it is a convincing evidence that Divine justice was satisfied by the merit of his death. His resurrection was his acquittance, it was a legal discharge. Therefore the apostle mentions it with a Yea, rather. If he had died, and not risen again, we had been where we were. 3. His sitting at the right hand of God. He "is even at the right hand of God"—a further evidence that he has done his work, and a mighty encouragement to us in reference to all accusations, that we have a friend, such a friend, in court. "At the right hand of God" which denotes that he is ready there—always at hand; and that he is ruling there—all power is given to him. Our friend is himself the judge. 4. The intercession which he makes there. He is there, not unconcerned about us, not forgetful of us, but making intercession. He is agent for us there, an advocate for us, to answer all accusations, to put in our plea, and to prosecute it with effect, to appear for us and to present our petitions. And is not this abundant matter for comfort? What shall we say to these things? Is this the manner of men, O Lord God? What room is left for doubting and disquietment? Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Some understand the accusation and condemnation here spoken of of that which the suffering saints met with from men. The primitive Christians had many black crimes laid to their charge—heresy, sedition, rebellion, and what not? For these the ruling powers condemned them. "But no matter for that," says the apostle, "while we stand right at God's bar it is of no great moment how we stand at men's." To all the hard censures, the malicious calumnies, and the unjust and unrighteous sentences of men, we may with comfort oppose our justification before God through Christ Jesus as that which doth abundantly countervail, 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

Thirdly. We have good assurance of our preservation and continuance in this blessed state, v. 35, to the end. The fears of the saints lest they should lose their hold of Christ are often very discouraging and disquieting, and create them a great deal of disturbance; but here is that which may silence their fears, and still such storms, that nothing can separate them. We have here from the apostle,

1. A daring challenge to all the enemies of the saints to separate them, if they could, from the love of Christ. "Who shall?" None shall, ver. 35–37. God having manifested his love in giving his own Son for us, and not hesitating at that, can we imagine that any thing else should divert or dissolve that love? Observe here,

1st. The present calamities of Christ's beloved ones supposed; that they meet with tribulation on all hands, are in distress, know not which way to look for any succour and relief in this world, are followed with persecution from an angry malicious world that always hated those whom Christ loved, pinched with famine, and starved with nakedness, when stripped of all crea-

Isaac, and Jacob of the first great promise made to Abraham when he forsook his own country. (Compare Gen. xii. 1–3, xiii. 14–17, xv. 21, xvii. 1–22, xxii. 15–18, xxxv. 9–12, xli. 3, 4.) "The giving of the law;" the word implies more than the act of giving the law; it includes the law so given. Vaughan renders "the legislation." There is, no doubt, allusion to the sublime circumstances which attended the giving of the law. (Compare Deut. iv. 7–14, 32–36; Acts vii. 53.) "The service of God;" better supply, as Alford does, "of the sanctuary." The allusion is to the whole ceremonial system. (Compare Heb. ix. 1–6.) "The fathers;" Alford is disposed to limit the reference to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. (Compare Acts iii. 13, 25; Deut. i. 8.)

ix. 6–13. "Taken none effect;" better, "fallen to the ground." This preserves the metaphor. There has been no failure in God's promise; for from the very first it was shown that God's purpose was not to include all the descendants of Abraham, but to choose only a ture comforts, exposed to the greatest perils, the sword of the magistrate drawn against them, ready to be sheathed in their bowels, bathed in their blood. Can a case be supposed more black and dismal? It is illustrated, ver. 36, by a passage quoted from Ps. xlv. 22, "For thy sake we are killed all the day long," which intimates that we are not to think strange, no, not concerning the fiery bloody trial. We see the Old Testament saints had the same lot; so persecuted they the prophets that were before us. "Killed all the day long;" that is, continually exposed to and expecting the fatal stroke. There is still every day, and all the day long, one or other of the people of God bleeding and dying under the rage of persecuting enemies. "Accounted as sheep for the slaughter;" they make no more of killing a Christian than of butchering a sheep. Sheep are killed, not because they are hurtful while they live, but because they are useful when they are dead. They kill the Christians to please themselves, to be food to their malice. "They eat up my people as they eat bread" Ps. xiv. 4.

2nd. The inability of all these things to separate us from the love of Christ. Shall they, can they, do it? No, by no means. All this will not cut the bond of the love and friendship that is between Christ and true believers. First. Christ doth not, will not, love us the less for all this. All these troubles are very consistent with the strong and constant love of the Lord Jesus. They are neither a cause nor an evidence of the abatement of his love. When Paul was whipped, and beaten, and imprisoned, and stoned, did Christ love him ever the less? Were his favours intermitted? his smiles any whit suspended? his visits more shy? By no means, but the contrary. These things separate us from the love of other friends. When Paul was brought before Nero all men forsook him, but then the Lord stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17. Whatever persecuting enemies may rob us of, they cannot rob us of the love of Christ, they cannot intercept his love-tokens, they cannot interrupt nor exclude his visits; and therefore let them do their worst, they cannot make a true believer miserable. Secondly. We do not, will not, love him the less for this; and that for this reason, because we do not think that he loves us the less. Charity thinks no evil, entertains no misgiving thoughts, makes no hard conclusions, no unkind constructions, takes all in good part that comes from love. A true Christian loves Christ never the less though he suffer for him, thinks never the worse of Christ though he lose all for him.

3rd. The triumph of believers in this; ver. 37, "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors." First. We are conquerors; though killed all the day long, yet conquerors. A strange way of conquering, but it was Christ's way; thus he triumphed over principalities and powers in his cross. It is a surer and a nobler way of conquest by faith and patience than by fire and sword. The enemies have sometimes confessed themselves baffled and overcome by the invincible courage and constancy of the martyrs, who thus overcame the most victorious princes by not loving their lives to the death, Rev. xii. 11. Secondly. We are more than conquerors. In our patiently bearing these trials we are not only conquerors, but more than conquerors, that is, triumphers. Those are more than conquerors that conquer, 1st. With little loss. Many conquests are dearly bought; but what do the suffering saints lose? Why, they lose that which the gold loses in the furnace, nothing but the dross. It is no great loss to lose things which are not—a body that is of the earth, earthy. 2nd. With great gain. The spoils are exceedingly rich; glory, honour, and peace, a crown of righteousness that fades not away. In this the suffering saints have triumphed; not only have not been separated from the love of Christ, but have been taken into the most sensible endearments and embraces of it. As afflictions abound, consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. i. 5. There is one more than a conqueror, when pressed above measure. He that embraced the stake, and said, "Welcome the cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life," he that dated his letter from the delectable orchard of the Leonine prison; he that said, "In these flames I feel no more pain than if I were upon a bed of down;" she who, a little before her martyrdom, being asked how she did, said, "Well and merry, and going to heaven;" those that have gone smiling to the stake, and stood singing in the flames;—these were more than conquerors. Thirdly. It is only "through Christ that loved us," the merit of his death taking the sting out of all these troubles, the Spirit of his grace strengthening us, and enabling us to bear them with holy courage and constancy, and coming in with special comforts and supports. Thus we are conquerors, not in our own strength, but in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. We are conquerors by virtue of our interest in Christ's victory. He hath overcome the world for us, John. xvi. 33, both the good things and the evil things of it; so that we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory, and to divide the spoil, and so are more than conquerors.

2. A direct and positive conclusion of the whole matter: "For I am persuaded," ver. 38, 39. It denotes a full, and strong, and affectionate persuasion, arising from the experience of the strength and sweetness of the Divine love. And here he enumerates all those things which might be supposed likely to separate between Christ and believers, and concludes that it could not be done.

1st. "Neither death nor life," neither the terrors of death on the one hand, nor the comforts, and pleasures of life on the other, neither the fear of death nor the hope of life. Or, We shall not be separated from that love either in death or in life.

2nd. "Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers." Both the good angels and the bad are called principalities and powers: the good, Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 19; the bad, Eph. vi. 12; Col. ii. 15. And neither shall do it. The good angels will not, the bad shall not; and neither can. The good angels are engaged friends, the bad are restrained enemies.

3rd. "Nor things present, nor things to come;" neither the sense of troubles present nor the fear of troubles to come. Time shall not separate us, eternity shall not. Things present separate us from things to come, and things to come separate and cut us off from things present; but neither from the love of Christ, whose favour is twisted in with both present things and things to come.

4th. "Nor height, nor depth;" neither the height of prosperity and preferment, nor the depth of adversity and disgrace; nothing from heaven above, no storms, no tempests; nothing on earth below, no rocks, no seas, no dungeons.

5th. "Nor any other creature;" any thing that can be named or thought of. It will not, it cannot, separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. It cannot cut off or impair our love to God, or God's to us; nothing does it, can do it, but sin. Observe, The love that exists between God and true believers is through Christ. He is the Mediator of our love; it is in and through him that God can love us and that we dare love God. This is the ground of the steadfastness of the love; therefore God rests in his love, Zeph. iii. 17, because Jesus Christ, in whom he loves us, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Mr. Hugh Kennedy, an eminent Christian, of Ayr, in Scotland, when he was dying called for a Bible; but finding his sight gone, he said, "Turn me to the 8th of the Romans, and set my finger at these words, 'I am persuaded that neither death nor life,' &c. Now," said he, "is my finger upon them?" And, when they told him it was, without speaking any more, he said, "Now, God be with you, my children; I have breakfasted with you, and shall sup with my Lord Jesus Christ this night;" and so departed.

portion, e.g., Sarah's son, not Hagar's, and afterwards one out of the two sons of Rebecca. In the selection of these two cases as illustrative of God's purpose, it is worth noting that the parentage does not influence the selection. Of two sons of Abraham, one is chosen, the other not; and even when, as in the case of Jacob and Esau, the children were of the same mother as well as father, the selection was made. It is well noted by Dr. Vaughan that nothing is here said of the final destiny of either brother; that was shaped by the spirit and

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle, having plainly asserted and largely proved, that justification and salvation are to be had by faith only, and not by the works of the law, by Christ and not by Moses, comes in this and the following chapters to anticipate an objection which might be made against this. If this be so, then what becomes of the Jews, of them all as a complex body, especially those of them that do not embrace Christ, nor believe the gospel? By this rule they must needs come short of happiness; and then what becomes of the promise made to the fathers, which entailed salvation upon the Jews? Is not that promise nullified and made of none effect? Which is not a thing to be imagined concerning any word of God. That doctrine therefore, might they say, is not to be embraced, from which flows such a consequence as this. That the consequence of the rejection of the unbelieving Jews follows from Paul's doctrine he grants, but endeavours to soften and mollify, ver. 1—5. But that from this it follows that the word of God takes no effect he denies, ver. 6, and proves the denial in the rest of the chapter, which serves likewise to illustrate the great doctrine of predestination, which he had spoken of, ch. viii. 28, as the first wheel which in the business of salvation sets all the other wheels agoing.

SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, 2 That I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. 3 For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh: 4 Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; 5 Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

We have here the apostle's solemn profession of a great concern for the nation and people of the Jews—that he was heartily troubled that so many of them were enemies to the Gospel, and out of the way of salvation. For this he had "great heaviness and continual sorrow." Such a profession as this was requisite to take off the odium which otherwise he might have contracted by asserting and proving their rejection. It is wisdom, as much as may be, to mollify those truths which sound harshly and seem unpleasant. Dip the nail in oil, it will drive the better. The Jews had a particular pique at Paul, above any of the apostles, as appears by the history of the Acts, and therefore were the more apt to take things amiss of him, to prevent which he introduces his discourse with this tender and affectionate profession, that they might not think he triumphed or insulted over the rejected Jews, or was pleased with the calamities that were coming upon them. Thus Jeremiah appeals to God concerning the Jews of his day, whose ruin was hastening on, Jer. xvii. 16, "Neither have I desired the woful day, thou knowest." Nay, Paul was so far from desiring it, that he most pathetically deprecates it. And, lest this should be thought only a copy of his countenance, to flatter and please them,

First. He asserts it with a solemn protestation; ver. 1, "I say the truth in Christ." "I speak it as a Christian, one of God's people, children that will not lie, as one that knows not how to give flattering titles." Or, "I appeal to Christ, who searches the heart, concerning it." He appeals likewise to his own conscience, which was instead of a thousand witnesses. That which he was going to assert was not only a great and weighty thing, (such solemn protestations are not to be thrown away upon trifles,) but it was likewise a secret; it was concerning a sorrow in his heart, to which none was a capable, competent witness, but God and his own conscience.—"That I have great heaviness," ver. 2. He does not say for what; the very mention of it was unpleasant and invidious; but it is plain that he means for the rejection of the Jews.

Secondly. He backs it with a very serious imprecation, which he was ready to make out of love to the Jews. "I could wish;" he does not say, I do wish, for it was no proper means appointed for such an end; but, if it were, "I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren;" a very high pang of zeal and affection for his countrymen. He would be willing to undergo the greatest misery to do them good. Love is apt to be thus bold, and venturesome, and self-denying. Because the glory of God's grace in the salvation of many is to be preferred before the welfare and happiness of a single person, Paul, if they were put in competition, would be content to forego all his own happiness to purchase theirs. 1. He would be content to be cut off from the land of the living, in the most shameful and ignominious manner, as an anathema, or a devoted person. They thirsted for his blood, persecuted him as the most obnoxious person in the world, the curse and plague of his generation, 1 Cor. iv. 13; Acts xxii. 22. "Now," says Paul, "I am willing to bear all this, and a great deal more, for your good. Abuse me as much as you will, count and call me at your pleasure; your unbelief and rejection create in my heart a heaviness so much greater than all these troubles can that I could look upon them not only as tolerable, but as desirable, rather than this rejection." 2. He would be content to be excommunicated from the society of the faithful, to be separated from the church, and from the communion of saints, as a heathen man and a publican, if that would do them any good. He could wish himself no more remembered among the saints, his name blotted out of the church records; though he had been so great a planter of churches, and the spiritual father of so many thousands, yet he would be content to be disowned by the church, cut off from all communion with it, and have his name buried in oblivion or reproach, for the good of the Jews. It may be, some of the Jews had a prejudice against Christianity for Paul's sake; such a spleen they had at him that they hated the religion he was of: "If this stumble you," says Paul, "I could wish I might be cast out, not embraced as a Christian, so you might not be taken in." Thus Moses, (Ex. xxxii. 32) in a like holy passion of concern, "Blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written." 3. Nay, some think conduct of each: what is spoken of here is the position of the one, and not of the other, as the depository of the promise to Abraham.

ix. 14—24. "What shall we say then?" "What inference shall we draw? Is there injustice with God in the bestowal of his gifts?" The difficulties of this passage turn upon the necessary conditions of human thought. They do not belong to this doctrine alone, nor are they found in Scripture only, but in every consistent belief in an almighty and all-knowing God. Verse 24 Alford renders, that the expression goes farther, and that he could be content to be cut off from all his share of happiness in Christ, if that might be a means of their salvation. It is a common charity that begins at home; this is something higher, and more noble and generous.

Thirdly. He gives us the reason of this affection and concern.

1. Because of their relation to them; "My brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh." Though they were very bitter against him upon all occasions, and gave him the most unnatural and barbarous usage, yet thus respectfully does he speak of them. It shews him to be a man of a forgiving spirit. "Not that I had aught to accuse my nation of," Acts xviii. 19. "My kinsmen." Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations, our brethren, and kinsmen. To them we lie under special engagements, and we have more opportunity of doing good to them; and concerning them, and our usefulness to them, we must in a special manner give account.

2. Especially because of their relation to God; ver. 4, 5, "Who are Israelites," the seed of Abraham, God's friend, and of Jacob his chosen, taken into the covenant of peculiarity, dignified and distinguished by visible church privileges, many of which are here mentioned: 1st. "The adoption;" not that which is saving, and which entitles to eternal happiness, but that which was external and typical, and entitled them to the land of Canaan. "Israel is my son," Ex. iv. 22. 2nd. "And the glory;" the ark with the mercy-seat, over which God dwelt between the cherubim—this was the glory of Israel, 1 Sam. iv. 21. The many symbols and tokens of the Divine presence and guidance, the cloud, the Shechinah, the distinguishing favours conferred upon them—these were the glory. 3rd. "And the covenants;" the covenant made with Abraham, and often renewed with his seed upon divers occasions. There was a covenant at Sinai, Ex. xxiv.; in the plains of Moab, Deu. xxix.; at Shechem, Jos. xxiv., and often afterwards; and still these pertained to Israel. Or, the covenant of peculiarity, and in that, as in the type, the covenant of grace. 4th. "And the giving of the law." It was to them that the ceremonial and judicial law were given, and the moral law in writing pertained to them. It is a great privilege to have the law of God among us, and it is to be accounted so, Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20. This was the grandeur of Israel, Deu. iv. 7, 8. 5th. "And the service of God." They had the ordinances of God's worship among them—the temple, the altars, the priests, the sacrifices, the feasts, and the institutions relating to them. They were in this respect greatly honoured, that while other nations were worshipping and serving stocks, and stones, and devils, and they knew not what other idols of their own invention, the Israelites were serving the true God in the way of his own appointment. 6th. "And the promises"—particular promises added to the general covenant; promises relating to the Messiah and the gospel state. Observe, The promises accompany the giving of the law, and the service of God; for the comfort of the promises is to be had in obedience to that law, and attendance upon that service. 7th. "Whose are the fathers," ver. 5; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, those men of renown, that stood so high in the favour of God. The Jews stand in relation to them, are their children, and proud enough they are of it: "We have Abraham to our father." It was for the father's sake that they were taken into covenant, ch. xi. 28. 8th. But the greatest honour of all was that of them "as concerning the flesh" (that is, as to his human nature) "Christ came;" for he took on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. ii. 16. As to his Divine nature, he is the Lord from heaven; but, as to his human nature, he is of the seed of Abraham. This was the great privilege of the Jews, that Christ was of kin to them. Mentioning Christ, he interposes a very great word concerning him, that he "is over all, God blessed for ever." Lest the Jews should think meanly of him, because he was of their alliance, he here speaks thus honourably concerning him; and it is a very full proof of the Godhead of Christ; he is not only over all, as Mediator, but he is God blessed for ever. Therefore, how much sorer punishment were they worthy of that rejected him! It was likewise the honour of the Jews, and one reason why Paul had a kindness for them, that seeing God blessed for ever would be a man, he would be a Jew; and, considering the posture and character of that people at that time, it may well be looked upon as a part of his humiliation.

6 Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel, which are of Israel: 7 Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children: but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. 8 That is, They which are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. 9 For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son. 10 And not only this; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac; 11 (For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth;) 12 It was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. 13 As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.

The apostle having made his way to that which he had to say concerning the rejection of the body of his countrymen, with a protestation of his own affection for them, and a concession of their undoubted privileges, comes in these verses, and the following part of the chapter, to prove that the rejection of the Jews, by the establishment of the Gospel dispensation, did not at all invalidate the word of God's promise to the patriarchs: "Not as though the word of God hath taken no effect," ver. 6, which, considering the present state of the Jews, which created to Paul so much heaviness and continual sorrow, ver. 2, might be suspected. We are not to ascribe inefficacy to any word of God; nothing that he has spoken does or can fall to the ground: see Isa. lv. 10, 11. The promises and threatenings shall have their accomplishment; and, one way or other, he will magnify the law and make it honourable. This is to be understood especially of the promise of God, which by subsequent providences may be to a wavering faith very doubtful; but it is not, it cannot be, made of no effect; at the end it will speak and not lie. Now the difficulty is to reconcile the rejection of the unbelieving Jews with the word of God's promise, and the external tokens of the Divine favour, which had been conferred upon them. This he does in four ways: 1. By explaining the true meaning and intention of the promise, ver. 6-13. 2. By asserting and proving the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of the children of men, ver. 14-24. 3. By shewing how this rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament, ver. 25-29. 4. By fixing the true reason of the Jews' rejection, ver. 30, to the end.

In this paragraph the apostle explains the true meaning and intention of the promise. When we mistake the word, and misunderstand the promise, we marvel if we are ready to quarrel with God about the accomplishment; and therefore the sense of this must first be duly stated. Now he here makes it out that when God said he would be "a God to Abraham, and to his seed," (which was the famous promise made unto the fathers,) he did not mean it of all his seed according to the flesh, as if it were a necessary concomitant of the blood of Abraham; but that he intended it with a limitation only to such and such. And as from the beginning it was appropriated to Isaac and not to Ishmael, to Jacob and not to Esau, and yet for all this the word of God was not made of no effect; so now the same promise is appropriated to believing Jews that embrace Christ and Christianity, and though it throws off multitudes that refuse Christ, yet the promise is not therefore defeated and invalidated, any more than it was by the typical rejection of Ishmael and Esau.

First. He lays down this proposition, that "They are not all Israel who are of Israel," ver. 6, "neither because they are," &c., ver. 7. Many that descended from the loins of Abraham and Jacob, and were of that people who were surnamed by the name of Israel, yet were very far from being Israelites indeed, interested in the saving benefits of the new covenant. They are not all really Israel that are so in name and profession. It does not follow that because they are the seed of Abraham, therefore they must needs be the children of God, though they themselves fancied so, boasted much of, and built much upon, their relation to Abraham, Mat. iii. 9; Jno. viii. 38, 39. But it does not follow. Grace does not run in the blood; nor are saving benefits inseparably annexed to external church privileges, though it is common for people thus to stretch the meaning of God's promise, to bolster themselves up in a vain hope.

Secondly. He proves this by instances; and therein shews not only that some of Abraham's seed were chosen, and others not, but that God therein wrought according to the counsel of his own will; and not with regard to that law of commandments to which the present unbelieving Jews were so strangely wedded.

1. He specifies the case of Isaac and Ishmael, both of them the seed of Abraham; and yet Isaac only taken into covenant with God, and Ishmael rejected and cast out. For this he quotes, Gen. xxi. 12. "In Isaac shall thy seed be called," which comes in there as a reason why Abraham must be willing to cast out the bondwoman and her son, because the covenant was to be established with Isaac, Gen. xvii. 19. And yet the word which God had spoken, that he would be a God to Abraham and to his seed, did not therefore fall to the ground; for the blessings wrapt up in that great word, being communicated by God as a benefactor, he was free to determine on what head they should rest, and accordingly entailed them upon Isaac, and rejected Ishmael. This he explains farther, ver. 8, 9, and shows what God intended to teach us by this dispensation. 1st. That the children of the flesh, as such, by virtue of their relation to Abraham according to the flesh, are not therefore the children of God, for then Ishmael had put in a good claim. This remark comes home to the unbelieving Jews, who boasted of their relation to Abraham according to the flesh, and looked for justification in a fleshly way, by those carnal ordinances which Christ had abolished. They had confidence in the flesh, Phil. iii. 3. Ishmael was a child of the flesh, conceived by Hagar, who was young and fresh, and likely enough to have children. There was nothing extraordinary or supernatural in his conception, as there was in Isaac's; he was born after the flesh, Gal. iv. 29, representing those that expect justification and salvation by their own strength and righteousness. 2nd. That "the children of the promise are counted for the seed." Those that have the honour and happiness of being counted for the seed have it not for the sake of any merit or desert of their own, but purely by virtue of the promise, in which God hath obliged himself of his own good pleasure to grant the promised favour. Isaac was a child of promise; this he proves, ver. 9, quoted from Gen. xviii. 10. He was a child promised, so were many others, and he was also conceived and born by force and virtue of the promise, and so a proper type and figure of those who are now counted for the seed, even true believers, who are born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God—of the incorruptible seed, even the word of promise, by virtue of the special promise of a new heart: see Gal. iv. 28. It was through faith that Isaac was conceived, Heb. xi. 11. Thus were the great mysteries of salvation taught under the Old Testament, not in express words, but by significant types and dispensations of providence, which to them then were not so clear as they are to us now, when the veil is taken away, and the types are expounded by the antitypes.

2. The case of Jacob and Esau, ver. 10-13, which is much stronger, to shew that the carnal seed of Abraham were not, as such, interested in the promise, but only such of them as God in sovereignty had appointed. There was a previous difference between Ishmael and Isaac before Ishmael was cast out. Ishmael was the son of the bondwoman, born long before Isaac, was of a fierce and rugged disposition, and had mocked or persecuted Isaac, to all which it might be supposed God had regard when he appointed Abraham to cast him out. But in the case of Jacob and Esau it was neither so nor so; they were both the sons of Isaac by one mother; they were conceived ἐκ ἑνός,—by one conception; ἐκ ἑνός κοίτου, so some copies read it. The difference was made between them by the Divine counsel before they were born, or had done any good or evil. Both lay struggling alike in their mother's womb, when it was said "the elder shall serve the younger," without respect to good or bad works done or foreseen, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand"—that this great truth may be established, that God chooses some and refuses others as a free agent, by his own absolute and sovereign will, dispensing his favours or withholding them as he pleases. This difference that was put between Jacob and Esau he farther illustrates by a quotation from Mal. i. 2, 3, where it is said, not of Jacob and Esau the persons, but the Edomites and Israelites their posterity, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated."

[This does not mean any positive hatred; but that he had preferred Jacob, and had withheld from Esau those privileges and blessings which he had conferred on the posterity of Jacob. This is explained in Mal. i. 3. "And I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness;" compare Jer. xlix. 17, 18; Eze. xxxv. 3. It was common among the Hebrews to use the terms love and hatred in this comparative sense, where the former implied strong positive attachment, and the latter not positive hatred, but merely a less love, or the withholding of the expressions of affection: compare Gen. xxix. 30, 31; Pr. xiii. 24; Mal. vi. 24; Lu. xiv. 26.—A. B.]

The people of Israel were taken into the covenant of peculiarity, had the

"Who he also called, even us, not from among the Jews only, but also from among the Gentiles."

x. 3. "Ignorant of God's righteousness," &c.: Alford renders, "Not knowing God's righteousness, and seeking to set up their own righteousness," &c. "God's righteousness:" not the personal righteousness of God, but, as is clear from verse 4 ("righteousness to every one that believeth"), the Divine gift of righteousness. (See Note on chap. i. 17.)

x. 4. "Christ the end of the law:" the article is not expressed in the original before "end" or "law." Hence St. Paul says more than that Christ is the end of the Mosaic law. This, no doubt, is mainly in his mind; but he affirms of any law (e.g., law which Gentiles had, chap. ii. 14) that Christ is the end of it. The word "end" must be understood in a wide sense—aim or object, as well as fulfilment. Vaughan says "end" in all senses—that to which law points, and in which it finds its rest. (Compare our word "end," 1 Tim. i. 5.)

land of Canaan given them, were blessed with the more signal appearances of God for them in special protections, supplies, and deliverances, while the Edomites were rejected, had no temple, altar, priests, nor prophets—no such particular care taken of them, nor kindness shewn to them. Such a difference did God put between these two nations, that both descended from the loins of Abraham and Isaac, as at first there was a difference put between Jacob and Esau, the distinguishing heads of those two nations. So that all this choosing and refusing was typical, and intended to shadow forth some other election and rejection. 1st. Some understand it of the election and rejection of conditions or qualifications. As God chose Isaac and Jacob, and rejected Ishmael and Esau, so he might and did choose faith to be the condition of salvation, and reject the works of the law. Thus Arminius understands it, De reiectis et assumptis talibus, certa qualitate notatis,—concerning such as are rejected or such as are chosen, being distinguished by appropriate qualities; so John Goodwin. But this very much strains the Scripture; for the apostle speaks all along of persons, he has mercy on whom (he does not say, on what kind of people,) he will have mercy, besides that against this sense those two objections (ver. 14, 19) do not at all arise, and his answer to them concerning God's absolute sovereignty over the children of men is not at all pertinent if no more be meant than his appointing the conditions of salvation. 2nd. Others understand it of the election and rejection of particular persons—some loved, and others hated, from eternity. But the apostle speaks of Jacob and Esau, not in their own persons, but as ancestors—Jacob the people, and Esau the people: nor does God condemn any, or decree so to do, merely because he will do it, without any reason taken from their own deserts. 3rd. Others therefore understand it of the election and rejection of people considered complexly. In design is to justify God, and his mercy and truth in calling the Gentiles, and taking them into the church, and into covenant with himself, while he suffered the obstinate part of the Jews to persist in unbelief, and so to unchurch themselves—thus hiding from their eyes the things that belonged to their peace. The apostle's reasoning for the explication and proof of this is, however, very applicable to, and, no doubt, (as is usual in Scripture,) was intended for the clearing of the methods of God's grace towards particular persons, for the communication of saving benefits bears some analogy to the communication of church privileges. The choosing of Jacob the younger, and preferring him before Esau the elder, so crossing hands, were to intimate that the Jews, though the natural seed of Abraham, and the firstborn of the church, should be laid aside; and the Gentiles, who were as the younger brother, should be taken in in their stead, and have the birthright and blessing. The Jews, considered as a body politic, a nation and people, knit together by the bond and cement of the ceremonial law, the temple and priesthood, the centre of their unity, had for many ages been a kingdom of priests, a holy nation, dignified and distinguished by God's miraculous appearances among them and for them. Now that the Gospel was preached, and Christian churches were planted, this national body was thereby abandoned, their church polity dissolved; and Christian churches, and in process of time Christian nations, embodied in like manner become their successors in the Divine favour, and those special privileges and protections which were the products of that favour. To clear up the justice of God in this great dispensation is the scope of the apostle here.

[There is reference here to the whole train of temporal and spiritual blessings which were to be connected with the two races of people. If it be asked how this bears on the argument of the apostle, we may reply, 1. That it settles the principle that God might make a distinction among men, in the same nation, and in the same family, without reference to their works or character. 2. That he might confer his blessings on such as he pleased. 3. If this is done in regard to nations, it may be in regard to individuals. The principle is the same, and the justice the same. If it be supposed to be unjust in God to make such a distinction in regard to individuals, it is surely not less so to make a distinction in nations. The fact that numbers are thus favoured does not make it the more proper, or remove any difficulty. 4. If this distinction may be made in regard to temporal things, why not in regard to spiritual things? The principle must still be the same. If unjust in one case, it would be in the other. The fact that it is done in one case proves also that it will be in the other; for the same great principle will run through all the dealings of the Divine government. And as men do not and cannot complain that God makes a distinction among them in regard to talents, health, beauty, prosperity and rank, neither can they complain if he acts also as a sovereign in the distribution of his spiritual favours. They, therefore, who regard this as referring only to temporal and national privileges gain no relief in respect to the real difficulty in the case, for the unanswerable question would still be asked, Why has not God made all men equal in every thing? Why has he made any distinction among men? The only reply to all such inquiries is, "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight," Mat. xi. 26.—A. B.]

14 What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid. 15 For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. 16 So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. 17 For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. 18 Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. 19 Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? 20 Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? 21 Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour? 22 What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: 23 And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, 24 Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?

The apostle, having asserted the true meaning of the promise, comes here to maintain and prove the absolute sovereignty of God in disposing of the children of men, with reference to their eternal state. And herein God is to be considered, not as a rector and governor, distributing rewards and punishments according to his revealed laws and covenants, but as an owner and benefactor, giving to the children of men such grace and favour as he has determined in and by his secret and eternal will and counsel; both the favour of visible church membership and privileges, which is given to some people and denied to others, and the favour of effectual grace, which is given to some particular persons and denied to others. Now this part of his discourse is in answer to two objections.

First. It might be objected, "Is there unrighteousness with God?" If God, in dealing with the children of men, do thus, in an arbitrary manner, choose some and refuse others, may it not be suspected that there is unrighteousness with him? This the apostle startles at the thought of; "God forbid!" Far be it from us to think such a thing; "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Gen. xviii. 25; ch. iii. 5, 6. He denies the consequence, and proves the denial.

1. In respect of those to whom he shews mercy, ver. 15, 16. He quotes that Scripture to shew God's sovereignty in dispensing his favours, Ex. xxxiii. 19, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious." All God's reasons of mercy are taken from within himself. All the children of men being plunged alike into a state of sin and misery, equally under guilt and wrath, God, in a way of sovereignty, picks out some from this fallen apostatized race to be vessels of grace and glory. He dispenses his gifts to whom he will, without giving us any reason; according to his own good pleasure he pitches upon some to be monuments of mercy and grace, preventing grace, effectual grace, while he passes by others. The expression is very emphatic, and the repetition makes it more so; "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." It imports a perfect absoluteness in God's will; he will do what he will, and giveth not account of any of his matters, nor is it fit he should. As these great words, "I am that I am," Ex. iii. 14, do abundantly express the absolute independency of his being, so these words, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," do as fully express the absolute prerogative and sovereignty of his will. To vindicate the righteousness of God, in shewing mercy to whom he will, the apostle appeals to that which God himself had spoken, wherein he claims this sovereign power and liberty. God is a competent judge, even in his own case. Whatsoever God does, or is resolved to do, is both by the one and the other proved to be just. Ἐκείνου οὐκ ἔστιν ἀνέναντον,—"I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy." When I begin I will make an end. Therefore God's mercy endures for ever, because the reason of it is fetched from within himself: therefore his gifts and callings are without repentance. Hence he infers, ver. 16, "It is not of him that willeth." Whatever good comes from God to man the glory of it is not to be ascribed to the most generous desire, nor to the most industrious endeavour, of man, but only and purely to the free grace and mercy of God. In Jacob's case it was "not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth;" it was not the earnest will and desire of Rebecca that Jacob might have the blessing; it was not Jacob's haste to get it, for he was compelled to run for it, that procured him the blessing, but only the mercy and grace of God. Wherein the holy, happy people of God differ from other people it is God and his grace that make them differ. Applying this general rule to the particular case that Paul has before him, the reason why the unworthy, the undeserving, ill-deserving Gentiles are called, and grafted into the church, while the greatest part of the Jews are left to perish in unbelief, is not because those Gentiles were better deserving or better disposed for such a favour, but because of God's free grace that made that difference. The Gentiles did neither will it nor run for it, for they sat in darkness, Mat. iv. 16. In darkness, therefore not willing what they knew not; sitting in darkness, a contented posture; therefore not running to meet it, but anticipated with these invaluable blessings of goodness. Such is the method of God's grace towards all that partake of it, for he is found of those that sought him not, Isa. lxi. 1; in this preventing, effectual, distinguishing grace, he acts as a benefactor, whose grace is his own. Our eye therefore must not be evil because his is good; but, of all the grace that we or others have, he must have the glory: "not unto us," Ps. cxv. 1.

["Nor of him that runneth." This denotes strenuous, intense effort, as when a man is anxious to obtain an object, or hastens from danger. The meaning is not that the sinner does not make an effort to be saved; nor that all who become Christians do not in fact strive to enter into the kingdom; or earnestly desire salvation, for the Scriptures teach the contrary, Lu. xvi. 16; xiii. 24. There is no effort more intense and persevering, no struggle more arduous or agonising, than when a sinner seeks eternal life. Nor does it mean that they who strive in a proper way, and with proper effort, shall not obtain eternal life, Mat. vii. 7. But the sense is, 1. That the sinner would not put forth any effort himself. If left to his own course he would never seek to be saved. 2. That he is pardoned, not on account of his effort, not because he makes an exertion, but because God chooses to pardon him. There is no merit in his anxiety, and prayers, and agony, on account of which God would forgive him; but he is still dependent on the mere mercy of God to save or destroy him at his will. The sinner, however anxious he may be, and however much or long he may strive, does not bring God under an obligation to pardon him any more than the condemned criminal trembling with the fear of execution, and the consciousness of crime, lays the judge or the jury under an obligation to acquit him. This fact it is of great importance for an awakened sinner to know. Deeply anxious he should be, but there is no merit in his distress. Pray he should, but there is no merit in his prayers. Weep and strive he may, but in this there is no ground of claim on God for pardon; and after all, he is dependent on his mere sovereign mercy, as a lost, ruined, and helpless sinner, to be saved or lost at his will.—A. B.]

2. In respect of those who perish, ver. 17. God's sovereignty, manifested in the ruin of sinners, is here discovered in the instance of Pharaoh; it is quoted from Ex. ix. 16. Observe, 1st. What God did with Pharaoh. He raised him up, brought him into the world, made him famous, gave him the kingdom and

x. 5. "For Moses describeth," &c.: the righteousness of the law was "do," that of the gospel is "trust." "Shall live by them:" rather, "the man which hath done them shall live in it," or "shall have life in it."

x. 6—11. The words quoted from Deuteronomy in these verses were used by Moses to describe the accessibility of the law. St. Paul "regarding Christ as the end of the law, quotes these words not merely as suiting his purpose, but bearing, as originally used, an à fortiori application to faith in Him who is the end of the law" (Alford).

x. 12. This verse comes in support of the statement in verse 11, that "whosoever believeth," &c., "for there is no difference." Alford renders "distinction." "Rich unto all:" expressing "the direction in which the stream of grace gushes forth" (Olshausen).

x. 13. Introduces the Scripture proof (Joel ii. 32). "The name of the Lord:" Jehovah, but here used of Christ. Alford remarks on the power,—set him up as a beacon upon a hill, as the mark of all his plagues [compare Ex. ix. 14]:—hardened his heart, as he had said he would, Ex. iv. 21, “I will harden his heart:” that is, withdrew softening grace, leave him to himself, let Satan loose against him, and lay a succession of providences before him. Or, by raising him up may be meant the permission of the plagues, which gave Pharaoh respite, and the reprieve of Pharaoh in those plagues. In the Hebrew, “I have made thee sinners, make them for himself, even for the living. Thus doth God raise up sinners, make them for himself, even for the day of evil, Ps. xvi. 4; raise them up in outward prosperity, external privileges, Mat. xl. 23, sparing mercies.” 2nd. What he designed in it. “That I might shew my power in thee.” God would, by all this, serve the honour of his name, and manifest his power in baffling the pride and insolence of that great and daring tyrant, who had defied to Heaven itself, and trampled upon all that was great and sacred. If Pharaoh had not been so high and mighty, so bold and hardy, the power of God had not been so illustrious in the ruining of him; but the taking off of the spirit of such a prince, who lifted up at that rate, did indeed proclaim God “glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders,” Ex. xv. 11. This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude. 3rd. His conclusion concerning both these we have, ver. 18, “He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth.” The various dealings of God, by which he makes some to differ from others, must be resolved into his absolute sovereignty. He is debtor to no man, his grace is his own, and he may give it or withhold it as it pleaseth him; we have none of us deserved it, nay, we have all justly forfeited it a thousand times, so that herein the work of our salvation is admirably well ordered, that those who are saved must thank God only, and those who perish must thank themselves only, Hos. xiii. 9. We are bound, as God hath bound us, to do our utmost for the salvation of all we have to do with; but God is bound no farther than he has been pleased to bind himself by his own covenant and promise, which is his revealed will; and that is, that he will receive, and not cast out, those that come to Christ: but the drawing of souls in order to that coming is a preventing distinguishing favour to whom he will. Had he mercy on the Gentiles? It was because he would have mercy on them. Were the Jews hardened? It was because it was his own pleasure to deny them softening grace, and to give them up to their chosen affected unbelief. “Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee.” That scripture excellently explains this, Lu. x. 21; and, as this, doth shew the sovereign will of God in giving or withholding both the means of grace and the effectual blessing upon those means.

1. Some others think that this phrase is to be explained by a reference to that scriptural usage according to which God is said to do whatever indirectly and incidentally results from his agency; on the same principle that a father is said to ruin his children, or a master his servants; or that Christ is said to produce wars and divisions. Thus, Isa. vi. 10, the prophet is commanded to make the heart of the people fat, and their ears heavy, and shut their eyes, &c., as though to him were to be ascribed the incidental results of his preaching. In the same way the Gospel is the cause of death, (not of misery only, but of insensibility also,) to those who hear and disregard it. 2. According to another mode of representation God is understood as merely permitting Pharaoh to harden his own heart, as the result is often expressly referred to Pharaoh himself, Ex. vii. 15, 32, &c. 3. But there seems to be more expressed by the language of the text than mere permission, because it is evidently a punitive act that is here intended, and because this view does not suit the other passages in which God is said to give sinners up to the evil of their own hearts, ch. i. 24, 28. It is probable, therefore, that the judicial abandonment of men "to a reprobate mind," a punitive withdrawing of the influences of the Holy Spirit, and the giving them up to the uncounteracted operation of the hardening or perverting influences by which they are surrounded, are all expressed by the language of the apostle. In this God does no more than what he constantly threatens to do, or which the Scriptures declare he actually does, in the case of those who forsake him; and nothing more than every righteous parent does in reference to a reprobate son. This, in connexion with the principle referred to above, in No. 1, seems as much as can fairly be considered as included in the expressions.—[H.]

Secondly. It might be objected, "Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will?" ver. 10. Had the apostle been arguing only for God's sovereignty in appointing and ordering the terms and conditions of acceptance and salvation, there had not been the least colour for this objection; for he might well find fault if people refused to come up to the terms on which such a salvation is offered; the salvation being so great, the terms could not be hard. But there might be colour for the objection against his arguing for the sovereignty of God in giving and withholding differencing and preventing grace; and the objection is commonly and readily advanced against the doctrine of distinguishing grace. If God, while he gives effectual grace to some, denies it to others, why doth he find fault with those to whom he denies it? If he hath rejected the Jews, and hid from their eyes the things that belong to their peace, why doth he find fault with them for their blindness? If it be his pleasure to discard them as not a people, and not obtaining mercy, their knocking off themselves was no resistance of his will. This objection he answers at large,

By reproving the objector, ver. 20. "Nay but, O man." This is not an objection fit to be made by the creature against his Creator, by man against God. The truth, as it is in Jesus, is that which abases man as nothing, less than nothing, and advances God as sovereign Lord of all. Observe how contemptibly he speaks of man, when he comes to argue with God his maker; "Who art thou?" thou that art so foolish, so feeble, so short-sighted, so incompetent a judge of the Divine counsels? art thou able to fathom such a depth, dispute such a case, to trace that way of God which is in the sea, his path in the great waters? "That repliest against God." It becomes us to submit to him, not to reply against him; to lie down under his hand, not to fly in his face, nor to charge him with folly. 'Ο ὑπὸ τὸν κρημνόντων,—"that answerest again." God is our master, and we are his servants; and it does not become servants to answer again. Tit. ii. 9.

and he is the former; and it does not become us to challenge or arraign his wisdom in ordering and disposing of us into this or that shape or figure. The rude and unformed mass of matter hath no right to this or that form, but is shaped at the pleasure of him that formeth it. God's sovereignty over us is fully illustrated by the power that the potter hath over the clay: compare Jer. 18. 1-6, Is. 64. 1-7, Is. 45. 1-7, Is. 46. 1-10, Is. 47. 1-15, Is. 48. 1-17, Is. 49. 1-13, Is. 50. 1-11, Is. 51. 1-17, Is. 52. 1-12, Is. 53. 1-12, Is. 54. 1-17, Is. 55. 1-12, Is. 56. 1-7, Is. 57. 1-13, Is. 58. 1-14, Is. 59. 1-15, Is. 60. 1-22, Is. 61. 1-11, Is. 62. 1-17, Is. 63. 1-6, Is. 64. 1-7, Is. 65. 1-16, Is. 66. 1-24, Is. 67. 1-13, Is. 68. 1-24, Is. 69. 1-24, Is. 70. 1-9, Is. 71. 1-10, Is. 72. 1-17, Is. 73. 1-40, Is. 74. 1-23, Is. 75. 1-10, Is. 76. 1-13, Is. 77. 1-9, Is. 78. 1-11, Is. 79. 1-13, Is. 80. 1-17, Is. 81. 1-16, Is. 82. 1-5, Is. 83. 1-4, Is. 84. 1-12, Is. 85. 1-12, Is. 86. 1-17, Is. 87. 1-7, Is. 88. 1-18, Is. 89. 1-22, Is. 90. 1-15, Is. 91. 1-16, Is. 92. 1-4, Is. 93. 1-12, Is. 94. 1-23, Is. 95. 1-7, Is. 96. 1-13, Is. 97. 1-13, Is. 98. 1-18, Is. 99. 1-13, Is. 100. 1-11, Is. 101. 1-11, Is. 102. 1-7, Is. 103. 1-24, Is. 104. 1-15, Is. 105. 1-12, Is. 106. 1-15, Is. 107. 1-14, Is. 108. 1-14, Is. 109. 1-17, Is. 110. 1-12, Is. 111. 1-16, Is. 112. 1-10, Is. 113. 1-14, Is. 114. 1-12, Is. 115. 1-21, Is. 116. 1-14, Is. 117. 1-14, Is. 118. 1-14, Is. 119. 1-64, Is. 120. 1-14, Is. 121. 1-14, Is. 122. 1-18, Is. 123. 1-14, Is. 124. 1-27, Is. 125. 1-12, Is. 126. 1-12, Is. 127. 1-14, Is. 128. 1-14, Is. 129. 1-16, Is. 130. 1-16, Is. 131. 1-14, Is. 132. 1-18, Is. 133. 1-14, Is. 134. 1-14, Is. 135. 1-12, Is. 136. 1-14, Is. 137. 1-14, Is. 138. 1-14, Is. 139. 1-14, Is. 140. 1-14, Is. 141. 1-14, Is. 142. 1-14, Is. 143. 1-14, Is. 144. 1-14, Is. 145. 1-14, Is. 146. 1-14, Is. 147. 1-14, Is. 148. 1-14, Is. 149. 1-14, Is. 150. 1-14, Is. 151. 1-14, Is. 152. 1-14, Is. 153. 1-14, Is. 154. 1-14, Is. 155. 1-14, Is. 156. 1-14, Is. 157. 1-14, Is. 158. 1-14, Is. 159. 1-14, Is. 160. 1-14, Is. 161. 1-14, Is. 162. 1-14, Is. 163. 1-14, Is. 164. 1-14, Is. 165. 1-14, Is. 166. 1-14, Is. 167. 1-14, Is. 168. 1-14, Is. 169. 1-14, Is. 170. 1-14, Is. 171. 1-14, Is. 172. 1-14, Is. 173. 1-14, Is. 174. 1-14, Is. 175. 1-14, Is. 176. 1-14, Is. 177. 1-14, Is. 178. 1-14, Is. 179. 1-14, Is. 180. 1-14, Is. 181. 1-14, Is. 182. 1-14, Is. 183. 1-14, Is. 184. 1-14, Is. 185. 1-14, Is. 186. 1-14, Is. 187. 1-14, Is. 188. 1-14, Is. 189. 1-14, Is. 190. 1-14, Is. 191. 1-14, Is. 192. 1-14, Is. 193. 1-14, Is. 194. 1-14, Is. 195. 1-14, Is. 196. 1-14, Is. 197. 1-14, Is. 198. 1-14, Is. 199. 1-14, Is. 200. 1-14, Is. 201. 1-14, Is. 202. 1-14, Is. 203. 1-14, Is. 204. 1-14, Is. 205. 1-14, Is. 206. 1-14, Is. 207. 1-14, Is. 208. 1-14, Is. 209. 1-14, Is. 210. 1-14, Is. 211. 1-14, Is. 212. 1-14, Is. 213. 1-14, Is. 214. 1-14, Is. 215. 1-14, Is. 216. 1-14, Is. 217. 1-14, Is. 218. 1-14, Is. 219. 1-14, Is. 220. 1-14, Is. 221. 1-14, Is. 222. 1-14, Is. 223. 1-14, Is. 224. 1-14, Is. 225. 1-14, Is. 226. 1-14, Is. 227. 1-14, Is. 228. 1-14, Is. 229. 1-14, Is. 230. 1-14, Is. 231. 1-14, Is. 232. 1-14, Is. 233. 1-14, Is. 234. 1-14, Is. 235. 1-14, Is. 236. 1-14, Is. 237. 1-14, Is. 238. 1-14, Is. 239. 1-14, Is. 240. 1-14, Is. 241. 1-14, Is. 242. 1-14, Is. 243. 1-14, Is. 244. 1-14, Is. 245. 1-14, Is. 246. 1-14, Is. 247. 1-14, Is. 248. 1-14, Is. 249. 1-14, Is. 250. 1-14, Is. 251. 1-14, Is. 252. 1-14, Is. 253. 1-14, Is. 254. 1-14, Is. 255. 1-14, Is. 256. 1-14, Is. 257. 1-14, Is. 258. 1-14, Is. 259. 1-14, Is. 260. 1-14, Is. 261. 1-14, Is. 262. 1-14, Is. 263. 1-14, Is. 264. 1-14, Is. 265. 1-14, Is. 266. 1-14, Is. 267. 1-14, Is. 268. 1-14, Is. 269. 1-

1st. He gives us the comparison, ver. 21. The potter, out of the same lump, may make either a fashionable vessel, and a vessel fit for creditable and honourable uses, or a contemptible vessel, and a vessel in which is no pleasure; and herein he acts arbitrarily, as he might have chosen whether he would make any vessel of it at all, or whether he would leave it in the hole of the pit out of which it was dug.

2nd. The application of the comparison, ver. 22—24. Two sorts of vessels God forms out of the great lump of fallen mankind. First, "Vessels of wrath"

—vessels filled with wrath, as a vessel of wine is a vessel filled with wine; "full of the fury of the Lord," Isa. li. 20. In these God is willing to shew his wrath; that is, his punishing justice, and his enmity to sin. This must be shewn to all the world. God will make it appear that he hates sin. He will likewise make his power known, το δεικναι αὐτοῦ. It is a power of strength and energy, an inflicting power, which works and effects the destruction of those that perish; it is a destruction that proceeds "from the glory of his power," 2 Thes. i. 9. The eternal damnation of sinners will be an abundant demonstration of the power of God; for he will act in it himself immediately, his wrath preying as it were upon guilty consciences, and his arm stretched out totally to destroy their well-being, and yet at the same instant wonderfully to preserve the being of the creature. In order to this, God "endured them with much longsuffering"—exercised a great deal of patience towards them, let them alone to fill up the measure of sin, to grow till they were ripe for ruin, and so they became "fitted for destruction," fitted by their own sin and self-hardening. The reigning corruptions and wickedness of the soul are its preparedness and disposedness for hell; a soul is hereby made combustible matter, fit for the flames of hell. When Christ said to the Jews, Mat. xxiii. 32, "Fill you up then the measure of your fathers, that upon you may come all the righteous blood," ver. 35; he did as it were endure them with much longsuffering, that they might by their own obstinacy and wilfulness in sin fit themselves for destruction. Secondly. "Vessels of mercy," filled with mercy. The happiness bestowed upon the saved remnant is the fruit not of their merit, but of God's mercy. The spring of all the joy and glory of heaven is that mercy of God which endures for ever. Vessels of honour must to eternity own themselves vessels of mercy. Observe, 1st. What he designs in the v. "To make known the riches of his glory," that is, of his goodness; for God's goodness is his greatest glory, especially when it is communicated with the greatest sovereignty. "I beseech thee shew me thy glory," saith Moses, Ex. xxxiii. 18. "I will make all my goodness to pass before thee," saith Ex. xxxiii. 19, and that given out freely, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious." God makes known this glory, this goodness of his in the preservation and supply of all the creatures; the earth is full of his goodness, and the year crowned with it; but when he would demonstrate the riches of his goodness, unsearchable riches, he doth it in the salvation of the saints, that will be to eternity glorious monuments of Divine grace. 2nd. What he doth for them. He doth before prepare them to glory. Sanctification is the preparation of the soul for glory, making it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light. This is God's work; we can destroy ourselves fast enough, but we cannot save ourselves. Sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven; and all those that God designs for heaven hereafter he prepares and fits for heaven now; he works them to the self-same thing, 2 Cor. v. 5. And would you know who these vessels of mercy are? Those whom he hath called, ver. 24; for "whom he did predestinate them he also called" with an effectual call. And these "not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles;" for, the partition wall being taken down, the world was laid in common; and not as it had been, God's favour appropriated to the Jews, and they put a degree nearer his acceptance than the rest of the world. They now stood upon the same level with the Gentiles; and the question is not now, whether of the seed of Abraham or no, that is neither here nor there; but whether or no called according to his purpose.

25 As he saith also in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people ; and her beloved, which was not beloved. 26 And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people ; there shall they be called the children of the living God. 27 Esaias also crieth concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved : 28 For he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness : because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth. 29 And as Esaias said before, Except the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we had been as Sodoma, and been made like unto Gomorrha.

Having explained the promise, and proved the Divine sovereignty, the apostle here shews how the rejection of the Jews and the taking in of the Gentiles was foretold in the Old Testament, and therefore must needs be very well consistent with the promise made to the fathers under the Old Testament. It tends very much to the clearing of a truth to observe how the Scripture is fulfilled in it. The Jews would no doubt willingly refer it to the Old Testament, the Scriptures of which were committed to them. Now he shews how this, which was so uneasy to them, was there spoken of.

First. By the prophet Hosea, who speaks of the taking in of a great many of the Gentiles, Hos. ii. 23; 1. 10. The Gentiles had not been the people of God, not owning him, nor owned by him in that relation; but, saith he, "I will call them my people," make them such, and own them as such, notwithstanding all their unworthiness. A blessed change! Former badness is no bar to God's present grace and mercy. "And her beloved which was not beloved." Those that God calls his people he calls beloved. He loves those that are his own. And lest it might be supposed that they should become God's people only by being proselyted to the Jewish religion, and made members of that nation, he adds from Hos. i. 10. "In the place where it was said, &c., there shall they be called." They need not be embodied with the Jews, nor go up to Jerusalem to worship; but wherever they are scattered over the face of the earth there will God own them. Observe the great dignity and honour of the saints, that they are called the children of the living God; and his calling them so makes them so. Behold what manner of love! This honour have all his saints.

Secondly. By the prophet Isaiah, who speaks of the casting off of many of the Jews, in two places :

1. One is Isa. x. 22, 23, which speaks of the saving of a remnant, that is, but a remnant; which, though in the prophecy it seems to refer to the preservation of a remnant from the destruction and desolation that was coming upon them by Sennacherib and his army, yet is to be understood as looking farther, and sufficiently proves that it is no strange thing for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet maintain his word of promise to Abraham.

strong testimony such an application of the quotation affords to the Godhead of our Lord.

x. 16—18. The connection of these verses will be clearer if we note the contrast of "obeyed" in verse 16 and "heard" of verse 18. The words in the original bear the same relation to each other as "hearken" and "hear." The glad tidings is sent to all, but all did not hearken (obey). This Isaiah foretold. But the apostle adds, the question is not of hearkening but of hearing. Did not all hear?

Yes, for the word of the Gospel is sent throughout all the world. The citation from Psa. xix. is full of meaning. The light of the glad tidings is free to all as that of the sun, and carries with it a self-evidencing power as distinct as the witness of the universe to the Creator.

x. 19. Israel had warning that the Gospel would be universal. Moses foretold it when, in Deut. xxxii. 21, he predicted that Israel would forsake God, and provoke him to jealousy by going after their in "all force and virtue: which is intimated in the supposition, that "the number of the children of Israel was as the sand of the sea," which was part of the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 17. And yet only a remnant shall be saved; for many are called, but few are chosen. In this salvation of the remnant we are told, ver. 28, from the prophet, 1st. That he will complete the work, "He will finish the work." When God begins, he will make an end, whether in ways of judgment or of mercy. The rejection of the unbelieving Jews God would finish in their utter ruin by the Romans, who, soon after this, quite took away their place and nation. The assuming of Christian churches into the Divine favour, and the spreading of the Gospel in other nations, was a work which God would likewise finish, and be known by his name Jehovah. "As for God, his work is perfect." Margin, "He will finish the account." God in his eternal counsels has taken an account of the children of men, allotted them to such or such a condition, to such a share of privileges, and as they come into being his dealings with them are pursuant to these counsels; and he will finish the account, complete the mystical body, call in as many as belong to the election of grace; and then the account will be finished. 2nd. That he will contract it; not only finish it, but finish it quickly. Under the Old Testament he seemed to tarry, and to make a longer and more tedious work of it; the wheels arrived but slowly towards the extent of the church; but now he will cut it short, and make a short work upon the earth. Gentile converts were now flying as a cloud. But he will cut it short in righteousness, both in wisdom and in justice. Men, when they cut short, do amiss,—they do indeed despatch causes; but when God cuts short it is always in righteousness. So the fathers generally apply it. Some understand it of the evangelical law and covenant, which Christ has introduced and established in the world; he has in that finished the work, put an end to the types and ceremonies of the Old Testament. Christ said, "It is finished," and then the veil was rent, echoing as it were to the word that Christ said upon the cross. And he will cut it short: the work, (it is λογος,—the word, the law,) was under the Old Testament very long; a long train of institutions, ceremonies, conditions; but now it is cut short. Our duty is now, under the Gospel, summed up in a much less room than it was under the law; the covenant was abridged and contracted; religion is brought into a less compass. And it is in righteousness, in favour to us, in justice to his own design and counsel. With us contractions use to darken things, Brevi esse laboro, obscurus fio.—I strive to be concise, but prove obscure; but it is not so in this case. Though it be cut short, it is clear and plain; and because short, the more easy.

2. Another is quoted from Isa. i. 9, where the prophet is shewing how, in a time of general calamity and destruction, God would preserve a seed. This is to the same purpose with the former; and the scope of it is to shew that it was no strange thing for God to leave the greatest part of the people of the Jews to ruin, and to reserve to himself only a small remnant. So he had done formerly, as appears by their own prophets; and they must not wonder if he did so now. Observe, 1st. What God is. He is "the Lord of Sabaoth;" that is, the Lord of hosts; a Hebrew word retained in the Greek, as Jas. v. 4. All the host of heaven and earth are at his beck and dispose. When God secures a seed to himself out of a degenerate apostate world, he acts as Lord of Sabaoth. It is an act of almighty power, and infinite sovereignty. 2nd. What his people are. They are a seed, a small number, (the corn reserved for next year's seedings is but little compared with that which is spent and eaten,) but a useful number; the seed, the substance of the next generation, Isa. vi. 13. It is so far from being an impeachment of the justice and righteousness of God that so many perish and are destroyed, that it is a wonder of Divine power and mercy that all are not destroyed, that there are any saved; for even those that are left to be a seed, if God had dealt with them according to their sins, had perished with the rest. This is the great truth which this scripture teacheth us.

30 What shall we say then? That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. 31 But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness. 32 Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law. For they stumbled at that stumblingstone; 33 As it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a stumblingstone and rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

The apostle comes here at last to fix the true reason of the reception of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews. There was a difference in the way of their seeking, and therefore there was that different success; though still it was the free grace of God that made them differ. He concludes like an orator, "What shall we say then?" What is the conclusion of the whole dispute?

First, Concerning the Gentiles, observe, 1. How they had been alienated from righteousness. They followed not after it; they knew not their guilt and misery, and therefore were not at all solicitous to procure a remedy. In their conversion preventing grace was greatly magnified; God was found of them that sought him not, Isa. lxv. 1. There was nothing in them to dispose them for such a favour more than what free grace wrought in them. Thus doth God delight to dispense grace in a way of sovereignty and absolute dominion. 2. How they attained to righteousness notwithstanding. By faith. Not by being proselyted to the Jewish religion, and submitting to the ceremonial law; but by embracing Christ, and believing in Christ, and submitting to the Gospel. They attained to that by the short cut of believing sincerely in Christ which the Jews had been long in vain beating about the bush for.

Secondly, Concerning the Jews, observe, 1. How they missed their end. They "followed after the law of righteousness," ver. 31; that is, they talked hard of justification and holiness, seemed very ambitious of being the people of God and the favourites of heaven, but they did not attain to it; that is, the greatest part of them did not. As many as stuck to their old Jewish principles and ceremonies, and pursued a happiness in those observances, embracing the shadows now the substance was come; these fell short of acceptance with God, were not owned as his people, nor went to their house justified. 2. How they mistook their way, which was the cause of their missing the end, ver. 32, 33. They sought, but not in the right way, not in the humbling way, not in the substituted appointed way. "Not by faith," not by embracing the Christian religion, and depending upon the merit of Christ, and submitting to the terms of the Gospel, which were the very life and end of the law. But they sought "by the works of the law;" as if they were to expect justification by their observance of the precepts and ceremonies of the law of Moses. This was "the stumblingstone at which they stumbled." They could not get over this corrupt principle they had espoused, that the law was given them for no other end but that merely by their observance of it, and obedience to it, they might be justified before God; and so they could by no means be reconciled to the doctrine of Christ, which brought them off from that to expect justification through the merit and satisfaction of another. Christ himself is to some a stone of stumbling; for which he quotes Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16. It is said that Christ should be set for the fall of any, and yet it is so, Lu. ii. 34; that ever poison should be sucked out of the balm of Gilead, that the foundation-stone should be to any a stone of stumbling, and the Rock of salvation a rock of offence. So he is to multitudes; so he was to the unbelieving Jews, who rejected him, because he put an end to the ceremonial law. But still there is a remnant that do believe on him, and they shall not be ashamed; that is, their hopes and expectations of justification by him shall not be disappointed, as theirs are who expect it by the law.

So that upon the whole matter the unbelieving Jews have no reason to quarrel with God for rejecting them; they had a fair offer of righteousness, and life; and salvation made them upon gospel terms, which they did not like, and would not come up to; and therefore if they perish they may thank themselves; their blood is upon their own heads.

[In the eleventh verse we cannot refuse the statement that God had before the birth of Jacob and Esau an anterior purpose respecting their destinies; and that the actual and historical difference which afterwards took place between the two was the effect of that purpose. Of this election on the part of God I can give no account; I submit to be informed of the fact, but I am utterly in the dark as to the reason of it. I have to remark, however, that although this purpose according to election is not of works but of Him that calleth—although the purpose of the Divine mind was the primary, the originating cause of the favour shewn to Israel—yet it followeth not that works on the part of those whom he does favour are not indispensable. You would say of a stream of water that issued first from a fountain-head, and then was collected into a reservoir or second fountain, whence it flowed anew, you would say that, though it came through the lower fountain, it came from or of the higher. And so of this high predestination on the part of God. All that regards either our history in time, or our final condition in eternity, might originate there; and yet it may be true that we cannot pass onward to glory in heaven without passing through a course of personal righteousness upon earth. The primary will of God may be the aboriginal fountain of all the blessings which the children of life are to enjoy; and yet there may be a secondary fountain derived therefrom—even a fountain of grace struck out in the heart of man, and whence all the virtues of moral worth and of spiritual excellence overflow upon his history. So that, though God's primary decree is not of works, it is at least to works—inasmuch that, even among the children of the predestined Israel, the rewards and the preferments of eternity follow in the train of good works; and among the children of reprobate Esau the disgrace and the wretchedness of their irretrievable condemnation follow in the train of their evil works.—C.]

CHAPTER X.

The dissolving of the peculiar church state of the Jews, and the rejection of that policy by the repealing of their ceremonial law,—the vacating of all the institutions of it, the abolishing of their priesthood, the burning of their temple, and the taking away of their place and nation, and in their room the substituting and erecting of a Catholic church state among the Gentile nations,—though to us now, when these things are long since done and completed, they may seem no great matter, yet to them who lived when they were doing, who knew how high the Jews had stood in God's favour, and how deplorable the condition of the Gentile world had been for many ages, it appeared very great and marvellous, and a mystery hard to be understood. The apostle in this chapter, as in the foregoing and that which follows, is explaining and proving it; but with several very useful digressions, which a little interrupt the thread of his discourse. To two great truths I would reduce this chapter: 1. That there is a great difference between the righteousness of the law, which the unbelieving Jews were wedded to, and the righteousness of faith offered in the Gospel, ver. 1—11. 11. That there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles, but in point of justification and acceptance with God the Gospel sets them both upon the same level, ver. 12—21.

RETHRENN, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved. 2 For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. 3 For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God. 4 For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. 5 For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them. 6 But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above:) 7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.) 8 But what saith it? The word is idols, which were no gods; and that in consequence God would provoke their jealousy, and punish them by receiving into favour those whom they regarded as "no people."

xi. 1. "Hath God," &c.: rather, "Did God cast away," &c. The closing verse of the last chapter might suggest a total rejection of all Israelites; hence the apostle hastens to remove all ground for such an impression. "For I also," &c.: he himself is a sufficient proof that God did not cast off all, for he cannot entertain the supposition that God has cast off Israel without excluding himself. The latter view is that of Alford and Vaughan; practically it agrees with the former, which is adopted by most commentators. "Abraham," "Benjamin;" compare 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5. Benjamin was the tribe of the first judge and of the first king.

xi. 2. "His people which he foreknew;" i.e., his people nationally. "The covenant with Israel having been national, shall ultimately be fulfilled to them as a nation; not by the gathering in merely of indi-nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach; 9 That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. 10 For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. 11 For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

The scope of the apostle in this part of the chapter is to shew the vast difference between the righteousness of the law and the righteousness of faith; and the great pre-eminence of the righteousness of faith above that of the law; that he might induce and persuade the Jews to believe in Christ, aggravate the folly and sin of those that refused, and justify God in the rejection of such refusers.

First. Paul doth here profess his good affection to the Jews, with the reason of it, ver. 1, 2: where he gives them a good wish and a good witness.

1. A good wish, ver. 1. A wish that they might be saved; saved from the temporal ruin and destruction that was coming upon them; saved from the wrath to come, eternal wrath, which was hanging over their heads. It is implied in this wish that they might be convinced and converted; he could not pray in faith that they might be saved in their unbelief. Though Paul preached against them, yet he prayed for them. Herein he was merciful as God is, who is "not willing that any should perish," 2 Pet. iii. 9; desires not the death of sinners. It is our duty truly and earnestly to desire the salvation of the souls of others next to the salvation of our own. This he saith was his heart's desire and prayer; which intimates, 1st. The strength and sincerity of his desire. It was his heart's desire; it was not a formal compliment, as good wishes are with many from the teeth outward, but a real desire. This it was, before it was his prayer. The soul of prayer is the heart's desire. Cold desires do but beg denials; we must even breathe out our souls in every prayer. 2ndly. The offering up of this desire to God. It was not only his heart's desire, but it was his prayer. There may be desires in the heart and yet no prayer, unless those desires be presented to God. Wishing and wouling, if that be all, is not praying. 2. A good witness, as a reason of his good wish; ver. 2, "I bear them record that they have a zeal of God." The unbelieving Jews were the most bitter enemies Paul had in the world, and yet Paul gives them as good a character as the truth would bear. We should say the best we can even of our worst enemies: this is blessing them that curse us. Charity teacheth us to have the best opinion of persons, and to put the best construction upon words and actions that they will bear. We should take notice of that which is commendable even in bad people. "They have a zeal of God." Their opposition to the Gospel is from a principle of respect to the law, which they knew to have come from God. There is such a thing as a blind, misguided zeal; such was that of the Jews, who, when they hated Christ's people and ministers, and cast them out, said, "Let the Lord be glorified," Isa. lvi. 5; nay, killed them, and thought they did God good service, Jno. xvi. 2.

Secondly. He here shews the fatal mistake that the unbelieving Jews were guilty of; which was their ruin. Their zeal was "not according to knowledge." It is true God gave them that law which they were so zealous for; but they might have known that by the appearance of the promised Messiah an end was put to it. He introduced a new religion and way of worship, to which the former must give place; he proved himself the Son of God, gave the most convincing evidence that could be of his being the Messiah; and yet they did not know, and would not own him, but shut their eyes against the clear light, so that their zeal for the law was blind. This he shews farther, ver. 3, where we may observe,

1. The nature of their unbelief. They "have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God;" that is, they have not yielded to gospel terms, nor accepted of the tender of justification by faith in Christ, which is made in the Gospel. Unbelief is a non-submission to the righteousness of God, standing it out against the gospel proclamation of indemnity. "Have not submitted." In true faith there is need of a great deal of submission; therefore the first lesson Christ teacheth is, to deny ourselves. It is a great piece of condescension for a proud heart to be content to be beholden to free grace; we are loath to sue sub forma pauperis;—"as paupers."

2. The causes of their unbelief: and those are two: 1st. Ignorance of God's righteousness. They did not understand and believe, and consider the strict justice of God in hating and punishing sin, and demanding satisfaction; did not consider what need we have of a righteousness wherein to appear before him; if they had, they would never have stood out against the gospel offer, nor expected justification by their own works, as if they could satisfy God's justice. Or, being ignorant of God's way of justification, which he has now appointed and revealed by Jesus Christ. They did not know it because they would not; they shut their eyes against the discoveries of it, and loved darkness rather. 2nd. A proud conceit of their own righteousness. "Going about to establish their own;" that is, a righteousness of their own devising, and of their own working out, by the merit of their works, and by their observance of the ceremonial law. They thought they needed not to be beholden to the merit of Christ, and therefore depended upon their own performances as sufficient to make up a righteousness wherein to appear before God. They could not, with Paul, disclaim a dependence upon this, Phil. iii. 9, "Not having my own righteousness." See an instance of this pride in the Pharisee, Lu. xviii. 10, 11: compare ver. 14.

Thirdly. He here shews the folly of that mistake; and what an unreasonable thing it was for them to be seeking justification by the works of the law, now Christ was come, and had brought in an everlasting righteousness; considering,

1. The subserviency of the law to the Gospel; ver. 4, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness." The design of the law was to lead people to Christ: the moral law was but for the searching of the wound, the ceremonial law for the shadowing forth of the remedy; but Christ is the end of both: see 2 Cor. iii. 7, and compare Gal. iii. 23, 24. The use of the law was to direct people for righteousness to Christ. Christ is the end of the ceremonial law: he is the period of it, because he is the perfection of it. When the substance comes the shadow is gone. The sacrifices, and offerings, and purifications, appointed under the Old Testament, prefigured Christ, and pointed at him; and their inability to take away sin discovered the necessity of a sacrifice that should, by being once offered, take away sin. Christ is the end of the moral law in that he did that which the law could not do, ch. viii. 3 and secured the great end of it. The end of the law was to bring men to perfect obedience, and so to obtain justification; this is now become impossible by reason of the power of sin, and the corruption of nature: but "Christ is the end of the law." The law is not destroyed, nor the intention of the lawgiver frustrated; but, full satisfaction being made by the death of Christ for our breach of the law, the end is attained, and we put in another way of justification. "Christ is" thus "the end of the law for righteousness," that is, for justification; but it is only "to every one that believeth." Upon our believing, that is, our humble consent to the terms of the Gospel, we become interested in Christ's satisfaction, and so are justified through the redemption that is in Jesus.

[It is the merit of Christ's obedience, imputed unto us and made ours by faith, which forms our right or title-deed of entry into the kingdom of heaven. He is the Lord our righteousness; and in receiving him we receive that righteousness which it was the end of the law to have secured for us had it been by us fulfilled, but which we in vain seek by the law, now that it has been broken.—C.]

2. The excellency of the Gospel above the law. This he proves by shewing the different constitution of these two.

1st. What is the righteousness which is of the law. This he shews, ver. 5; the tenor of it is, Do and live. Though it direct us to a better and more effectual righteousness in Christ, yet in itself, considered as a law, abstracted from its respect to Christ and the Gospel, (for so the unbelieving Jews embraced and retained it,) it owneth nothing as a righteousness sufficient to justify a man but that of perfect obedience. For this he quotes that scripture, Lev. xviii. 5, "Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live in them." To this he refers likewise, Gal. iii. 12, "The man that doth them shall live in them." "Live," that is, be happy, not only in the land of Canaan, but in heaven, of which Canaan was a type and figure. The doing supposed must be perfect and sinless, without the least breach or violation. The law which was given upon mount Sinai, though it was not a pure covenant of works, (for who then could be saved under that dispensation?) yet, that it might be the more effectual to drive people to Christ, and to make the covenant of grace welcome, it had a very great mixture of the strictness and terror of the covenant of works. Now, was it not extreme folly in the Jews to adhere so closely to this way of justification and salvation, which was in itself so hard, and by the corruption of nature now become impossible, when there was a new and a living way opened?

2nd. What is that righteousness which is of faith, ver. 6, &c. This he describes in the words of Moses, in Deuteronomy, in the second law, (so Deuteronomy signifies,) where there was a much clearer revelation of Christ and the Gospel than there was in the first giving of the law: he quotes it from Deu. xxx. 11-14, and shews,

First. That it is not at all hard or difficult. The way of justification and salvation has in it no such depths or knots as may discourage us, no insuperable difficulties attempting it; but, as was foretold, it is a highway, Isa. xlv. 8. We are not put to climb for it, it is not in heaven; we are not put to dive for it, it is not in the deep. 1st. We need not go to heaven to search the records there, or to inquire into the secrets of the Divine counsel. It is true, Christ is in heaven, but we may be justified and saved without going thither to fetch him thence, or sending a special messenger to him. 2nd. We need not go to the deep to fetch Christ out of the grave, or from the state of the dead. "Into the deep to bring up Christ from the dead." This plainly shews that Christ's descent into the deep, or into adms, was no more but his going into the state of the dead, in allusion to Jonah. It is true that Christ was in the grave, and it is as true that he is now in heaven; but we need not perplex and puzzle ourselves with fancied difficulties, nor must we create to ourselves such gross and carnal ideas of these things, as if the method of salvation was impracticable, and the design of the revelation was only to amuse us. No, salvation is not put at so vast a distance from us.

[Thus would we explain these parenthetic clauses. Strength to do the thing implies a strength to wield the alone instrument that was adequate for the doing of it. I can no more make atonement for my own guilt than I could have ascended into heaven, and there brought down Christ from above who has poured out his soul unto the death for me. I can no more earn or establish my own right to the high rewards of eternity, than I could have descended into the deep, and there brought up Christ again from the dead, who, in virtue of that everlasting righteousness which himself alone hath fulfilled, was raised to the mediatorial throne which he now occupies, and from which he welcomes the approaches of all, and casts out none who come unto him. Let me say not in my heart then, that there is a strength in me commensurate to the work which called for either the one or the other of these movements; but, dismissing the vain imagination, let me forthwith rejoice that it is a work no longer to do, because already done—that it is a work which has already passed through such able hands, even of him who travelled in the greatness of his strength for the full and finished performance of it—that a ready-made righteousness is now looking down upon me from heaven, made to my hand, and which I am simply invited to lay hold of—that personally and practically, my concern now is not with the doing, but with the report of the doing—not with a work which is far above my reach, but with a word which is nigh unto me, and in which, with the felt helplessness and docility of a little child, my only part is to acquiesce—a word now standing at the door, and soliciting admittance from every one of us; and which, when once it finds entrance into the house of a believer's heart, makes good his interest in the whole of this wondrous salvation. The question and the remonstrance now held with the men of our fallen race is not, Who of you hath made good the righteousness of the law? but, "Who hath believed our report, and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?"—C.]

Secondly. But it is very plain and easy: "The word is nigh thee." When we speak of looking upon Christ, and receiving Christ, and feeding upon Christ, it is not Christ in heaven, nor Christ in the deep, that we mean; but Christ in the promise, Christ exhibited to us, and offered in the word. Christ is nigh thee, for the word is nigh thee; nigh thee indeed, it is "in thy mouth, and in thy heart;" there is no difficulty in understanding, believing, and owning of it. The work thou hast to do lies within thee: "The kingdom of God is within you," Lu. xvii. 21; thence thou must fetch thy evidences, not out of the records of heaven. It is, that is, it is promised that it shall be, "in thy mouth," Isa. lix. 21; "and in thy heart," Jer. xxxi. 33. All that which is to be done for us is already done to our hands: Christ is come down from heaven, we need not go to fetch him; he is come up from the deep, we need not perplex ourselves how to bring him up. There is nothing now to be done, but to work in us: that must be our cure, to look to our heart and mouth. Those that were under the law were to do all themselves. "Do this and live;" but the Gospel discovers the greatest of the work done already, and what remains out short in righteousness; salvation offered upon very plain and easy terms, brought to our door, as it were, in the word which is nigh us. It is in our mouth, we are reading it daily; it is in our heart, we are or should be thinking of it daily. Even the word of faith, the Gospel, and the promise of it: called the word of faith, 1st. Because it is the object of faith, about which it is conversant, the word which we believe. 2nd. Because it is the precept of faith commanding

vidual Jews, or of all the Jews individually, into the Christian Church, but by the national restoration of the Jews—not in unbelief, but as a Christian, believing nation—to all that can under the Gospel represent their ancient pre-eminence, and to the fulness of those promises which have never yet in their plain sense been accomplished to them" (Alford).

xi. 5, 6. "Election of grace:" the salvation of the remnant is of grace, the free favour of spontaneous love. Verse 6 is clearer if we render "if it (the election) be by grace, it is no more," &c. The second half of the verse is not found in some of the best MSS., but in any case the position laid down by the apostle is plain. Salvation must be either of works or of grace; there can be no mixture of the two principles.

xi. 8. "Were blinded:" rather, "were hardened." "Spirit of slumber:" better, "of stupor," or "torpor." "Wine of astonishment:" compare Psa. lx. 3. The word in the LXX. for "astonish-it, and making it the great condition of justification. 3rd. Because it is the ordinary means by which faith is wrought and conveyed.

Now what is the word of faith? We have the tenor of it, ver. 9, 10, the sum of the Gospel, which is plain and easy enough. Observe, 1st. What is promised to us: "Thou shalt be saved." It is salvation that the Gospel exhibits and tenders. Saved from guilt and wrath, with the salvation of the soul, an eternal salvation, which Christ is the author of, a Saviour to the uttermost. 2nd. Upon what terms. Two things required as conditions of salvation:

[The two requisites for salvation mentioned in this verse are confession and faith. They are mentioned in their natural order; as confession is the fruit and external evidence of faith. So, in 2 Pet. i. 10, calling is placed before election, because the former is the evidence of the latter.—H.]

(1.) Confessing the Lord Jesus. Openly professing relation to him, and dependence on him, as our Prince and Saviour; owning Christianity in the face of all the allurements and affrightments of this world; standing by him in all weathers. Our Lord Jesus lays a great stress upon this confessing of him before men: see Mat. x. 32, 33. It is the product of many graces, evidencing a great deal of self-denial, love to Christ, contempt of the world, a mighty courage and resolution. It was a very great thing, especially when the profession of Christ and Christianity hazarded estate, honour, preferment, liberty, life, and all that is dear in this world; which was the case in the primitive times. (2.) Believing in the heart that God raised him from the dead. The profession of faith with the mouth, if there be not the power of it in the heart, is but a mockery; the root of it must be laid in an unfeigned assent to the revelation of the Gospel concerning Christ, especially concerning his resurrection, which is the fundamental article of the Christian faith; for thereby he was declared to be the Son of God with power, and full evidence was given that God accepted his satisfaction.

This is farther illustrated, ver. 10, and the order inverted, because there must first be faith in the heart before there can be an acceptable confession with the mouth. (1.) Concerning faith. It is with the heart that man believeth; which implies more than an assent of the understanding, and takes in the consent of the will; an inward, hearty, sincere, and strong consent. It is not believing, not to be reckoned so, if it be not with the heart. This is unto righteousness. There is the righteousness of justification, and the righteousness of sanctification. Faith is to both; it is the condition of our justification, Rom. v. 1, and it is the root and spring of our sanctification; in it it is begun, by it it is carried on, Acts xv. 4. (2.) Concerning profession. It is with the mouth that confession is made; confession to God in prayer and praise, Rom. xv. 6; confession to men, owning the ways of God before others, especially when we are called to it in a day of persecution. It is fit God should be honoured with the mouth, for he made man's mouth, Ex. iv. 11; and at such a time has promised to give his faithful people a mouth and wisdom, Lu. xxi. 15. It is part of the honour of Christ that every tongue shall confess, Phil. ii. 11; and this is said to be unto salvation, because it is the performance of the condition of that promise, Mat. x. 32. Justification by faith lays the foundation of our title to salvation; but by confession we build upon that foundation, and come at last to the full possession of that to which we were entitled.

So that we have here a brief summary of the terms of salvation, and they are very reasonable; in short this, that we must devote, dedicate, and give up to God our souls and our bodies; our souls in believing with the heart, and our bodies in confessing with the mouth. "This do, and thou shalt live." For this, ver. 11, he quotes Isa. xxviii. 16, "Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed;" οὐ καταισχυνθήσεται. That is, (1.) He will not be ashamed to own that Christ in whom he trusts; that he believes in the heart will not be ashamed to confess with the mouth. It is sinful shame that makes people deny Christ, Mar. viii. 38. "He that believeth will not make haste," so the prophet has it; will not make haste to overrun the sufferings he meets with in the way of his duty; will not be ashamed of a despised religion. (2.) He shall not be ashamed of his hope in Christ; he shall not be disappointed of his end. It is our duty that we must not, it is our privilege that we shall not, be ashamed of our faith in Christ. He shall never have cause to repent his confidence in reposing such a trust in the Lord Jesus.

12 For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. 13 For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. 14 How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher? 15 And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! 16 But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report? 17 So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. 18 But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily, their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world. 19 But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I will anger you. 20 But Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. 21 But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

The first words express the design of the apostle through these verses, that there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles, but they stand upon the same level in point of acceptance with God. In Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, Col. iii. 11. God doth not save any or reject any because they are Jews, or because they are Greeks, but doth equally accept both upon gospel terms. "There is no difference." For the proof of this he urgeth two arguments:

First. That God is the same to all. "The same Lord over all is rich unto all." There is not one God to the Jews, that is more kind, and another to the Gentiles, that is less kind; but he is the same to all, a common Father to all mankind. When he proclaimed his name, "The Lord, the Lord God, gracious and merciful," he thereby signified not only what he was to the Jews, but what he is and will be to all his creatures that seek unto him. Not only good, but rich, plenteous in goodness; he hath wherewith to supply them all, and he is free and ready to give out to them; he is both able and willing. Not only rich, but rich unto us; liberal and bountiful in dispensing his favours. "To all that call upon him." Something must be done by us, that we may reap of this bounty, and it is as little as can be; we must call upon him. He will for this be inquired of, Eze. xxxvi. 37; and sure that which is not worth the asking is not worth the having. We have nothing to do but to draw out by prayer, as there is occasion.

Secondly. That the promise is the same to all; ver. 13, "Whosoever shall call," one as well as another, without exception. This extent, this undifferencing extent of the promise, both to Jews and Gentiles, he thinks should not be surprising, for it was foretold by the prophet, Joel ii. 21. Calling upon the name of the Lord is here put for all practical religion. What is the life of a Christian but a life of prayer? It implies a sense of our dependence on him, and an entire dedication of ourselves to him, a believing expectation of our all from him. Is that doth this shall be saved. It is but ask and have; what would we have more? For the farther illustration of this, he observes,

1. How necessary it was that the Gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, ver. 14, 15. This was it that the Jews were so angry with Paul for, that he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and preached the Gospel to them. Now, he shews how needful it was to bring them within the reach of the forementioned promise, an interest in which they should not envy to any of their fellow creatures. 1st. They cannot "call on him in whom they have not believed." Except they believe that he is God they will not call upon him by prayer; to what purpose should they? The grace of faith is absolutely necessary to the duty of prayer; we cannot pray aright, nor pray to acceptance, without it. He that comes to God by prayer must believe, Heb. xi. 6. Till they believed the true God they were calling upon idols; "O Baal, hear us." 2nd. They cannot "believe in him of whom they have not heard." Some way or other the Divine revelation must be made known to us before we can receive it, and assent to it; it is not born with us. In hearing is included reading, which is tantamount, and by which many are brought to believe; Jno. xx. 31. "These things are written that you may believe." But hearing only is mentioned, as the more ordinary and natural way of receiving information. 3rd. They cannot "hear without a preacher;" how should they? Somebody must tell them what they are to believe. Preachers and hearers are correlates. It is a blessed thing when they mutually rejoice in each other; the hearers in the skill and faithfulness of the preacher, and the preacher in the willingness and obedience of the hearers. 4th. They cannot "preach except they be sent;" that is, except they be both commissioned and in some measure qualified for their preaching work. How shall a man act as an ambassador unless he have both his credentials and his instructions from the prince that sends him? This proves that to the regular ministry there must be a regular mission and ordination. It is God's prerogative to send ministers; he is the Lord of the harvest, and therefore to him we must pray that he would send forth labourers, Mat. ix. 38. He only can qualify men for, and incline them to, the work of the ministry. But the competency of that qualification, and the sincerity of that inclination, must not be left to the judgment of every man for himself. The nature of the thing will by no means admit that; but for the preservation of due order in the church this must needs be referred and submitted to the judgment of a competent number of those that are themselves in that office, and of approved wisdom and experience in it; who, as in all other callings, are presumed the most able judges; and who are empowered to set apart such as they find so qualified and inclined to this work of the ministry; that by this preservation of the succession the name of Christ may endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. And they that are thus set apart, not only may, but must preach, as those that are sent.

2. How welcome the Gospel ought to be to those to whom it was preached; because it shewed the way to salvation, ver. 15; for this he quotes Isa. lii. 7, (the like passage we have, Nah. i. 15), which, if it point at the glad tidings of the deliverance of Israel out of Babylon in the type, yet it looks farther, to the Gospel, that is, the good news of our salvation by Jesus Christ. Observe, 1st. What the Gospel is. It is the Gospel of peace; it is the word of reconciliation between God and man. "On earth peace," Lu. ii. 14. Or, peace is put in general for all good; so it is explained here; it is "glad tidings of good things." The things of the Gospel are good things indeed, the best things; tidings concerning them are the most joyful tidings, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth. 2nd. What the work of ministers is. To preach this Gospel, to bring these glad tidings; to evangelize peace, (so the original is,) to evangelize good things. Every preacher is in this sense an evangelist. They are not only messengers to carry the news, but ambassadors to treat. And the first gospel preachers were angels, Lu. ii. 16. 3rd. How acceptable they should therefore be to the children of men, for their work's sake. "How beautiful are the feet!" that is, how welcome are they. Mary Magdalen expressed her love to Christ by kissing his feet, and after in holding him by the feet, Mat. xxviii. 9; and when Christ was sending forth his disciples he washed their feet. Those that preach the Gospel of peace should see to it that their feet, that is, their life and conversation, be beautiful. The holiness of ministers' lives is the beauty of their feet. How beautiful! namely, in the eyes of them that hear them. Those that welcome the message cannot but love the messengers: see 1 Thes. v. 12, 13.

3. He answers an objection against all this, which might be taken from the small success which the Gospel had in many places; ver. 16, "But they have not all obeyed the Gospel." All the Jews have not, all the Gentiles have not; far the greater part of both remain in unbelief and disobedience. Observe, the Gospel is given us not only to be known and believed, but to be obeyed. It is not a system of notions, but a rule of practice. This little success of the word was likewise foretold by the prophet: Isa. liii. 1, "Who hath believed our report?" Very few have; few to what one would think should have believed it, considering how faithful a report it is, and how well worthy of all acceptance; very few to the many that persist in unbelief. It is no strange thing, but it is a very sad and uncomfortable thing, for the ministers of Christ to bring ment" is the same which is here rendered "slumber," stupor. The reference of the psalmist is to the stupefying wine given to those who were about to be put to death. "God hath given them the spirit," &c.: "God is said to do that which is the result of the laws of man's moral and spiritual being as constituted by him" (Vaughan).

xi. 9, 10. These verses contain a description of the state of those who are snared in the work of their own hands, when the things which should have been for their peace are an occasion of falling; when blessings perverted and opportunities neglected become curses. (Compare Mal. ii. 2.) "Snare—trap—stumbling-block—recompence;" the first three words express various forms of temptation, the last implies the reckoning, the retribution.

xi. 11. Alford renders this verse, "I say then, Did they stumble in order that they should fall? God forbid; but by their trespass salvation is come unto the Gentiles, in order to provoke them to jealousy." The design of God was not the fall or casting away of the

the report of the Gospel, and not to be believed in it. Under such a melancholy consideration it is good for us to go to God, and make our complaint to him. "Lord, who hath," &c. In answer to this,

1st. He shews that the word preached is the ordinary means of working faith. "So then," ἀρα, however; though many that hear do not believe, yet those that believe have first heard. "Faith cometh by hearing." It is the summary of what he had said before, ver. 14. The beginning, progress, and strength of faith is by hearing. The word of God is therefore called the word of faith; it begets and nourisheth it. God gives faith, but it is by the word as the instrument. Hearing, that is, that hearing which works faith, is "by the word of God." It is not hearing the enticing words of man's wisdom, but hearing the word of God, that will befriend faith, and hearing it as the word of God: see 1 Thes. ii. 13.

2nd. That those who would not believe the report of the gospel, yet having heard it, they were thereby left inexcusable, and may thank themselves for their own ruin, ver. 18, to the end.

First. The Gentiles have heard it; ver. 18, "Have they not heard?" Yes, more or less, they have, either heard the Gospel, or however heard of it. "Their sound went into all the earth;" not only a confused sound, but their words, more distinct and intelligible notices of these things, are "gone into the ends of the world." The commission which the apostles received runs thus: "Go ye into all the world, preach to every creature, disciple all nations;" and they did with indefatigable industry and wonderful success pursue that commission: see the extent of Paul's province, Rom. xv. 19. To this remote island of Britain, one of the utmost corners of the world, not only the sound, but the words of the Gospel, came within a few years after Christ's ascension. It was in order to this, that the gift of tongues was at the very first poured so plentifully upon the apostles, Acts ii. In the expression here he plainly alludes to Ps. xix. 4, which speaks of the notices which the visible works of God in the creation give to all the world of the power and godhead of the Creator. As under the Old Testament God provided for the publishing of the work of creation, by the sun, moon, and stars, so now for the publishing of the work of redemption to all the world, by the preaching of gospel ministers, who are therefore called stars.

[His object in using the words of the psalmist was, no doubt, to convey more clearly and affecting to the minds of his hearers the idea that the proclamation of the Gospel was now as free from all national or ecclesiastical restrictions, as the instructions shed down upon all the people by the heavens under which they dwell. Paul of course is not to be understood as quoting the psalmist as though the ancient prophet was speaking of the preaching of the Gospel. He simply uses Scriptural language to express his own ideas, as is done involuntarily almost by the preacher in every sermon. It will be perceived that the apostle says, "Their sound has gone," &c.; whereas in the 19th Psalm it is, "Their line is gone." Paul follows the Septuagint, which, instead of giving the literal sense of the Hebrew word, gives correctly its figurative meaning. The word signifies a line, then a musical chord, and then, metonymically, sound.—H.]

Secondly. The Jews have heard it too, ver. 19—21. For this he appeals to two passages of the Old Testament, to shew how inexcusable they are too. "Did not Israel know?" namely, that the Gentiles were to be called in. They might have known it from Moses and Isaiah.

1st. One is taken from Deu. xxxii. 21, "I will provoke you to jealousy." The Jews not only had the offer, but saw the Gentiles accepting of it, and advantaged by that acceptance, by the same token that they were vexed at it. They had the refusal: "To you first," Acts iii. 26. In all places where the apostles came, still the Jews had the first offer, and the Gentiles had but their leavings; if one would not, another would. Now this provoked them to jealousy; they, as the elder brother in the parable, Lu. xv., envied the reception and entertainment of the prodigal Gentiles, upon their repentance. The Gentiles are here called no people, and a foolish nation, that is, not the professing people of God. How much soever there be of the wit and wisdom of the world, those that are not the people of God are, and in the end will be, found to be a foolish people. Such was the state of the Gentile world, and yet made the people of God; and Christ to them the wisdom of God. What a provocation it was to the Jews to see the Gentiles taken into favour we may see, Acts xiii. 45; xvii. 5, 13; and especially, Acts xxii. 22. It was an instance of the great wickedness of the Jews that they were thus enraged; and this in Deuteronomy is the matter of a threatening. God often makes people's sin their punishment. A man needs no greater plague than to be left to the impetuous rage of his own lusts.

2nd. Another is taken from Isa. lxi. 1, 2, which is very full, and in it "Esaias is very bold;" bold indeed to speak so plainly of the rejection of his own countrymen. Those that will be found faithful have need to be very bold. Those that are resolved to please God must not be afraid to displease any man. Now Esaias speaks boldly and plainly,

(1.) Of the preventing grace and favour of God in the reception and entertainment of the Gentiles; ver. 20, "I was found of them that sought me not." The prescribed method is, Seek and find; that is a rule for us, not a rule for God, who is often found of those that do not seek. His grace is his own, differencing grace his own, and he dispenseth it in a way of sovereignty; gives or withholds it at pleasure, prevents us with the blessings, the richest choicest blessings of his goodness. Thus he manifested himself to the Gentiles, by sending the light of the Gospel among them when they were so far from seeking him, and asking after him, that they were following after lying vanities, and serving dumb idols. Was not this our own particular case? Did not God begin his love, and manifest himself to us when we did not ask after him? And was not that a time of love indeed, to be often remembered with a great deal of thankfulness?

(2.) Of the obstinacy and perverseness of Israel, notwithstanding the fair offers and affectionate invitations they had, ver. 21. Observe,

(1st.) God's great goodness to them; "All day long I have stretched forth my hands." (1.) His offers. "I have stretched forth my hands;" offering them life and salvation with the greatest sincerity and seriousness that can be, with all possible expressions of earnestness and importunity; shewing them the happiness tendered, setting it before them with the greatest evidence, reasoning the case with them. Stretching forth the hands is the gesture of those that require audience, Acts xxvi. 1; or desire acceptance, Pr. i. 24. Christ was crucified with his hands stretched out. "Stretched forth my hands," as offering reconciliation: Come, let us shake hands and be friends; and our duty is to give the hand to him, 2 Chr. xxx. 8. (2.) His patience in making these offers; "All day long." The patience of God toward provoking sinners is admirable: he waits to be gracious. The time of God's patience is here called a day, light—some as a day, and fit for work and business; but limited as a day, and a night at the end of it. He bears long, but he will not bear always.

(2nd.) Their great badness to him. They were "a disobedient, gainsaying people." One word in the Hebrew, in Isaiah, is here well explained by two; not only disobedient to the call, not yielding to it, but gainsaying, and quarrelling with it, which is much worse. Many that will not accept of a good proposal, yet will acknowledge that they have nothing to say against it; but the Jews who believed not rested not there, but contradicted and blasphemed.

Jews; rather, their trespass or lapse (not "fall," as in the English version, which contradicts the preceding question) has made room for the salvation of the Gentiles, and this with the view of rousing the Jews to emulation.

xi. 12—15. "Fall" here, as in verse 11, is better rendered "trespass." The contrast between "diminishing" and "fulness" in this verse refers to the present and future of Israel. "If the disgrace or degradation of Israel has had such a blessed accompaniment (viz., the

God's patience with them was a very great aggravation of their disobedience, and rendered that the more exceeding sinful, as their disobedience did advance the honour of God's patience, and rendered that the more exceeding gracious. It is a wonder of mercy in God that his goodness is not overcome by man's badness; and it is a wonder of wickedness in man that his badness is not overcome by God's goodness.

[From this discussion we may learn the following truths: 1. The heathen world is in danger without the Gospel. 2. The provisions of the Gospel are ample for them—for all. 3. The command of Jesus Christ remains still the same, to preach the Gospel to every creature. 4. If the Gospel is to be proclaimed everywhere, men must be sent forth into the vast field. 5. The church, in training young men for the ministry, in fitting her sons for these toils, is performing a noble and glorious work; a work which contemplates the triumphs of the Gospel among all nations. 6. That God will withdraw his favours from those nations that are disobedient and rebellious. Thus he rejected the ancient Jews; and thus also he will forsake all who abuse his mercies; who become proud, luxurious, effeminate, and wicked.—A. B.]

CHAPTER XI.

The apostle, having reconciled that great truth of the rejection of the Jews with the promise made unto the fathers, is in this chapter farther labouring to mollify the harshness of it, and to reconcile it to the Divine goodness in general. It might be said, "Hath God then cast away his people?" The apostle therefore sets himself in this chapter to make a return to this objection; and that two ways: I. He shews at large what the mercy is that is mixed with this wrath, ver. 1—32. II. He infers from thence the infinite wisdom and sovereignty of God, with the adoration of which he concludes this chapter and subject, ver. 33—36.

SAY then, Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. 2 God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. Wot ye not what the scripture saith of Elias? how he maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying, 3 Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life. 4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. 5 Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace. 6 And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work. 7 What then? Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded. 8 (According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day. 9 And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompence unto them: 10 Let their eyes be darkened, that salvation of the Gentiles) how much more blessed a one shall Israel's honour bring with it, when his own people shall once more be set as a praise in the midst of the earth, and the glory of the nations" (Alford). The connection of verse 13 seems to be this: "I am speaking to you Gentiles: though a Jew, and interested in the restoration of my countrymen, I do not undervalue my office as apostle of the Gentiles; but I have a hope that my labours among the Gentiles may react upon my own people for their good and salvation."

they may not see, and bow down their back alway. 11 I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. 12 Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness? 13 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office: 14 If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. 15 For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? 16 For if the firstfruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches. 17 And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; 18 Boast not against the branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. 19 Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. 20 Well; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear: 21 For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. 22 Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. 23 And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again. 24 For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? 25 For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. 26 And so all Israel shall be saved:

as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: 27 For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. 28 As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. 29 For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. 30 For as ye in times past have not believed God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief: 31 Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. 32 For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

The apostle proposes here a plausible objection, which might be urged against the Divine conduct in casting off the Jewish nation; ver. 1. "Hath God cast away his people?" Is the rejection total and final? are they all abandoned to wrath and ruin, and that eternal? is the extent of the sentence so large as to be without reserve, or the continuance of it so long as to be without repeal? will he have no more a peculiar people to himself? In opposition to this, he shews that there was a great deal of goodness and mercy expressed along with this seeming severity. Particularly he insists upon three things: 1. That though some of the Jews were cast off, yet they were not all so. 2. That though the body of the Jews were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in. And 3. That though the Jews were cast off at present, yet in God's due time they should be taken into his church again.

First. The Jews, it is true, were many of them cast off, but not all. The supposition of this he introduces with a "God forbid;" he will by no means endure such a suggestion. God had made a distinction between some and others of them.

1. There was a chosen remnant of believing Jews, that obtained righteousness and life by faith in Jesus Christ, ver. 1-7. These are said to be such as he foreknew, ver. 1, that is, had thoughts of love to before the world was; for whom he thus foreknew he did predestinate. There lies the ground of the difference. They are called the election, ver. 7; that is, the elect, God's chosen ones; whom he calls the election, because that which first distinguished them from, and dignified them above, others was God's electing love. Believers are the election, all those and those only whom God hath chosen. Now,

1st. He shews that he himself was one of them; "For I also am an Israelite;" that is to say, should I say that all the Jews are rejected, I should cut off my own claims, and see myself abandoned. Paul was a chosen vessel, Acts ix. 15; and yet he was of the seed of Abraham; and particularly of the tribe of Benjamin, the least and youngest of all the tribes of Israel.

2nd. He suggests that, as in Elias's time, so now, this chosen remnant was really more and greater than one would think it was, which intimates likewise, that it is no new or unusual thing for God's grace and favour unto Israel to be limited and confined to a remnant of that people; for so it was in Elias's time. The Scripture saith it of Elias, ἐν ἡλίῳ, in the story of Elias, the great reformer of the Old Testament. Observe,

First. His mistake concerning Israel; as if their apostacy in the days of Ahab was so general, that he himself was the only faithful servant God had in the world. He refers to 1 Kin. xix. 14, where (it is here said) "he maketh intercession to God against Israel." A strange kind of intercession; ἐντυγχίνει τὸ θεῶν κατὰ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ. He deals with God against Israel; so it may be read; so ἐντυγχάνω is translated, Acts xxv. 24, "The Jews, ἐντυχόν μοι, have dealt with me." In prayer we deal with God, commune with him, discourse with him; it is said of Elijah, Jas. v. 17, that he prayed in praying. We are then likely to pray in praying, to make a business of that duty, when we pray as those that are dealing with God in the duty. Now Elijah, in this prayer, spoke as if there were none left faithful in Israel but himself only. See to what a low ebb the profession of religion may sometimes be brought, and how much the face of it may be eclipsed, that the most wise and observing men may give it up for gone; so it was in Elias's time. That which makes the show of a nation is the powers and the multitude. The powers of Israel were then persecuting powers. "They have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars, and they seek my life." The multitude of Israel were then idolatrous: "I am left alone." Thus those few that were faithful to God were not only lost in the crowd of idolaters, but crushed and driven into corners by the rage of persecutors; "When the wicked rise, a man is hidden," Pr. xxviii. 12. "Digged down thine altars;" not only neglected them, and let them go out of repair, but digged them down. When altars were set up for Baal, it is no wonder if God's altars were pulled down; they could not endure that standing testimony against their idolatry. This was his intercession against Israel; as if he had said, Lord, is not this a people ripe for ruin, worthy to be cast off? What else canst thou do for thy great name? It is a very sad thing for any person or people to have the prayers of God's people against them, especially of God's prophets; for God doth espouse, and sooner or later will visibly own, the cause of his praying people.

Secondly. The rectifying this mistake by the answer of God; ver. 4, "I have reserved." Note, 1st. Things are oftentimes much better with the church of God than wise and good men think they are; they are ready to conclude hardly, and to give up all for gone, when it is not so. 2nd. In times of general apostacy there is usually a remnant that keep their integrity; some, though but a few,—all do not go one way. 3rd. That when there is a remnant who keep their integrity in times of general apostacy, it is God that reserves to himself that remnant; if he had left them to themselves, they had gone down the stream with the rest. It is his free and almighty grace that makes the difference between them and others. "Seven thousand;" a competent number to bear their testimony against the idolatry of Israel; and yet, compared with the many thousands of Israel, a very small number. One of a city, and two of a tribe, like the grape-gleanings of the vintage. Christ's flock is but a little flock; and yet, when they come all together at last, they will be a great and innumerable multitude, Rev. vii. 9. Now the description of this remnant is, that they "have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal." That was then the reigning sin of Israel. In court, city and country, Baal had the ascendancy; and the generality of people, more or less, paid their respect to Baal. The

xi. 16. The allusion is to the offering of the first-fruits. The presentation was made of the sheaf (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11), and also of a portion of the lump of dough (Num. xv. 19-21). When these were offered all the produce was regarded as hallowed. Those Israelites who believed (the "remnant" of verse 5) were like the first-fruits of the whole mass or nation. The lump must correspond with the first-fruits, which are holy. Alford takes the "first-fruit" and the "root" both to apply to the patriarchs, especially Abraham.

xi. 17-24. The grafting process is usually the reverse of that which St. Paul here describes. Ordinarily, a good slip is grafted on an inferior stem, but there are instances of the reverse process. "The ancestors of Israel are the root; thou art but a branch, dependent for thy safety upon being supported by that root—in other words, upon being admitted into that Church of God which was founded in Abraham." The strength and life of that Church is through faith (see verse 20).

best evidence of integrity is a freedom from the present prevailing corruptions of the times and places that we live in; to swim against the stream when it is strong. Those God will own for his faithful witnesses that are bold in bearing their testimony to the present truth, 2 Pei. i. 12; this is thankworthy, not to bow to Baal when everybody bows. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity.

Thirdly. The application of this instance to the case in hand; ver. 5-7, "Even so at this present time." God's methods of dispensation towards his church are as they used to be. As it has been so it is. In Elijah's time there was a remnant, and so there is now. If then there was a remnant left under the Old Testament, when the displays of grace were less clear, and the pouring out of the Spirit less plentiful, much more now under the Gospel, when the grace of God that bringeth salvation appears more illustrious. "A remnant," that is, a few of many; a remnant of believing Jews, when the rest were obstinate in their unbelief. This is called "a remnant according to the election of grace;" that is, they are such as were chosen from eternity in the counsels of Divine love to be vessels of grace and glory. "Whom he did predestinate, them he called." If the difference between them and others be made purely by the grace of God, as certainly it is, (I have reserved them, saith he, to myself,) then it must needs be according to the election; for we are sure that, whatever God doth, he doth it according to the counsel of his own will. Now concerning this remnant, we may observe,

1st. Whence it takes its rise. From the free grace of God, ver. 6; that grace which excludes works. The eternal election, in which the difference between some and others is first founded, is purely of grace, free grace; not for the sake of works done or foreseen; if so, it would not be grace. Gratia non est ullo modo gratia, si non sit omni modo gratuita. It is not grace, properly so called, if it be not perfectly free. Election is purely according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. i. 5. Paul's heart was so full of the freeness of God's grace, that in the midst of his discourse he turns aside, as it were, to make this remark, "If of grace, then not of works;" and some observe, that faith itself, which in the matter of justification is opposed to works, is here included in them; for faith has a peculiar receptivity to receive the free grace of God for our justification, but not to receive that grace for our election.

2nd. What it doth obtain. That which Israel, that is, the body of the people, in vain sought for, ver. 7. Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, that is, justification and acceptance with God, (see ch. ix. 31;) but the election has obtained it. And in them the promise of God hath its accomplishment, and God's ancient kindness for that people is remembered. He calls the remnant of believers, not the elect, but the election, to shew that the sole foundation of all their hopes and happiness is laid in election. They were the persons whom God had in his eye in the counsels of his love; they are the election, they are God's choice.

Such was the favour of God to the chosen remnant. But, 2. "The rest were blinded," ver. 7. Some are chosen and called, and the call is made effectual; but others are left to perish in their unbelief, nay, they were made worse by that which should have made them better. The Gospel, which to them that believed was the savour of life unto life, to the unbelieving was the savour of death unto death. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. Good old Simeon foresaw that the child Jesus was set for the fall, as well as for the rising again of many in Israel, Lu. ii. 34. "Were blinded;" ἐκπρόσθηναι, they 'were hardened,' so some. They were seared, and made brawny and insensible. They could neither see the light nor feel the touch of gospel grace. Blindness and hardness are expressive of the same senselessness and stupidity of spirit. They shut their eyes, and would not see,—that was their sin; and then God in a way of righteous judgment blinded their eyes, that they could not see,—there was their punishment. This seemed harsh doctrine; to qualify it, therefore, he voucheth two witnesses out of the Old Testament which speak of such a thing.

1st. Isaiah, who spoke of such a judgment in his day, Isa. xxix. 10; vi. 9. "The spirit of slumber," that is, an indisposition to mind either their duty or interest. They are under the power of a prevailing unconcernedness, like people that are slumbering and sleeping, not affected with any thing that is said or done; they were resolved to continue as they were, and would not stir. The following words explain what is meant by the spirit of slumber: "Eyes that they should not see, ears that they should not hear." They had the faculties, but in the things that belonged to their peace they had not the use of those faculties; they were quite infatuated. They saw Christ, but they did not believe in him, they heard his word, but they did not receive it, and so both their hearing and seeing were in vain; it was all one as if they had neither seen nor heard. Of all judgments, spiritual judgments are the sorest and most to be dreaded, though they make the least noise. "Unto this day." Ever since Esaias prophesied, this hardening work hath been in the doing; some among them have been blind and senseless. Or rather, ever since the first preaching of the Gospel; though they have had the most convincing evidences that could be of the truth of it, the most powerful preaching, the fairest offers, the clearest calls, from Christ himself, from his apostles, yet to this day they are blinded. It is still true concerning multitudes of them even to this day in which we live; they are hardened and blinded. The obstinacy and unbelief goes by succession, from generation to generation, according to their own fearful imprecation which entailed the curse, "His blood be upon us, and upon our children."

2nd. David, ver. 9, 10, quoted from Ps. lxxix. 22, 23; where David, having in the Spirit foretold the sufferings of Christ from his own people the Jews, particularly that of their giving him vinegar to drink, Ps. lxxix. 21, which was literally fulfilled, Mat. xxvii. 48, an expression of the greatest contempt and malice, in the next words he doth, under the form of an imprecation, foretell the dreadful judgments of God upon them for it: "Let their table become a snare;" which the apostle here applies to the present blindness of the Jews, and the offence they took at the Gospel, which increased their hardness. This teacheth us how to understand other prayers of David against his enemies; they are to be looked upon as prophetic of the judgments of God upon the public and obstinate enemies of Christ and his kingdom. His prayer that it might be so, was a prophecy that it should be so, and not the private expressions of his own angry resentments; it was likewise intended to justify God, and to clear his righteousness in such judgments. He speaks here, First. Of the ruin of their comforts. "Let their table be made a snare;" that is, as the Psalmist explains it, let that which should be for their welfare be a trap to them. The curse of God will turn meat into poison. It is a threatening like that Mal. ii. 2, "I will curse your blessings." Their table a snare; that is, an occasion of sin, and an occasion of misery. Their very food, that should nourish them, shall choke them. Secondly. Of the ruin of their powers and faculties, ver. 10. "Their eyes darkened, their backs bowed down, that they can neither find the right way, nor, if they could, are they able to walk in it." The Jews, after their national rejection of Christ and his Gospel, became infatuated in their politics, so that their very counsels turned against them, and hastened their ruin by the Romans. They looked like a people designed for slavery and contempt, their backs bowed down to be ridden and trampled upon by all the nations about them. Or it may be understood spiritually,—their backs are bowed down in carnality and worldly-mindedness. Curva in terris auiam—

xi. 26-29. "Without repentance;" rather, "cannot be repented of;" are irrefragable, do not admit of a change of purpose. (Compare Hos. xiii. 14.) This explains verse 28 ("beloved for the fathers' sakes") to refer not to any merit, but to the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

xi. 30-32. "Unbelief" in these verses is translated by Alford "disobedience." "Your mercy" (verse 31) is "the mercy shown unto you," not that exercised by you

"they mind earthly things." This is an exact description of the state and temper of the present remainder of that people, than whom, if the accounts we have of them be true, there is not a more worldly, wilful, blind, selfish, ill-natured people in the world. They are manifestly to this day under the power of this curse. Divine curses will work long. It is a sign we have our eyes darkened, if we are bowed down in worldly-mindedness.

Secondly. Another thing which qualified this doctrine of the rejection of the Jews was, that, though they were cast off and unchurched, yet the Gentiles were taken in, ver. 11-14; which he applies by way of caution to the Gentiles, ver. 17-22.

1. The rejection of the Jews made room for the reception of the Gentiles. The Jews' leavings was a feast for the poor Gentiles; ver. 11, "Have they stumbled that they should fall?" Had God no other end in the forsaking and rejecting of them but their destruction? He startles at that, rejecting the thought with abhorrence, as usually he doth when anything is suggested which seems to reflect upon the wisdom, or righteousness, or goodness of God: "God forbid." No, "through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles." Not but that salvation might have come to the Gentiles if they had stood, but by the Divine appointment it was so ordered that the Gospel should be preached to the Gentiles upon the Jews' refusal of it. Thus in the parable, Mat. xii. 8, 9, "They that were first 'bidden were not worthy; so ye were thrust into the highways," Lu. xiv. 21; and so it was in the history, Acts xiii. 46. "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing you put it from you, lo, we turn to the Gentiles;" so Acts xviii. 6. God will have a church in the world, will have the wedding furnished with guests, and if one will not come another will, or why was the offer made? The Jews had the refusal, and so the tender came to the Gentiles. See how Infinite Wisdom brings light out of darkness, good out of evil, neat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong. To the same purpose he saith, ver. 12, "The fall of them was the riches of the world;" that is, it hastened the Gospel so much the sooner into the Gentile world. The Gospel is the greatest riches of the place where it is; it is better than thousands of gold and silver. Or, the riches of the Gentiles was the multitude of converts among them. True believers are God's jewels. To the same purpose, ver. 15, "The casting away of them is the reconciling of the world." God's displeasure towards them made way for his favour towards the Gentiles. "God was in Christ reconciling the world," 2 Cor. v. 19. And therefore he took occasion from the unbelief of the Jews openly to disavow and disown them, though they had been his peculiar favourites; to shew that in dispensing his favours he would now no longer act in such a way of peculiarity and restriction; but that in every nation he that feared God and wrought righteousness should be accepted of him, Acts x. 34, 35.

2. The use that the apostle makes of this doctrine concerning the substitution of the Gentiles into the room of the Jews. 1st. As a kinsman to the Jews, here is a word of excitement and exhortation to them, to stir them up to receive and embrace the Gospel offer. This God intended in his favour to the Gentiles, to provoke the Jews to jealousy, ver. 11, and Paul endeavours to enforce it accordingly, ver. 14. "If by any means I might provoke to emulation them which are my flesh." Shall the despised Gentiles run away with all the comforts and privileges of the Gospel, and shall not we forethink our refusal, and now at last put in for a share? Shall not we believe and obey, and be pardoned and saved as well as the Gentiles? See an instance of such an emulation in Esau, Gen. xxviii. 6-9. There is a commendable emulation in the affairs of our souls; why should not we be as holy and happy as any of our neighbours? In this emulation there needs no suspicion, undermining, or countermine, for the church hath room enough, and the new covenant grace and comfort enough, for us all. The blessings are not lessened by the multitudes of the sharers. "And might save some of them." See what was Paul's business,—to save souls; and yet the utmost he prometh himself is but to save some. Though he was such a powerful preacher, spoke and wrote with such evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, yet of the many he dealt with he could but save some. Ministers must think their pains well bestowed if they can but be instrumental to save some. 2nd. As an apostle to the Gentiles, here is a word of caution to them. "I speak to you Gentiles." You believing Romans, you hear what riches of salvation are come to you by the fall of the Jews, but take heed lest you do anything to forfeit it. Paul takes this, as other occasions, to apply his discourse to the Gentiles, because he was the apostle of the Gentile, appointed for the service of their faith, to plant and water churches in the Gentile nations. This was the purport of his extraordinary mission, Acts xii. 21. "I will send thee far hence unto the Gentile:" compare Acts ix. 15. "It was likewise the intention of his ordination, Gal. ii. 9: compare Acts xii. 2. It ought to be our great and special care to do good to those that are under our charge; we must particularly mind that which is our own work. It was an instance of God's great love to the poor Gentiles, that he appointed Paul, who in gifts and graces excelled all the apostles, to be the apostle of the Gentiles. The Gentile world was a wider province, and the work to be done in it required a very able, skilful, zealous, courageous workman; such a one was Paul. God calls those to special work that he either sees or makes fit for it. "I magnify mine office." There were those that vilified it, and him because of it. It was because he was the apostle of the Gentiles that the Jews were so outrageous against him, Acts xxii. 21, 22, and yet he thought never the worse of it, though it set him up as the butt of all the Jewish rage and malice. It is a sign of true love to Jesus Christ, to reckon that service and work for him truly honourable which the world looks upon with scorn as mean and contemptible. The office of the ministry is an office to be magnified. Ministers are ambassadors for Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God, and for their work's sake are to be esteemed highly in love. "Mine office;" τὴν διακονίαν μου, my ministry, my service, not my lordship and dominion. It was not the dignity and power, but the duty and work of an apostle, that Paul was so much in love with. Now, two things he exhorts the Gentiles to, with reference to the rejected Jews:

First. To have a respect for the Jews notwithstanding, and to desire their conversion. This is intimated in the prospect he gives them of the advantage that would accrue to the church by their conversion, ver. 12, 15. It would be as life from the dead; and therefore they must not insult and triumph over those poor Jews, but rather pity them, and desire their welfare, and long for the receiving of them again.

Secondly. To take heed to themselves lest they should stumble and fall as the Jews had done, ver. 17-22. Where observe,

1st. The privilege which the Gentiles had by being taken into the church. They "were grafted in," ver. 17, as a branch of a wild olive into a good olive; which is contrary to the way and custom of the husbandman, who grafts the good olive into the bad; but those that God grafts into the church, he finds wild, and barren, and good for nothing. Men graft to mend the tree, but God grafts to mend the imp. (1.) The church of God is an olive tree; flourishing and fruitful as an olive, Ps. lii. 8; Hos. xiv. 6; the fruit useful, for the honour both of God and man, Jud. ix. 9. (2.) Those that are out of the church are as "wild olive trees;" not only useless, but what they do produce is sour and unsavoury. "Wild by nature," ver. 24. This was the state of the poor Gentiles,

xii. 1. These are practical exhortations founded on what has gone before. "Therefore:" it seems best to make this word refer to the whole doctrinal part of the epistle. The apostle has set forth in various ways the mercy of God—mercy to mankind at large in the Gospel, mercy even in punishment of Israel (see chap. xi.). By these mercies we are exhorted to a consecrated Christian life. "Present:" the regular word for bringing to offer in sacrifice. "Your bodies:" either "your whole being," or, as Alford, strictly "your bodies;"

that wanted church privileges, and in respect of real sanctification; and it is the natural state of every one of us to be wild by nature. (3.) Conversion is the grafting in of wild branches into the good olive. We must be cut off from the old stock, and be brought into union with a new root. (4.) Those that are grafted into the good olive tree do partake of the root and fatness of the olive. It is applicable to a saving union with Christ; all that are by a lively faith grafted into Christ partake of him as the branches of the root, receive from his fulness. But it is here spoken of as a visible church membership, from which the Jews were as branches broken off, and so the Gentiles were grafted in, in abscisio,—"among them" that continued, or in the room of them that were broken off. The Gentiles, being grafted into the church, "partake of" the same privileges that the Jews did, "the root and fatness." The olive tree is the visible church, called so, Jer. xi. 16. The root of this tree was Abraham; not the root of communion, so Christ only is the root, but the root of administration, he being the first with whom the covenant was solemnly made. Now the believing Gentiles partake of this root; "he also is a son of Abraham," Lu. xix. 9; "the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles," Gal. iii. 14; the same fatness of the olive tree, the same for substance, special protection, lively oracles, means of salvation, a standing ministry, instituted ordinances, and, among the rest, a visible church membership of their infant seed, which was part of the fatness of the olive tree that the Jews had, and cannot be imagined to be denied to the Gentiles.

2nd. A caution not to abuse these privileges.

(1.) Be not proud; ver. 18, "Boast not against the branches." Do not therefore trample upon the Jews as a reprobate people, nor insult over them that are broken off, much less over those that do continue. Grace is given, not to make us proud, but to make us thankful. The law of faith excludes all boasting, either of ourselves or against others. Do not say, ver. 19, "They were broken off, that I might be grafted in;" that is, do not think that thou didst merit more at the hand of God than they, or didst stand higher in his favour. But remember, "Thou hearest not the root, but the root thee;" though thou art grafted in, thou art still but a branch borne by the root; nay, and an engrafted branch, brought into the good olive "contrary to nature," ver. 24: not free born, but by an act of grace enfranchised and naturalized. Abraham, the root of the Jewish church, is not beholden to thee, but thou art greatly obliged to him, as the trustee of the covenant, and the father of many nations. Therefore, "if thou boast," know (that word must be supplied to clear the sense) "thou hearest not the root, but the root thee."

(2.) Be not secure; ver. 20, "Be not highminded, but fear." Be not too confident of your own strength and standing. A holy fear is an excellent preservative against highmindedness; happy is the man that thus feareth always. We need not fear but God will be true to his word, all the danger is lest we be false to ours: "Let us therefore fear," Heb. iv. 1. The church of Rome now boasts of a patent of perpetual preservation; but the apostle here in his epistle to that church, when she was in her infancy and integrity, enters an express caveat against that boast, and all claims of that kind. Fear what? Why fear lest thou commit a forfeiture, as they have done, lest thou lose the privileges thou now enjoy, as they have lost theirs. Others' harms should be our warnings. "Go," saith God to Jerusalem, (Jer. vii. 12), "and see what I did to Shiloh;" so now, let all the churches of God go see what he did to Jerusalem, and what is become of the day of their visitation, that we may hear, and fear, and take heed of Jerusalem's sin. The patent which churches have of their privileges is not for a certain term, or entailed upon them and their heirs, but it runs as long as they carry themselves well, and no longer. Consider,

(1st.) How they were broken off. It was not undeservedly, by an act of absolute sovereignty and prerogative, but "because of unbelief." It seems then it is possible for churches that have long stood by faith to fall into such a state of infidelity as may be their ruin. Their unbelief did not only provoke God to cut them off, but they did by that cut themselves off; it was not only the meritorious, but the formal cause of their separation. Now, thou art liable to the same infirmity and corruption that they fell by. Farther observe, they were natural branches, ver. 21, not only interested in Abraham's covenant, but descending from Abraham's loins, and so born upon the promises, and thence had a kind of tenant right; yet, when they sunk into unbelief, God did not spare them. Prescription, long usage, the faithfulness of their ancestors, would not secure them. It was in vain to plead, though they insisted much upon it, that they were Abraham's seed, Mat. iii. 9; Jno. viii. 33. It is true, they were the husbandmen to whom the vineyard was first let out, but when they forfeited it, it was justly taken from them, Mat. xxi. 41, 43. This is called here severity, ver. 22. God laid righteousness to the line, and judgment to the plummet, and dealt with them according to their sins. Severity is a word that sounds harsh, and I do not remember that it is any where else in Scripture ascribed to God, and it is here applied to the unchurching of the Jews. God is most severe towards those that have been in profession nearest to him, if they rebel against him, Am. iii. 2. Patience and privileges abused turn to the greatest wrath. Of all judgments spiritual judgments are the sorest, for of those he is here speaking, ver. 8.

(2nd.) How thou standest, thou that art engrafted in. He speaks to the Gentile churches in general, though perhaps tacitly reflecting on some particular person, who might have expressed some such pride and triumph in the Jews' rejection. Consider then, (1.) By what means thou standest. By faith, which is a depending grace, and fetcheth in strength from heaven. Thou dost not stand in any strength of thy own, of which thou mightest be confident; thou art no more than the free grace of God makes thee, and his grace is his own, which he gives or withholds at pleasure. That which ruined them was unbelief, and by faith thou standest: therefore thou hast no faster hold than they had, thou standest on no firmer a foundation than they did. (2.) On what terms; ver. 22, "Towards thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness" that is, continue in a dependence upon, and compliance with, the free grace of God, the want of which it was that ruined the Jews; if thou be careful to keep up thine interest in the Divine favour, by being continually careful to please God, and fearful of offending him. The sum of our duty, the condition of our happiness, is to keep ourselves in the love of God. "Fear the Lord and his goodness," Hos. iii. 5.

Thirdly. Another thing that qualified this doctrine of the Jews' rejection is, that though for the present they are cast off, yet the rejection is not final, but when the fulness of time is come, they will be taken in again. They are not cast off for ever, but mercy is remembered in the midst of wrath. Let us observe,

1. How this conversion of the Jews is here described. 1st. It is said to be their fulness, ver. 12, that is, the addition of them to the church, the filling up again of that place which became vacant by their rejection. This would be the enriching of the world, that is, the church in the world, with a great deal of light, and strength, and beauty. 2nd. It is called the receiving of them. The conversion of a soul is the receiving of that soul; so the conversion of a nation. They shall be received into favour, into the church, into the love of Christ, whose arms are stretched out for the receiving of all those that will come to him. And this will be "as life from the dead," so strange and surprising, and yet withal so welcome and acceptable. The conversion of the Jews will bring great joy to the church. See Lu. xv. 32, "He was dead, and is alive," and therefore "it was meet we should make merry and be glad." 3rd. It is called "the grafting of them in again" (ver. 23) into the church, from which they had been broken off. That which is grafted in receives sap and virtue from the root, so doth a soul that is truly grafted into the church receive life, and strength, and grace, from Christ the quickening root. They shall be "grafted into their own olive tree," ver. 24, that is, into the church, which formerly they had been the most eminent and conspicuous members of; to retrieve these privileges of visible church membership which they had so long enjoyed, but have now sinned away and forfeited by their unbelief. 4th. It is called, the saving of all Israel, ver. 25. True conversion may well be called salvation: it is salvation begun. See Acts ii. 47. The adding of them to the church is the saving of them; τοὺς σωζόμενους, in the present tense, 'are saved.' When conversion work goes on, salvation work goes on.

2. What it is grounded upon, and what reason we have to look for it.

1st. Because of the holiness of the firstfruits and the root, ver. 16. Some by the firstfruits understand those of the Jews that were already converted to the faith of Christ, and received into the church; which were, as the firstfruits, dedicated to God, as earnest of a more plentiful and sanctified harvest. A good beginning promises a good ending. Why may we not suppose that others may be savingly wrought upon, as well as those who are already brought in? Others by the firstfruits understand the same with the root; namely, the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from whom the Jews descended, and with whom, as the prime trustees, the covenant was deposited; and so they were the root of the Jews, not only as a people, but as a church. Now, if they were holy, which is not meant so much of inherent as of federal holiness; if they were in the church, and in the covenant, then we have reason to conclude that God hath a kindness for the lump, that is, the body of that people; and for the branches, that is, the particular members of it. The Jews are in a sense a holy nation, Ex. xix. 6, being descended from holy parents. Now it cannot be imagined that such a holy nation should be totally and finally cast off. This proves that the seed of believers, as such, are within the pale of the visible church, and within the verge of the covenant, till they do by their unbelief throw themselves out; for, "if the root be holy, so are the branches." Though real qualifications be not propagated, yet relative privileges are; though a wise man do not beget a wise man, yet a free man begets a free man; though grace doth not run in the blood, yet external privileges do, (till they are forfeited,) even to a thousand generations. Look how they will answer it another day that cut off the entail, by turning the seed of the faithful out of the church, and so not allowing the blessing of Abraham to come upon the Gentiles. The Jewish branches are reckoned holy because the root was so. This is expressed more plainly, ver. 28, "They are beloved for the fathers' sakes." In this love to the fathers the first foundation of their church state was laid; Deu. iv. 37, "Because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them." And the same love would revive their privileges, for still the ancient loving-kindness is remembered; "They are beloved for the fathers' sakes." It is God's usual method of grace. Kindness to the children for the father's sake is therefore called the kindness of God, 2 Sam. ix. 3, 7. Though, "as concerning the Gospel," namely, in the present dispensation of it, "they are enemies" to it "for your sakes,"—that is, for the sake of the Gentiles, against whom they have such an antipathy,—yet when God's time is come that will wear off, and God's love to their fathers will be remembered. See a promise that points at this, Lev. xxvi. 42. The iniquity of the fathers is visited but to the third and fourth generation; but there is mercy kept for thousands. Many fare the better for the sake of their godly ancestors. It is upon this account that the church is called their own olive-tree. Long it had been their own peculiar; which is some encouragement to us to hope that there may be room for them in it again, for old acquaintance sake; that which hath been may be again. Though particular persons and generations wear off in unbelief, yet there having been a national church membership, though for the present suspended, yet we may expect that it will be revived again.

2nd. Because of the power of God; ver. 23, "God is able to graft them in again." The conversion of souls is a work of Almighty power; and when they seem most hardened, and blinded, and obstinate, our comfort is that God is able to work a change, able to graft those in that have been long cast out and withered. When the house is kept by the strong man armed with all his force, yet God is stronger than he, and is able to dispossess him. The condition of their restoration is faith; "If they abide not still in unbelief." So that nothing is to be done but to remove that unbelief, that is the great obstacle; and God is able to take that away, though nothing less than an Almighty power will do it; the same power that raised up Christ from the dead, Eph. i. 19, 20. Otherwise, can these dry bones live?

3rd. Because of the grace of God manifested to the Gentiles. Those that have themselves experienced the grace of God, preventing, distinguishing grace, may from thence take encouragement to hope well concerning others. This is his argument, ver. 24. If thou wert grafted into a good olive, that was wild by nature, much more shall these that were the natural branches, and may therefore be presumed somewhat nearer to the Divine acceptance. This is a suggestion very proper to check the insolence of those Gentile Christians that looked with disdain and triumph upon the condition of the rejected Jews, and trampled upon them; as if he should say, Their condition, as bad as it is, is not so bad as yours was before your conversion, and therefore why may it not be made as good as yours is? This is his argument, ver. 30, 31, "As ye in time past have not" &c. It is good for those that have found mercy with God to be often thinking what they were in time past, and how they obtained that mercy. This would help to soften our censures of, and quicken our prayers for, those that still continue in unbelief. He argues farther from the occasion of the Gentiles' call,—namely, the unbelief of the Jews,—thence it took rise; "You have obtained mercy through their unbelief;" much more shall they obtain mercy through your mercy. If the putting out of their candle was the lighting of yours, by that power of God who brings good out of evil, much more shall the continued light of your candle, when God's time is come, be a means of lighting theirs again. "That through your mercy they might obtain mercy;" that is, that they may be beholden to you, as you have been to them. He takes it for granted that the believing Gentiles would do their utmost endeavour to work upon the Jews; that when God had persuaded Japheth he would be labouring to persuade Shem. True grace hates monopolies. Those that have found mercy themselves should endeavour that through their mercy others also may obtain mercy.

4th. Because of the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament which point at this. He quotes a very remarkable one, ver. 26, from Isa. li. 20, 21, where we may observe,

First. The coming of Christ promised; "There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer." Jesus Christ is the great Deliverer, which supposes mankind in a state of misery and danger. In Isaiah it is, "the Redeemer shall come to Zion." There he is called the Redeemer, here the Deliverer; he delivers in a way of redemption, by a price. There he is said to come to Zion because, when the prophet prophesied, he was yet to come into the world, and Zion was his first head-quarters; thither he came, there he took up his residence. But when the thus teaching "that the sanctification of Christian life is to extend to that part of man's nature which is most completely under the bondage of sin." "Living sacrifice;" in contrast with the Levitical, which were slain animals. But the sacrifice is not here one of expiation, but of dedication—a thank-offering. "Reasonable;" Alford renders "rational," and interprets it as opposed to carnal (Heb. vii. 16). The sacrifices of the Christian are spiritual (1 Pet. ii. 5).

xii. 2. "Conformed," "transformed;" "Fashion not yourselves after the pattern of those who make the present their all (compare 1 Pet. i. 14; 1 Cor. vii. 31), but be ye also transformed." The same word is used of the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2). "Mind:" not the heart alone, but the understanding needs renewing. "Prove;" Alford renders "discern." Vaughan paraphrases, "That you may discriminate habitually, progressively, approvingly, what is," &c.

xii. 3. The general exhortations of verses 1 and 2 are applied to particular cases. Verse 3 has in it a play upon words, which Alford apostle wrote this he was come, he had been in Zion; and he is speaking of the fruits of his appearing, which shall come out of Zion; from thence, as from the spring, issued forth those streams of living water which, in the everlasting Gospel, watered the nations; "Out of Zion went forth the law," Isa. ii. 3: compare Lu. xxiv. 47.

Secondly, The end and purpose of his coming; "He shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Christ's errand into the world was to turn away ungodliness, to turn away the guilt by the purchase of pardoning mercy, and to turn away the power by the pouring out of renewing grace; to "save his people from their sins," Mat. i. 21; to part betwixt us and our sins, that iniquity might not be our ruin, and that it might not be our ruler. Especially to turn it away from Jacob; which is that for the sake of which he quotes the text as a proof of the great kindness God intended for the seed of Jacob. What greater kindness could he do them than to turn away ungodliness from them? to take away that which comes between them and all happiness? take away sin, and then make way for all good? This is the blessing that Christ was sent to bestow upon the world, and to tender it to the Jews in the first place, Acts iii. 26, to turn people from their iniquities. In Isaiah it is, "The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob;" which shews who in Zion were to have a share in, and to reap benefit by, the deliverance promised: those, and those only, that leave their sins and turn to God. To them Christ comes as a redeemer, but as an avenger to them that persist in impenitence: see Deu. xxx. 2, 3. Those that turn from sin will be owned as the true citizens of Zion, Eph. ii. 19; the right Jacob, Ps. xxiv. 4, 6. Putting both these readings together we learn that none have an interest in Christ but those that turn from their sins, nor can any turn from their sins but by the strength of the grace of Christ. "For this is my covenant with them;" this, that the Deliverer shall come to them; this, that my Spirit shall not depart from them, as it follows, Isa. lix. 21. God's gracious intentions concerning Israel were made the matter of a covenant, which the God that cannot lie could not but be true and faithful to. They were "the children of the covenant," Acts iii. 25. The apostle adds, "When I shall take away their sins;" which some think refers to Isa. xxvii. 9; or only to the foregoing words, "to turn away ungodliness." Pardon of sin is laid as the foundation of all the blessings of the new covenant; Heb. viii. 12, "For I will be merciful." Now from all this he infers that certainly God had great mercy in store for that people, something answerable to the extent of these rich promises; and he proves his inference, ver. 29, by this truth, "For the gifts and callings of God are without repentance." Repentance is sometimes taken for a change of mind, and so God never repents; for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Sometimes for a change of way, and that is here understood, intimating the constancy and unchangeableness of that love of God which is founded in election. Those gifts and callings are immutable; whom he so loves he loves to the end. We find God repenting that he had given man a being, Gen. vi. 6, "It repented the Lord that he had made man;" and repenting that he had given a man honour and power, 1 Sam. xv. 11, "It repented me that I have set up Saul to be king;" but we never find God repenting that he had given a man grace, or effectually called him; those "gifts and callings are without repentance."

3. The time, and extent, [and effects] of this conversion, when and where it is to be expected. It is called a mystery, ver. 25, that which was not obvious, and which one would not expect upon the view of the present state of that people; who appeared generally so obstinate against Christ and Christianity, that it was a riddle to talk of their unanimous conversion. The conversion of the Gentiles is called a mystery, Eph. iii. 3, 6, 9. The case of the rejected Jews seemed as bad now as that of the Gentiles had been. The work of conversion is carried on in a mystery. Now he would have them know so much of this mystery as to keep them humble; "Lest you be wise in your own conceits;" that is, lest you be too much puffed up with your church membership, and trample upon the Jews. Ignorance is the cause of our self-conceit;ness; "I would not have you ignorant, lest you be wise in your own conceits." Observe,

1st. Their present state. "Blindness in part is happened to Israel." Here is something to qualify it, that it is but in part; there is a remnant that see the things which belong to their peace; though part, the far greater part, are in blindness, ver. 7, 8. To the same purpose, ver. 32, "God has concluded them all in unbelief," shut them up as in a prison; given them over to their own hearts' lusts. "Shutting up" is sometimes put for conviction, as Gal. iii. 22; they all stand before God convicted of unbelief. They would not believe; Why then, saith God, you shall not. They peremptorily refused to submit to Christ and his government; which refusal of theirs was, as it were, entered upon record in the court of heaven, and was conclusive against them.

2nd. When this blessed change should be. "When the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in;" that is, when the Gospel has had its intended success, and made its progress in the Gentile world; compare ver. 12. The Jews shall continue in blindness till God hath performed his whole work among the Gentiles, and then their turn will come next to be remembered. This was the purpose and ordination of God, for wise and holy ends; things should not be ripe for the Jews' conversion till the church was replenished with the Gentiles, that it might appear that God's taking them again was not because he had need of them, but of his own free grace.

3rd. The extent of it. "All Israel shall be saved," ver. 26. He "will have mercy upon all," ver. 32. Not every individual person, but the body of the people. Not that ever they should be restored to their covenant of peculiarity again, to have their priesthood, and temple, and ceremonies again; an end is put to all those things; but they should be brought to believe in Christ the true Messiah, whom they crucified, and be incorporated in the Christian church, and become one sheepfold with the Gentiles under Christ the great Shepherd. But the question is concerning the accomplishment of all this. First. Some think it is done already; when before, and in, and after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, multitudes of the Jews were convinced of their infidelity, and turned Christians; so many that, considering how many millions of them were cut off in the destruction, we may reasonably conclude that of those which survived the greater part were Christian, and embodied in the Christian church, and it was a very inconsiderable number that perished obstinate. For many ages Judea had, as other Christian provinces, their ministers and churches, and a face of religion. And most of this work, they suppose, was done towards the close of the ministry of the apostles, when the Gentiles were generally come in. Secondly. Others think that it is yet to have its accomplishment towards the end of the world; that those Jews which yet wonderfully remain distinct from the rest of the nations, by their names, customs, and religion, and are very numerous, especially in the Levant parts, shall, by the working of the Spirit with the word, be convinced of their sin, and brought generally to embrace the Christian faith, and to join in with the Christian churches; which will contribute much to their strength and beauty. Alas! who shall live when God doth this?

4th. The effects of it. It appears pretty obvious, that a great national movement towards Christianity on the part of the Jews, and their actual adoption of a faith which they have so long held in detestation, must tell with mighty and decisive effect on the rest of the world. If the very existence of the Jews as a separate people be in itself the indication of a providence—a singular event in history, which demonstrates the part taken by him who overrules all history in the affairs of men—how much more impressive will the evidence become, when this same people shall describe the actual evolution, which it was predicted they should do, more than two thousand years ago; shall, after the dispersions and the desolations of many generations, reach at last the very landing place, to which the finger of prophecy has been pointing from an antiquity so high as that of the patriarchal ages? We know not if this splendid era is to be ushered in by palpable and direct miracle. We would not affirm this, but far less can we deny it. But should there be no such manifestation of the Divine power conjoined with this marvellous fulfilment, there will at least be such a manifestation of the Divine knowledge, as will incontestably prove that God has had to do with it; and so as that history shall of itself perform the office of revelation, or men will trace the finger of the Almighty in the events which are sensibly passing before their eyes. And besides, we have reason to believe of these converted Jews, that they will become the most zealous and successful of all missionaries; or, like Paul before them, the preachers of that faith which they persecuted in times past, and once laboured to destroy, Gal. i. 23. It is said of a single Christian that he may be the light of the world, Mat. v. 14. How much more will be a whole nation of Christians—glowing in the full ardour of their new-born convictions with apostolic fervour; and the very fruit of whose conversion will tell with a hundredfold greater effect than even that of St. Paul, as a testimony or evidence for the faith. Verily, like him, their great prototype, they will pre-eminently and emphatically be the apostles of the Gentiles; and there will be a light to lighten these Gentiles, in the very glory of the people of Israel, Lu. ii. 32. We must look to futurity for this great accomplishment—for, most obviously, it has not yet been realized. It will be "in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." This is all yet to come—else how could it be spoken, as an immediate sequence of its fulfilment—that "He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more?" Isa. ii. 2-4; Mic. iv. 2-4.

33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! 34 For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? 35 Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? 36 For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

The apostle having insisted so largely, through the greatest part of this chapter, upon reconciling the rejection of the Jews with the Divine goodness, he concludes with the acknowledgment and admiration of the Divine wisdom and sovereignty in all this. Here the apostle doth with great affection and awe adore.

First. The secrecy of the Divine counsels; "O the depth!" in these proceedings towards the Jews and Gentiles; or in general the whole mystery of the Gospel, which we cannot fully comprehend. "The riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God;" that is, the abundant instances of his wisdom and knowledge in the contriving and carrying on of the work of our redemption by Christ; a depth which the angels put into, 1 Pet. i. 12. Much more may it puzzle any human understanding to give an account of the methods, and reasons, and designs, and reaches of it. Paul was as well acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of God as ever any mere man was; and yet he confesseth himself at a loss in the contemplation; and, despairing to find the bottom, he humbly sits down at the brink and adores the depth. Those that know most in this state of imperfection cannot but be most sensible of their own weakness and short-sightedness; and that after all their searches, and all their attainments in those searches, while they are here they cannot order their speech by reason of darkness. "Praise is silent to thee," Ps. lxxv. 1. "The depth of the riches." Men's riches of all kinds are shallow, you may soon see bottom; but God's riches are deep; Ps. xxxvi. 6, "Thy judgments are a great deep." There is not only a depth in the Divine counsels, but riches too, which notes an abundance of that which is precious and valuable; so complete are the dimensions of the Divine counsels, they have not only depth and height, but breadth and length, Eph. iii. 18, and that passing knowledge, ver. 19, "Riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God." His seeing of all things by one clear, and certain, and infallible view; all things that are, or ever were, or ever shall be; that all is naked and open before him,—there is his knowledge. His ruling and ordering of all things, directing and disposing of them to his own glory, and the bringing about of his own purposes and counsels in all,—that is his wisdom. And the vast reach of both these is such a depth as is past our fathoming, and we may soon lose ourselves in the contemplation of them; "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me," Ps. cxxxix. 6; compare ver. 17, 18, "How unsearchable are his judgments!" that is, his counsels and purposes; "and his ways," that is, the execution of these counsels and purposes. We know not what he designs; when the wheels are set in motion, and providence hath begun to work, yet we know not what he drives at, it is "past finding out." This doth not only overturn all our positive conclusions about the Divine counsels, but it also checks all our curious inquiries. Secret things belong not to us, Deu. xxix. 29. God's way is in the sea, Ps. lxxvii. 19; compare Job xxiii. 8, 9; Ps. xcvi. 2. What he doth we know not now, Jno. xiii. 7. We cannot give a reason of God's proceedings, or by searching find out God; see Job v. 9; ix. 10. The judgments of his month, and the way of our duty, blessed be God, are plain and easy, it is a highway; but the judgments of his heart, and the ways of his providence, are dark and mysterious, which therefore we must not pry into, but silently adore and acquiesce in. The apostle speaks this here especially with reference to that strange turn, the casting off of the Jews, and the entertainment of the Gentiles, with a purpose to take in the Jews again in due time. These were strange proceedings, the choosing of some, the refusing of others, and neither according to the probabilities of human conjecture. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. These are methods unaccountable, concerning which we must say, "O the depth!" "Past finding out," ἀνεξετάστον, 'cannot be traced.' God leaves no expresses thus: "Not to be high-minded above that which he ought to be, but to be so minded as to be sober-minded." "Measure of faith:" our estimate of ourselves must be measured not by attainments or achievements, but by faith; yet this we must remember is God's gift.

xii. 6. "Prophecy according to the proportion of faith:" literally, "of the faith." Alford takes faith here to be the faith of him who prophesies, faith being the faculty needed for the exercise of all spiritual gifts. Others understand by faith the Gospel, and explain the precept, as Vaughan, "Let us have no favourite doctrines."

xii. 7. "Wait on our ministering:" "wait on" is not found in the original. "Ministry:" the word is specially applied to the ministering to the poor. (Compare Acts vi. 1, xii. 25; Rom. xv. 31.) The precept enjoins a contented and interested discharge of duty; similarly "on teaching" within the bounds of that sphere which has been allotted to him by God, or for which God has given the faculty.

prints or footprints behind him, doth not make a path to shine after him, but his paths of providence are new every morning: he doth not go the same way so often as to make a track of it. "How little a portion is heard of him!" Job xxvi. 14. It follows, ver. 34, "For who hath known the mind of the Lord?" Is there any creature made of his cabinet council, or laid, as Christ was, in the bosom of the Father? Is there any to whom he has imparted his counsels, or that is able upon the view of his providences to know the way that he takes? There is that vast distance and disproportion between God and man, between the Creator and the creature, as doth for ever exclude the thought of such an intimacy and familiarity. The apostle makes the same challenge, 1 Cor. ii. 16. "For who hath known the mind of the Lord?" And yet there he adds, "But we have the mind of Christ," which intimates that through Christ true believers, that have his Spirit, know so much of the mind of God as is necessary to their happiness. He that did know the mind of the Lord he has declared him, 1 John i. 18; and so, though we know not the mind of the Lord, yet if we have the mind of Christ we have enough. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," Psal. xxv. 14. "Shall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do?" see 1 John xv. 15. "Or who has been his counsellor?" He needs no counsellor, for he is infinitely wise; nor is any creature capable of being his counsellor: that would be like lighting a candle to the sun. This seems to refer to that scripture, Isa. xl. 13, 14. "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord? or, being his counsellor, has taught him? with whom took he counsel?" &c. It is the substance of God's challenge to Job concerning the work of creation, Job xxxviii., and is applicable to all the methods of his providence. It is nonsense for any man to prescribe to God, or to teach him how to govern the world.

Secondly, The sovereignty of the Divine counsels. In all these things God acts as a free agent, doth what he will, because he will, and giveth not account of any of his matters, Job xxiii. 13; xxxiii. 13. And yet there is no unrighteousness with him. To clear which,

1. He challengeth any to prove God a debtor to him; ver. 35, "Who hath first given to him?" Who is there of all the creatures that can prove that God is beholden to him? Whatever we do for him, or devote to him, it must be with that acknowledgment, which is for ever an estoppel to such demands, 1 Chr. xxix. 14. "Of thine own we have given thee." All the duties we can perform are not requitals, but restitutions rather. If any can prove that God is their debtor, the apostle here stands bound for the payment, and proclaims in God's name that payment is ready: "It shall be recompensed to him again." It is certain God will let nobody lose by him; but never any one yet durst make a demand of this kind, or attempt to prove it. This is here suggested to silence the clamours of the Jews. When God took away their visible church privileges from them, he did but take his own; and may he not do what he will with his own? give or withhold his grace, where and when he pleases? To silence likewise the insultings of the Gentiles; when God sent the Gospel among them, and gave so many of them grace and wisdom to accept of it, it was not because he owed them so much favour, or that they could challenge it as a debt, but of his own good pleasure.

2. He resolves all into the sovereignty of God; ver. 36, "For of him, and through him, and to him are all things," that is, God is all in all. All things in heaven and earth, especially those things which relate to our salvation, the things that belong to our peace, they are all of him by way of creation, through him by way of providential influence, that they may be to him in their final tendency and result. Of God as the spring and fountain of all: through Christ, God-man, as the conveyance; to God as the ultimate end. These three include, in general, all God's causal relations to his creatures: of him, as the first efficient; through him, as the supreme dirigent; to him, as the ultimate, final cause: for the Lord hath made all for himself, Rev. iv. 11. If all be of him, and through him, there is all the reason in the world that all should be to him, and for him. It is a necessary circulation; if the rivers receive their waters from the sea, they return them to the sea again, Eccles. i. 7. To do all to the glory of God is to make a virtue of necessity; for all shall in the end be to him whether we will or no. And so he concludes with a short doxology, "To whom be glory for ever, Amen." God's universal agency as the first cause, the sovereign Ruler, and the last end, ought to be the matter of our adoration. Thus all his works do praise him objectively; but his saints do bless him actively; they hand that praise to him which all the creatures do minister matter for, Psal. cxlv. 10. He had been discoursing at large of the counsels of God concerning man, sifting the point with a great deal of accuracy; but after all he concludes with the acknowledgment of the Divine sovereignty, as that into which all these things must be ultimately resolved, and in which alone the mind can safely and sweetly rest. This is, if not the scholastical way, yet the Christian way of disputation. Whatever are the premises, let God's glory be the conclusion; especially when we come to talk of the Divine counsels and actings, it is best for us to turn our arguments into awful and serious adorations. The glorified saints, that see farthest into these mysteries, never dispute, but praise to eternity.

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle, having at large cleared and confirmed the prime fundamental doctrines of Christianity, comes in the next place to press the principal duties. We mistake our religion, if we look upon it only as a system of notions, and a guide to speculation; no, it is a practical religion, that tends to the right ordering of the conversation. It is designed, not only to inform our judgments, but to reform our hearts and lives. From the method of the apostle's writing in this as in some other of the epistles, as from the management of the principal ministers of state in Christ's kingdom, the stewards of the mysteries of God may take direction how to divide the word of truth: not to press duty abstract from privileges, nor privileges abstract from duty; but let both go together, with a complicated design, they will greatly promote and befriend each other. The duties are drawn from the privileges by way of inference. The foundation of Christian practice must be laid in Christian knowledge and faith. We must first understand how we receive Christ Jesus the Lord, and then we shall know the better how to walk in him. There is a great deal of duty prescribed in this chapter; the exhortations are short and pithy, briefly summing up what is good, and what the Lord our God in Christ requires of us. It is an abridgment of the Christian directory, an excellent heap of rules for the right ordering of the conversation, as becomes the Gospel. It is joined to the foregoing discourse by the word, "Therefore." It is the practical application of doctrinal truths that is the life of preaching. He had been discoursing at large of justification by faith, and of the riches of free grace, and the pledges and assurances we have of the glory that is to be revealed. From hence carnal liberties would be apt to infer, "Therefore we may live as we list, and walk in the way of our hearts, and the sight of our eyes;" no, that doth not follow; the faith that justifies is a faith that works by love. And there is no other way to heaven but the way of holiness and obedience. Therefore, what God hath joined together let no man put asunder. The particular exhortations of this chapter are reducible to the three principal heads of Christian duty; our duty to God, to ourselves, and to our brother. The grace of God teacheth us in general, to live godly, soberly, and righteously, and to deny all that which is contrary hereunto. Now this chapter will give us to understand what that godliness, sobriety, and righteousness is, though somewhat intermixed

BESEECH you therefore brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. 2 And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God. 3 For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith. 4 For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office: 5 So we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. 6 Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; 7 Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching; 8 Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness. 9 Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. 10 Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another; 11 Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; 12 Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; 13 Distributing to the necessity of saints; given to hospitality. 14 Bless them which persecute you: bless, and curse not. 15 Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. 16 Be of the same mind one toward another. Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own conceits. 17 Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. 18 If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. 19 Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. 20 Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. 21 Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

We may observe here, according to the scheme mentioned in the contents, the apostle's exhortations.

First. Concerning our duty to God. We see what is godliness.

1. It is to surrender ourselves to God, and so to lay a good foundation. We must first give our ourselves unto the Lord, 2 Cor. vii. 5. This is here pressed as the spring of all duty and obedience, ver. 1, 2. Man consists of body and soul, Gen. ii. 7; Eccles. xii. 7.

1st. The body must be presented to him, ver. 1. "The body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body," 1 Cor. vi. 13, 14. The exhortation is here introduced very pathetically, "I beseech you, brethren;" though he was a great apostle, yet he calls the meanest Christians brethren. A term of affection and

xii. 8, "With simplicity;" better, and more appropriately, "with liberality." "Cheerfulness:" "It is in exhibiting compassion, which is often the compulsory work of one obeying his conscience, rather than the spontaneous effusion of love, that cheerfulness is so peculiarly required and so frequently wanting" (Alford).

xii. 10—12. The point of the exhortations is rendered more distinct by placing the province in which they are to be exercised first, thus: "In love of the brethren, be affectionate to one another; in giving of honour, preferring (i.e., outdoing) one another; in diligence, not slothful; in spirit, fervent; in hope, rejoicing; in tribulation, patient; in prayer, persevering."

xii. 18, "As much as lieth in you;" i.e., as far as you can, as much as dependeth on you.

xii. 19, "Give place unto wrath:" "that is, the wrath of your adversary or oppressor. Let his anger have free space—let it work freely and spend itself; do not thwart, do not punish it" (Vaughan).

earn. He useth entreaty; that is the Gospel way. "as though God did beseech you by us," 2 Cor. v. 20. Though he might with authority command, yet for love's sake he rather beseecheth, Phil. 4; "The poor useth entreaty," Pr. xviii. 23. This is to insinuate the exhortation, that it might come with the more pleasing power. Many are soonest wrought upon, if they be spoken fair; are easier led than driven. Now observe.

First. The duty pressed. To present our bodies "a living sacrifice;" alluding to the sacrifices under the law, which were presented or set before God at the altar, ready to be offered to him. "Your bodies," that is, your whole selves, so expressed, because under the law the bodies of beasts were offered in sacrifice, 1 Cor. vi. 20; our bodies and spirits are designed. The offering was sacrificed by the priest, but presented by the offerer, who transferred to God all his right, titles, and interest in it, by laying his hand on the head of it. Sacrifice is here taken for whatsoever is by God's own appointment dedicated to himself: see 1 Pet. ii. 5. We are both temple, priest, and sacrifice; as Christ was in his peculiar sacrificing. There were sacrifices of atonement, and sacrifices of acknowledgment. Christ is the only sacrifice of atonement, who was once offered to bear the sins of many; but our persons and performances, tendered to God through Christ our Priest, are as sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honour of God. Presenting of them notes a voluntary act, done by virtue of that absolute, despotic power, which the will hath over the body, and all the members of it. It must be a freewill offering. Your bodies, not your beasts. Those legal offerings, as they had their power from Christ, so they had their period in Christ. The presenting of the body to God implies not only the avoiding of the sins that are committed with or against the body, but the using of the body as a servant of the soul in the service of God. It is to glorify God with our bodies, 1 Cor. vi. 20; to engage our bodies in the duties of immediate worship, and in a diligent attendance to our particular callings, and to be willing to suffer for God with our bodies, when we are called to it. It is to yield the members of our bodies as instruments of righteousness, ch. vi. 13. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet in its place it is a proof and product of the dedication of our souls to God.

1st. Present them a living sacrifice; not killed, as the sacrifices under the law. A Christian makes his body a sacrifice to God, though he do not give it to be burned. A body sincerely devoted to God is a living sacrifice. "A living sacrifice," by way of allusion; that which was dead of itself might not be eaten, much less sacrificed, Deu. xiv. 21. And by way of opposition; the sacrifice was to be slain, but you may be sacrifices, and yet live on. An unbloody sacrifice. The barbarous heathen sacrificed their children to their idol gods, not living, but slain sacrifices. But God will have mercy, and not such sacrifice, though life is forfeited to him. A living sacrifice, that is, inspired with the spiritual life of the soul. It is Christ living in the soul by faith, that makes the body a living sacrifice, Gal. ii. 20. Holy love kindles the sacrifices, puts life into the duties: see ch. vi. 13; alive, namely, to God, ver. 11.

2nd. They must be holy. There is a relative holiness in every sacrifice, as dedicated to God; but, besides that, there must be that real holiness which stands in an entire rectitude of heart and life, by which we are conformed in both to the nature and will of God. Even our bodies must not be made the instruments of sin and uncleanness, but set apart for God, and put to holy uses, as the vessels of the tabernacle were holy, being devoted to God's service. It is the soul that is the proper subject of holiness, but a sanctified soul communicates a holiness to the body it acts and animates. That is holy which is according to the will of God; when the bodily actions are so, the body is holy. They are the temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. vi. 19; possess the body in sanctification, 1 Thes. iv. 4, 5.

Secondly. The arguments to enforce this; which are three.

1st. Consider the mercies of God. "I beseech you by the mercies of God;" an affectionate obtestation, and which should melt us into a compliance; ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκτιρομένης τοῦ Θεοῦ. This is an argument most sweetly cogent. There is the mercy that is in God, and the mercy that is from God; mercy in the spring, and mercy in the streams. Both are included here; but especially gospel-mercies, mentioned ch. xi., the transferring what the Jews forfeited and lost by their unbelief unto us Gentiles, Eph. iii. 4-6; the sure mercies of David, Isa. lv. 3. God is a merciful God, therefore let us present our bodies to him; he will be sure to use them kindly, and knows how to consider the frames of them, for he is of infinite compassion. We receive from him every day the fruits of his mercy; particularly, mercy to our bodies: he made them, he maintains them, he bought them, he has put a great dignity upon them. It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, that our souls are held in life. And the greatest mercy of all is, that Christ hath made not his body only, but his soul, an offering for sin; gave himself for us, gives himself to us. Now sure we cannot but be studying what we shall render to the Lord for all this. And what shall we render? Let us render ourselves as an acknowledgment of all these favours; all we are, all we have, all we can do, and after all, it is but very poor returns for very rich receivings. And yet, because it is what we have,

2nd. It is acceptable to God. The great end we should all labour after, is to be accepted of the Lord, 2 Cor. v. 9; to have him well pleased with our persons and performances. Now these living sacrifices are acceptable to God; while the sacrifices of the wicked, though fat and costly, are an abomination to the Lord. It is God's great condescension that he will vouchsafe to accept of any thing in us; and we can desire no more to make us happy. And if the presenting of ourselves will but please him, we may easily conclude that we cannot bestow ourselves better.

3rd. It is our reasonable service. There is an act of reason in it; for it is the soul that doth present the body. Blind devotion, that has ignorance for the mother and nurse of it, is fit to be paid only to those dunghill gods that have eyes and see not. Our God must be served in the spirit, and with the understanding; there is all the reason in the world for it, and no good reason can possibly be produced against it. "Come now, and let us reason together," Isa. i. 18. God doth not impose upon us any thing hard or unreasonable, but that which is altogether agreeable to the principles of right reason. Τὴν λογικὴν λειτουργίαν ὑμῶν, "your service according to the word;" so it may be read. The word of God doth not leave out the body in holy worship. That service only is acceptable to God which is according to the written word; it must be gospel worship, spiritual worship. That is a reasonable service which we are able and ready to give a reason for; in which we understand ourselves. God deals with us as with rational creatures, and will have us so to deal with him. Thus must the body be presented to God.

2nd. The mind must be renewed for him. This is pressed, ver. 2, "Be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind;" that is, see to it that there be a saving change wrought in you, and that it be carried on. Conversion and sanctification are the renewing of the mind; a change not of the substance, but of the qualities of the soul. It is the same with making a new heart, and a new spirit; new dispositions and inclinations; new sympathies and antipathies; the understanding enlightened, the conscience softened, the thoughts rectified, the will bowed to the will of God, and the affections made spiritual and heavenly. So that the man is not what he was; old things are passed away, all things become new; he acts from new principles, by new rules, with new desires. The mind is the acting, ruling part of us: so that the renewing of that is the renewing of the whole man, for out of it are the issues of life, Pr. iv. 23. The progress of sanctification, dying to sin more and more, and living to righteousness more and more, is the carrying on of this renewing work, till it be perfected in glory. This is called the transforming of us; it is like putting on a new shape and figure. Μεταμορφώσθε, "be ye metamorphosed." The transfiguration of Christ is expressed by this word, Mat. xvii. 2; when he put on a heavenly glory, which made his face to shine like the sun; and the same word is used, 2 Cor. iii. 18, where we are said to be "changed into the same image from glory to glory." This transformation is here pressed as a duty; not that we can work such a change ourselves,—we could as soon make a new world as make a new heart by any power of our own; it is God's work, Eze. xi. 19, and xxxvi. 26, 27;—but be ye transformed, that is, use the means which God hath appointed and ordained for it. It is God that turns us, and then we are turned; but we must frame our doings to turn, Hos. v. 4. Lay your souls under the changing, transforming influences of the blessed Spirit; seek unto God for grace in the use of all the means of grace. Though the new man be created of God, yet we must put it on, (Eph. iv. 24) and be pressing forward towards perfection. Now in this verse we may farther observe.

First. What is the great enemy to this renewing, which we must avoid; and that is conformity to this world; "Be not conformed to this world." All the disciples and followers of the Lord Jesus must be nonconformists to this world. Μη συνχηματίζεσθε,—"do not fashion yourselves" according to the world. We must not conform to the things of the world; they are mutable, and the fashion of them is passing away. Do not conform either to the lusts of the flesh or the lusts of the eye. We must not conform to the men of the world, of that world which lies in wickedness; not walk "according to the course of this world," Eph. ii. 2; that is, we must not follow a multitude to do evil, Ex. xxiii. 2. If sinners entice us, we must not consent to them, but in our places witness against them. Nay, even in things indifferent, and which are not in themselves sinful, we must so far not conform to the custom and way of the world, as not to act by the world's dictates as our chiefest rule, nor to aim at the world's favours as our highest end. True Christianity consists much in a sober singularity; yet we must take heed of the extreme of affected rudeness and moroseness, which some run into. In civil things, the light of nature, and the custom of nations takes place for our conduct; and the rule of the Gospel in those cases is a rule of direction, not a rule of contraries.

Secondly. What is the great effect of this renewing which we must labour after; "That ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." By the will of God here we are to understand his revealed will concerning our duty, what the Lord our God requires of us. "This is the will of God" in general, "even our sanctification;" that will which we pray may be done by us as it is done by the angels; especially his will as it is revealed in the New Testament, where he hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son.

1st. The will of God is good, and acceptable, and perfect; three excellent properties of a law. It is good, Mic. vi. 8; it is exactly consonant to the eterna, reason of good and evil; it is good in itself, it is good for us. Some think the evangelical law is here called good, in distinction from the ceremonial law, which consisted of statutes that were not good, Eze. xx. 25. It is acceptable, it is pleasing to God; that and that only is so which is prescribed by him. The only way to attain his favour as the end is to conform to his will as the rule. It is perfect, that nothing can be added; the revealed will of God is a sufficient rule of faith and practice, containing all things which tend to the perfection of the man of God, to furnish us thoroughly to every good work, 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

2nd. That it concerns Christians to prove what is that will of God which is good, and acceptable, and perfect; that is, to know it with judgment and approbation: to know it experimentally; to know the excellency of the will of God by the experience of a conformity to it. It is to "approve things that are excellent," Phil. i. 10; it is δοκιμαζέω, (the same word that is used here,) "to try" things that differ; in doubtful cases readily to apprehend what the will of God is, and to close in with it. It is to be "of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord," Isa. xi. 3.

3rd. That those are best able to prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, who are transformed by the renewing of their mind. A living principle of grace is in the soul, as far as it prevails, an unbiased, unprejudiced judgment concerning the things of God. It dispotheth the soul to receive and entertain the revelations of the Divine will. The promise is, Jno. vii. 17, "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine." A good wit can dispute and distinguish about the will of God; whilst an honest, humble heart, that hath spiritual senses exercised, and is delivered into the mould of the word, loves it, and doth it, and hath the relish and savour of it. Thus to be godly is to surrender ourselves to God.

2. When this is done, to serve him in all manner of gospel obedience. Some hints of this we have here; ver. 11, 12, "Serving the Lord." Wherefore do we present ourselves to him, but that we may serve him? Acts xxvii. 23, "Whose I am," and then it follows, "whom I serve." To be religious is to serve God. How? 1st. We must make a business of it, and not be slothful in that business. "Not slothful in business." There is the business of the world, that of our particular calling, in which we must not be slothful, 1 Thes. iv. 11. But this seems to be meant of the business of serving the Lord; our Father's business, Lu. ii. 49. Those that would approve themselves Christians indeed must make religion their business; that is, must choose it and learn it, and give themselves to it; they must love it, and employ themselves in it, and abide by it, as their great and main business. And having made it our business, we must not be slothful in it; not desire our own ease, and consult that, when it comes in competition with our duty. We must not drive on slowly in religion. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as wicked servants. 2nd. We must be "servent in spirit, serving the Lord." God must be served with the spirit, ch. i. 9, Jno. iv. 24, under the influences of the Holy Spirit. Whatever we do in religion, it is pleasing to God no farther than it is done with our spirits, wrought upon by the Spirit of God. And there must be fervency in the spirit; a holy zeal and warmth, and ardency of affection in all we do; as those that love God not only with the heart and soul, but with all our hearts and with all our souls. This is the holy fire that kindles the sacrifice, and carries it up to heaven an offering of a sweet smelling savour. "Serving the Lord." Τὴν κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες; so some copies read it, "serving the time;" that is, improving your opportunities, and making the best of them; complying with the present seasons of grace. 3rd. "Rejoicing in hope." God is worshipped and honoured by our hope and trust in him, especially when we rejoice in that hope, take a complacency in that confidence; which argues a great assurance of the reality, and a great esteem of the excellency, of the good hoped for. 4th. "Patient in tribulation." Thus also God is served not only by working for him when he calls us to work; but by sitting still quietly when he calls us to suffer. Patience for God's sake, and with an eye to his will and glory, is true piety. Observe, those that rejoice in hope are likely to be patient in tribulation. It is a believing prospect of the joy set before us that bears up the spirit under all outward pressure. 5th. "Continuing instant in prayer." Prayer is a friend to hope and patience, and we do in it serve the Lord. Ἀποκρίτεσθαι. It signifies both fervency and perseverance

xii. 20, "Therefore;" the three chief MSS. read, "But if thine enemy," &c. "Coals of fire;" the heaping up of coals of fire is a figurative expression for the Divine vengeance (Psa. cxl. 10). Hence the text implies, "Kindness is the best revenge; make your enemy ashamed by requiting unkindness with kindness: do not allow yourself to be defeated by the ill-doing of others"—i.e., "Do not suffer yourself to act in the same way as they do, for this is to be defeated; but rather let your constancy in kindness vanquish their ill-will."

xiii. 1. It has been thought that some special circumstances made the precepts in this chapter necessary or desirable. Mistakes respecting the nature of Christ's kingdom may have given rise to acts of disobedience among Christians to the civil power. "Higher powers;" rather, "authorities that are above him." The word here rendered "powers" is used (Eph. iii. 10, vi. 12; Col. i. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22) of angelic powers; but in this passage (as in Luke xii. 11 and Tit. iii. 1) it is applied to human magistrates.

in prayer. We should not be cold in the duty, nor soon weary of it, Lm. xviii. 1;

1 Thes. v. 17; Eph. vi. 18; Col. iv. 2.

This is our duty which immediately respects God.

Secondly. Concerning our duty which respects ourselves; this is sobriety.

1. A sober opinion of ourselves, ver. 3. It is ushered in with a solemn preface; "I say, through the grace given unto me." The grace of wisdom, by which he understood the necessity and excellency of this duty; the grace of apostleship, by which he had authority to press and enjoin it. I say it, that am commissioned to say it, in God's name; I say it, and it is not for you to gainsay it. It is said to every one of us, one as well as another. Pride is a sin that is bred in the bone with all of us, and we have therefore each of us need to be cautioned and armed against it. "Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think." We must take heed of having too great an opinion of ourselves, or putting too high a valuation upon our own judgments, abilities, persons, performances. We must not be self-conceited, nor esteem too much our own wisdom and other attainments; nor think ourselves to be something, Gal. vi. 3. There is a high thought of ourselves which we may and must have, to think ourselves too good to be the slaves of sin, and drudges to this world. But, on the other hand, we should think soberly; that is, we must have a low and modest opinion of ourselves and our own abilities, our gifts and graces, according to what we have received from God and not otherwise; not be confident and hot in matters of doubtful dispute; not stretch ourselves beyond our line; not judge and censure those that differ from us; not desire to make a fair show in the flesh. These, and the like, are the fruits of a sober opinion of ourselves. The words will bear yet another sense agreeable enough. "Of himself" is not in the original; therefore it may be read, "That no man be wise above what he ought to be wise, but be wise unto sobriety;" that is, we must not exercise ourselves in things too high for us, Ps. cxxxi. 1, 2, not intrude into those things which we have not seen, Col. ii. 18, those secret things which belong not to us, Deu. xxix. 29, not covet to be wise above what is written. There is a knowledge that puffeth up, which reacheth after forbidden fruit. We must take heed of that, and labour after that knowledge which tends to sobriety, to the rectifying of the heart, and the reforming of the life. Some understand it of the sobriety which keeps us in our own place and station, from intruding into the gifts and offices of others. See an instance of this sober, modest care in the exercise of the greatest spiritual gifts, 2 Cor. x. 13-15. To this head refers also that exhortation; ver. 16, "Be not wise in your own conceits." It is good to be wise; but it is bad to think ourselves so; for there is more hope of a fool than of him that is wise in his own eyes. It was an excellent thing for Moses to have his face shine and not know it. Now the reasons why we must have such a sober opinion of ourselves, and our own abilities and attainments, are these:

1st. Because, whatever we have that is good, God hath dealt it to us. Every good and perfect gift comes from above, Jas. i. 17. What have we "that we have not received?" and if we have received it, why then do we "boast?" 1 Cor. iv. 7. The best and most useful man in the world is no more, no better, than what the free grace of God makes him every day. When we are thinking of ourselves we must remember to think not how we have attained, as though our might and the power of our hand had gotten us these gifts; but think how kind God hath been to us, for it is he that gives us power to do any thing that is good, and in him is all our sufficiency.

2nd. Because God deals out his gifts in a certain measure. "According to the measure of faith." Observe, the measure of spiritual gifts he calls "the measure of faith;" for that is the radical grace. What we have and do that is good is so far right and acceptable, as it is founded in faith, and flows from faith, and no farther. Now, faith and other spiritual gifts with it are dealt by measure, according as Infinite Wisdom sees meet for us. Christ had the Spirit given him without measure, Jno. iii. 34; but the saints have it by measure: see Eph. iv. 7. Christ, who had gifts without measure, was meek and lowly; and shall we, that are stunted, be proud and self-conceited?

3rd. Because God hath dealt out gifts to others as well as to us. "Dealt to every man." Had we the monopoly of the Spirit, or a patent to be sole proprietors of spiritual gifts, there might be some pretence for this conceitedness of ourselves; but others have their share as well as we. God is a common Father, and Christ a common root to all the saints, that do all derive virtue from him; and therefore it ill becomes us to lift up ourselves and to despise others, as if we only were the people in favour with heaven, and wisdom should die with us. This reasoning he illustrates by a comparison taken from the members of the natural body; as 1 Cor. xii. 12; Eph. iv. 16, "As we have many members in one body," &c., ver. 4, 5. Here observe, First. All the saints do make up one body in Christ, who is the head of the body, and the common centre of their unity. Believers lie not in the world as a confused, disorderly heap, but are organized and knit together as they are united to one common head, and acted and animated by one common spirit. Secondly. Particular believers are members of this body, constituent parts, which speak them less than the whole, and in relation to the whole, deriving life and spirits from the head. Some members in the body are bigger and more useful than others, and each receives spirits from the head according to its proportion. If the little finger should receive as much nourishment as the leg, how unseemly and prejudicial would it be? We must remember that we are not the whole; we think above what is meet if we think so; we are but parts and members. Thirdly. "All the members have not the same office," ver. 4, but each hath its respective place and work assigned it. The office of the eye is to see, the office of the hand is to work, &c. So in the mystical body, some are qualified for and called to one sort of work; others are, in like manner, fitted for and called to another sort of work. Magistrates, ministers, people in a Christian commonwealth, have their several offices, and must not intrude one upon another, or clash in the discharge of their several offices. Fourthly. Each member hath its place and office for the good and benefit of the whole, and of every other member. We are not only members of Christ, but we are "members one of another," ver. 5. We stand in relation one to another; we are engaged to do all the good we can one to another, and to act in conjunction for the common benefit. See this illustrated at large, 1 Cor. xii. 14, &c. Therefore we must not be puffed up with a conceit of our own attainments, because, whatever we have, as we received it, so we received it not for ourselves, but for the good of others.

2. A sober use of the gifts that God hath given us. As we must not on the one hand be proud of our talents, so on the other hand we must not bury them. Take heed lest, under a pretence of humility and self-denial, we be slothful in laying out ourselves for the good of others. We must not say, I am nothing, therefore I will sit still and do nothing; but, I am nothing in myself, and therefore I will lay out myself to the utmost in the strength of the grace of Christ. He instanteth in the ecclesiastical offices appointed in particular churches; in the discharge of which each must study to do his own duty, for the preserving of order, and the promoting of edification in the church; each knowing his place, and fulfilling it. "Having then gifts." The following induction of particulars supplies the sense of this general. "Having gifts," let us use them. Authority and ability for the ministerial work is the gift of God. "Gifts differing." The immediate design is different, though the ultimate tendency of all the same. "According to the grace," χαρίσματα κατὰ τὴν χάριν. The free grace of God is the spring and original of all the gifts that are given to men. It is grace that appoints the office, qualifies and inclines the person, works both to will and to do. There were in the primitive church extraordinary gifts of tongues, of discerning, of healing; but he speaks here of those that are ordinary; compare 1 Cor. xii. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 1 Pet. iv. 10. Seven particular gifts he instanteth in, ver. 6, 8, which seem to be meant of so many distinct offices, used by the prudential constitution of many of the primitive churches, especially the larger. There are two general ones here expressed by prophesying and ministering; the former the work of the bishops, the latter the work of the deacons; which were the only two standing officers, Phil. i. 1. But the particular work belonging to each of these might be, and it should seem was, divided and allotted by common consent and agreement, that it might be done the more effectually; because that which is everybody's work is nobody's work, and he despatcheth his business best that is vir unius negotii,—"a man of one business." Thus David sorted the Levites, 1 Chr. xxiii. 4, 5, and in this, "wisdom is profitable to direct." The five latter will therefore be reduced to the two first.

1st. Prophecy. "Whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith." It is not meant of the extraordinary gifts of foretelling things to come, but the ordinary office of preaching the word. So prophesying is taken, 1 Cor. xiv. 1, 3, &c.; 1 Cor. xi. 4; 1 Thes. v. 20. The work of the Old Testament prophets was not only to foretell future things, but to warn the people concerning sin and duty, and to be their remembrancers concerning that which they knew before. And thus gospel preachers are prophets, and do indeed, as far as the revelation of the word goes, foretell things to come. Preaching refers to the eternal condition of the children of men, points directly to a future state. Now those that preach the word must do it "according to the proportion of faith," κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως; that is,

First. As to the manner of our prophesying. It must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith. He had spoken, ver. 3, of the measure of faith dealt to every man. Let him that preacheth set all the faith he hath on work to impress the truths he preacheth upon his own heart in the first place. As people cannot hear well, so ministers cannot preach well, without faith. First believe and then speak, Ps. cxvi. 10; 2 Cor. iv. 13. And we must remember the proportion of faith; that though all men have not faith, yet a great many have besides ourselves; and therefore we must allow others to have a share of knowledge and ability to instruct as well as we, even those that in lesser things differ from us. "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself;" and do not make it a ruling rule to others, remembering that thou hast but thy proportion.

Secondly. As to the matter of our prophesying. It must be according to the proportion of the doctrine of faith, as it is revealed in the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. By this rule of faith the Bereans tried Paul's preaching, Acts xvii. 11; compare Acts xvi. 22; Gal. i. 9. There are some staple truths, as I may call them; some prima axiomata,—"first axioms," plainly and uniformly taught in the Scripture, which are the touchstone of preaching, by which, though we must not despise prophesying, yet we must "prove all things," and then "hold fast that which is good," 1 Thes. v. 20, 21. Truths that are more dark must be examined by those that are more clear; and then entertained when they are found to agree and comport with the analogy of faith; for it is certain one truth can never contradict another. See here what ought to be the great care of preachers, to preach sound doctrine according to the form of wholesome words, Tit. ii. 8; 1 Tim. i. 13. It is not so necessary that the prophesying be according to the proportion of art, the rules of logic and rhetoric; but it is necessary that it be according to the proportion of faith, for it is the word of faith that we preach. Now there are two particular works which he that prophesieth hath to mind,—teaching and exhorting; proper enough to be done by the same person, at the same time; and when he doth the one, let him mind that; when he doth the other, let him do that too as well as he can. If by agreement between the ministers of a congregation this work be divided, either constantly, or interchangeably, so that one teacheth and the other exhorts, that is, (in our modern dialect,) one expoundeth, and the other preacheth, let each do his work according to the proportion of faith. 1st. "Let him that teacheth wait on teaching." Teaching is the bare explaining and proving of gospel truths without practical application, as in the expounding of the Scripture. Pastors and teachers are the same office, Eph. iv. 11; but the particular work somewhat different. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and hath undertaken that province, let him stick to it. It is a good gift, let him use it, and give his mind to it. "He that teacheth, let him be in his teaching;" so some supply it. "Ὁ διδάσκων, ἐν τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ." Let him be frequent, and constant, and diligent in it; let him abide in that which is his proper work, and be in it as his element: see 1 Tim. iv. 15, 16, where it is explained by two words, ἐν τοῖς ῥησιν, and ἐπίμενε αὐτοῖς,—"Be in these things" and "continue in them." 2nd. "Let him that exhorteth wait on exhortation;" let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, as the former of the teacher; to apply gospel truths and rules more closely to the case and condition of the people, and to press upon them that which is more practical. Many that are very accurate in teaching yet may be very cold and unskilful in exhorting; and on the contrary. The one requires a clearer head, the other a warmer heart. Now where these gifts are evidently separated, (that the one excels in the one, and the other in the other,) it conduceth to edification to divide the work accordingly; and whatsoever the work is we undertake, let us mind it. To wait on our work is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts upon it, to lay hold on all opportunities for it; and to study, not only to do it, but to do it well.

2nd. Ministry. If a man hath διακονίαν, the office of a deacon, or assistant to the pastor and teacher, let him use that office well; a churchwarden, suppose, an elder, or an overseer of the poor; and perhaps there were more put into these offices, and there was more solemnity in them, and a greater stress of care and business lay upon them in the primitive churches than we are now well aware of. It includes all those offices which concern the οἶκος τοῦ κυρίου, the church, "the outward business of the house of God;" see Neh. xi. 16. Serving tables, Acts vi. 2. Now he on whom this care of ministering is devolved, let him attend to it with faithfulness and diligence; particularly, First. "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity;" that is, those church officers that were the stewards of the church's alms, collected money, and distributed it according as the necessities of the poor were. Let them do it ἐν ἀπλοτητι, that is, liberally and faithfully; not converting what they receive to their own use, or distributing it with any sinister design, or with respect of persons; not froward and peevish with the poor, or seeking pretences to put them by; but with all sincerity and integrity, having no other intention in it but to glorify God and do good. Some understand it in general of all almsgiving; he that hath wherewithal, let him give, and give plentifully and liberally; so the word is translated, 2 Cor. viii. 2; ix. 11. God loves a cheerful, bountiful giver. Secondly. "He that ruleth with diligence." It should seem he means those that were assistants to the pastors in exercising church discipline, as their eyes, and hands, and mouth, in the government of the church; or those ministers that in the congregation did chiefly undertake and apply themselves to this ruling work; for we find those ruling that laboured in the word and doctrine, 1 Tim. v. 17. Now such must do it with diligence. It notes both care and industry to discover what is amiss, to reduce those that go astray, to reprove xiii. 2. "Resisteth;" or, "setteth himself against the authority, resisteth the ordinance of God;" "and they that resist," &c., for there are two words in the original. "Damnation;" rather, "condemnation," or "judgment." This seems to refer to the punishment inflicted by human power; but in thus suffering the Christian would not have the support of God's countenance, as when he suffered for well-doing. God would condemn, not approve the resistance. (Compare 1 Pet. iv. 15, 16.)

xiii. 3. This verse is pointed to as a proof that the epistle was written before the persecution under Nero.

xiii. 4. "Beareth not the sword;" Alford, who renders "weareth," sees in this an allusion to the dagger worn by the Cæsars, which was regarded as a symbol of the power of life and death. The verse is considered by some to be an argument against the abolition of capital punishment.

xiii. 5. "Ye must needs be subject;" the necessity for this suband admonish those that are fallen, to keep the church pure. Those must take a great deal of pains that will approve themselves faithful in the discharge of this trust, and not let slip any opportunity that may facilitate and advance that work. Thirdly, "He that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness." Some think it is meant in general of all that in any thing shew mercy; let them be willing to it, and take a pleasure in it. God loves a cheerful giver. But it seems to be meant of some particular church officers, whose work it was to take care of the sick, and strangers; and they were generally widows, that were in that matter servants to the church; deaconesses, 1 Tim. v. 9, 10; though others, it is likely, might be employed. Now this must be done with cheerfulness. A pleasing countenance in acts of mercy is a great relief and comfort to the miserable; when they see it is not done grudgingly and unwillingly, but with pleasant looks and gentle words, and all possible indications of readiness and alacrity. Those that have to do with them that are sick, and sore, and commonly cross and peevish, have need to put on, not only patience, but cheerfulness, to make the work the more easy and pleasant to them, and the more acceptable to God.

Thirdly, Concerning that part of our duty which respects our brethren, of which we have many instances, in brief exhortations. Now all our duty towards one another is summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. In that is laid the foundation of all our mutual duty; and therefore he mentions that first, which is the lively of Christ's disciples, and the great law of our religion: "Let love be without dissimulation," not in compliment and pretence, but in reality; "not in word and tongue only," 1 Jno. iii. 18. The right love is love unfeigned; not as the kisses of an enemy, which are deceitful. We should be glad of an opportunity to prove the sincerity of our love, 2 Cor. viii. 8. More particularly, there is a love owing to our friends and to our enemies. He instanceth in both.

1. To our friends. He that hath friends must shew himself friendly. There is a mutual love that Christians owe, and must pay.

1st. An affectionate love; ver. 10. "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love," φιλότητος; it signifies not only love, but a readiness and inclination to love; the most genuine and free affection, kindness flowing out as from a spring. It properly denotes the love of parents to their children, which, as it is the most tender, so it is the most natural of any other, unforced, unconstrained. Such must our love be to one another; and such it will be, where there is a new nature, and the law of love is written in the heart. This kind affection puts us on to express ourselves both in word and action with the most courtesy and obligingness that may be. "One to another." This may recommend the grace of love to us, that it is made our duty to love others, so it is as much their duty to love us. And what can be sweeter on this side heaven than to love and be beloved? He that thus watereth shall be watered also himself.

2nd. A respectful love; "In honour preferring one another." Instead of contending for superiority, let us be forward to give to others the pre-eminence. This is explained, Phil. ii. 3, "Let each esteem others better than themselves." And there is this good reason for it, because, if we know our own hearts, we know more evil by ourselves than we do by any one else in the world. We should be forward to take notice of the gifts, and graces, and performances of our brethren, and value them accordingly; be more forward to praise another, and more pleased to hear another praised, than ourselves; τη τιμή ἀλλήλων προσηργίζεσθαι, "going before," or "leading one another in honour," so some read it; not in taking honour, but in giving honour. Strive which of you shall be most forward to pay respect to those to whom it is due, and to perform all Christian offices of love (which are all included in the word honour) to your brethren, as there is occasion. Let all your contention be, which shall be most humble, and useful, and condescending. So the sense is the same with Tit. iii. 14, "Let them learn," ἐπιδιδάσκειν, "to go before in good works." For though we must prefer others, as our translation reads it, and put on others, as more capable and deserving than ourselves, yet we must not make that an excuse for our lying by and doing nothing; nor, under a pretence of honouring others and their serviceableness and performances, indulge ourselves in ease and slothfulness. Therefore he immediately adds, ver. 11, "Not slothful in business."

3rd. A liberal love; ver. 13, "Distributing to the necessities of saints." It is but a mock love which rests in the verbal expressions of kindness and respect, while the wants of our brethren call for real supplies, and it is in the power of our hands to furnish them.

First. It is no strange thing for saints in this world to want necessities for the support of their natural life. In those primitive times, prevailing persecutions must needs reduce many of the suffering saints to great extremities; and still the poor, even the poor saints, we have always with us. Surely the things of this world are not the best things; if they were, the saints, who are the favourites of heaven, would not be put off with so little of them.

Secondly. It is the duty of those who have wherewithal to distribute, or, as it might better be read, to communicate, to those necessities. It is not enough to draw out the soul, but we must draw out the purse to the hungry: see Jas. ii. 15, 16; 1 Jno. iii. 17. "Communicating," κοινωνήσας. It intimates that our poor brethren have a kind of interest in that which God hath given us; and that our relieving of them should come from a sense and fellow feeling of their wants, as though we suffered with them. The charitable benevolence of the Philippians to Paul is called their communicating with his affliction, Phil. iv. 14. We must be ready, as we have ability and opportunity, to relieve any that are in want; but we are in a special manner bound to communicate to the saints. There is a common love owing to our fellow-creatures, but a special love owing to our fellow Christians; Gal. vi. 10, "especially to them who are of the household of faith." "Communicating," ταῖς μνήταις, to the memories of the saints; so some of the ancients read it, instead of ταῖς χρείαις. There is a debt owing to the memory of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises, to value it, to vindicate it, to embalm it. "Let the memory of the just be blessed;" so some read, Pr. x. 7. He mentions another branch of this bountiful love, "Given to hospitality." Those that have houses of their own should be ready to entertain those who go about doing good, or who, for fear of persecution, are forced to wander for shelter. They had not then so much of the convenience of common inns as we have, or the wandering Christians durst not frequent them, or had not wherewithal to bear the charges, and therefore it was a special kindness to bid them welcome on free cost. Nor is it yet an antiquated, superseded duty; as there is occasion we must welcome strangers, for we know the heart of a stranger. "I was a stranger, and ye took me in," is mentioned as one instance of the mercifulness of those that shall obtain mercy; την φιλοφροσύνην διακονήσας; following, or pursuing hospitality. It intimates not only that we must take opportunity, but we must seek opportunity, thus to shew mercy, as Abraham, who sat in the tent door, Gen. xviii. 1; and Lot, who sat in the gate of Sodom, Gen. xix. 1, expecting travellers, whom they might meet and prevent with a kind invitation, and so they entertained angels unawares, Heb. xiii. 2.

[The proper sense of hospitality is kindness to strangers, or to those who were at a distance from their own home—a wholly different thing from the conviviality which opens one's house to festive parties made up of acquaintances from the immediate neighbourhood. Not that we would utterly proscribe these reciprocal convivialities of the middle or higher classes—burthen some though they often are, and wearisome to an extreme from the entire destitution, whether of the intellectual or the spiritual, in the conversation of our every-day parties. Our religionists might in a great degree be protected from this latter annoyance, were they but consistent with themselves; and did they aim at an entire, instead of a partial Christianity. Had they more of openness and intrepidity in their talk—when they sit at the same table, did they meet together on the footing of a society of immortals—would they speak of the country whither they were going, and of the character which prepared for it—a goodly number even of their present society might be amalgamated into a conformity with their own spirit, while the rest might be scared away from those resorts, in the atmosphere of which they could not breathe with congeniality or comfort. There would thus be brought about a thing mainly wanted in our day—a broader line of demarcation between the church and the world. It might seem a paradox, but is not the less true, that it is easier to be an altogether than an almost Christian.—C.]

4th. A sympathising love; ver. 15, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." Where there is a mutual love between the members of the mystical body, there will be such a fellow-feeling: see 1 Cor. ii. 26. True love will interest us in the sorrows and joys of one another, and teach us to make them our own. Observe the common mixture in this world, some rejoicing, and others weeping, as the people, Ezr. iii. 12, 13, for the trial, as of other graces, so of brotherly love, and Christian sympathy. Not that we must participate in the sinful mirths or mournings of any, but only in just and reasonable joys and sorrows; not envying those that prosper, but rejoicing with them, truly glad that others have that success and comfort which we have not; not despising those that are in trouble, but concerned for them, and ready to help them, as being ourselves in the body. This is to do as God doth; who not only hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servants, Ps. xxxv. 27, but is likewise afflicted in all their afflictions, Isa. lxiii. 9.

5th. An united love. "Be of the same mind one towards another," ver. 16; that is, labour as much as you can to agree in apprehension; and wherein you come short of that, yet agree in affection, endeavour to be all one, not affecting to clash, and contradict, and thwart one another, but keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, Phil. ii. 2; iii. 15, 16; 1 Cor. i. 10; τὸ αὐτὸ εἰς ἀλλήλους φρονεῖντες, wishing the same good to others that you do to yourselves; so some understand it. This is to love our brethren as ourselves, desiring their welfare as our own.

6th. A condescending love. "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate," ver. 16. True love cannot be without lowliness, Eph. iv. 1, 2, Phil. ii. 3. "When our Lord Jesus washed his disciples' feet to teach us brotherly love, Jno. xiii. 2, 14, 34, it was designed especially to intimate to us, that to love one another aright is to be willing to stoop to the meanest offices of kindness for the good of one another. Love is a condescending grace. Non bene conveniunt, majestas et amor—Majesty and love do but ill assort with each other." Observe how it is pressed here:

First. "Mind not high things;" that is, we must not be ambitious of honour and preferment, nor look upon worldly pomp and dignity with any inordinate value or desire, but rather with a holy contempt. When David's advancements were high, his spirit was humble; Ps. cxxxi. 1, "I do not exercise myself in great matters." The Romans living in the imperial city, which reigned over the kings of the earth, Rev. xvii. 18, and was at that time in the meridian of its splendour, perhaps were ready to take occasion from thence to think the better of themselves: even the holy seed were tainted with this leaven. Roman Christians would be ready to look scornfully upon other Christians, as some citizens use to do upon the country; and therefore the apostle so often cautions them against high-mindedness; compare ch. xi. 20. They lived near the court, and conversed daily with the gaiety and grandeur of it; Well, saith he, do not mind it, be not in love with it.

Secondly. "Condescend to men of low estate." Τοῖς ταπεινοῖς συναπαγόμενοι. 1st. It may be meant of mean things, to which we must condescend. If our condition in the world be poor and low, our enjoyments coarse and scanty, our employments despicable and contemptible, yet we must bring our minds to it, and acquiesce in it; so the margin, "Be contented with mean things." Be reconciled to the place which God in his providence hath put us in, whatever it be. We must account nothing below us but sin; stoop to mean habitations, mean fare, mean clothing, mean accommodations, when they are our lot, and not grudge. Nay, we must be carried with a kind of impetus, by the force of the new nature, (so the word συναπάγομαι properly signifies, and it is very significant,) towards mean things, when God appoints us to them, as the old corrupt nature is carried out towards high things. We must accommodate ourselves to mean things. We should make a low condition and mean circumstances more the centre of our desires than a high condition.

2nd. It may be meant of mean persons; so we read it (I think both are to be included). "Condescend to men of low estate." We must associate ourselves with, and accommodate ourselves to, those that are poor and mean in the world, if they be such as fear God. David, though a king upon the throne, was a companion for all such, Ps. cxix. 63. We need not be ashamed to converse with the lowly, while the great God overlooks heaven and earth to look at such. True love values grace in rags as well as in scarlet. A jewel is a jewel, though it lie in the dirt. The contrary to this condescension is reproved, Jas. ii. 1-4. Condescend; that is, suit yourselves to them, stoop to them for their good, as Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19, &c. Some think the original word is a metaphor taken from travellers, when those that are stronger and swifter of foot stay for those that are weak and slow, make a halt, and take them with them. Thus must Christians be tender towards their fellow-travellers. As a means to promote this he adds, "Be not wise in your own conceits," to the same purpose with ver. 2. We shall never find in our hearts to condescend to others, while we find there so great a conceit of ourselves; and therefore that must needs be mortified. Μὴ γινώσκω φρόνημα παρ' ἑαυτοῦ—Be not wise by yourselves; that is, be not confident of the sufficiency of your own wisdom, so as to despise others, or think you have no need of them, Pr. iii. 7, nor be shy of communicating what you have to others. We are members one of another, depend upon one another, are obliged to one another; and therefore, "Be not wise by yourselves," remembering it is the merchandise of wisdom that we profess; now, merchandise consists in commerce, receiving and returning.

7th. A love that engageth us, "as much as lies in us, to live peaceably with all men," ver. 18. Even those with whom we cannot live intimately and familiarly, by reason of distance in degree or profession, yet we must with such live peaceably; that is, we must be harmless and inoffensive, not giving others occasion to quarrel with us; and we must be galled and unrevenged, not taking occasion to quarrel with them. Thus must we labour to preserve the peace that it be not broken, and to piece it again when it is broken. The wisdom from above is pure and peaceable. Observe how the exhortation is limited. It is not expressed so as to oblige us to impossibilities: "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you." Thus, Heb. xii. 14, "Follow peace;" Eph. iv. 3, "Endeavouring to keep." Study the things that make for peace. "If it be possible." It is not possible to preserve the peace when we cannot do it without jection is not to be that of mere terror, not only for wrath, but for principle, that conscience might be kept pure and void of offence. (Acts xxiv. 16; 1 Tim. iii. 9.)

xiii. 6. "Pay ye tribute also;" "Tertullian remarks that what the Romans lost by the Christians refusing to bestow gifts on their temples, they gained by their conscientious payment of taxes" (Alford).

xiii. 8. "The law;" "Love fulfils any law" (Vaughan).

xiii. 11. The remembrance of the near approach of the day of the Lord is urged as an incentive to careful observance of the foregoing precepts. "Our salvation nearer;" Alford renders, "Now is salvation nearer to us than when we (first) believed." Complete salvation of each individual Christian is nearer at hand, but we must not ignore the clear reference of the whole passage to the great day of Christ's return. (Compare Matt. xxiv. 42; Luke xxi. 28-36.)

xiii. 13. "Let us walk;" Vaughan translates, "Let us have offending God, and wounding conscience. Id possumus quod pure possumus,—"That is possible which is possible without incurring blame." "The wisdom that is from above is first pure, and then peaceable," Jas. iii. 17. Peace without purity is the peace of the devil's palace. "As much as lieth in you," There must be two words to the bargain of peace. We can but speak for ourselves. We may be unavoidably striven with, as Jeremiah, who was a man of contention. Jer. xv. 10, and that we cannot help; our care must be, that nothing be wanting on our parts to preserve the peace; Ps. cxx. 7, "I am for peace: though when I speak, they are for war."

2. To our enemies. Since men became enemies to God, they have been found very apt to be enemies one to another. Let but the centre of love be once forsaken, and the lines will either clash and interfere or be at an uncomfortable distance. And of all men, those that embrace religion have reason to expect to meet with enemies in a world whose smiles seldom concur with Christ's. Now Christianity teacheth us how to carry it towards our enemies; and in this instruction it quite differs from all other rules and methods, which generally aim at victory and dominion, but this at inward peace and satisfaction. And whoever are our enemies, that wish us ill and seek to do us ill, our rule is to do them no hurt, but all the good we can.

1st. To do them no hurt; ver. 17, "Recompense to no man evil for evil;" for that is a brutish recompence, and befitting only those animals which are not conscious either of any being above them or of any state before them. Or, if mankind were made (as some dream) in a state of war, such recompences as these were agreeable enough; but we have not so learned God, who doth so much for his enemies, Mat. v. 45; much less have we so learned Christ, who did for us when we were enemies, ch. v. 8, 10; so loved that world which hated him without a cause. "To no man," neither to Jew nor Greek; not to one that hath been thy friend, for by recompensing evil for evil thou wilt certainly lose him; not to one that hath been thine enemy, for by not recompensing evil for evil thou mayest perhaps gain him. To the same purpose, ver. 19, "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves." And why must this be ushered in with such an affectionate compellation, rather than any other of the exhortations of this chapter? Surely, because this is intended for the composing of angry spirits, that are hot in the resentment of a provocation; he addresseth himself to such in this endearing language to mollify and qualify them. Any thing that breathes love sweetens the blood, lays the storm, and cools the intemperate heat. Would you pacify a brother offended, call him dearly beloved. Such a soft word fitly spoken may be effectual to turn away wrath. "Avenge not yourselves;" that is, when anybody hath done you any ill turn, do not desire or endeavour to bring the like mischief or inconvenience upon him. It is not forbidden to the magistrate to right those that are wronged by punishing the wrong-doer, or to make and execute just and wholesome laws against malefactors: but it forbids private revenge, which flows from anger and ill-will; and this is fitly forbidden, for it is presumed we are incompetent judges in our own case. Nay, if persons wronged, in seeking the defence of the law, and magistrates in granting it, act from any particular personal pique or quarrel, and not from a concern that public peace and order be maintained, and right done; even such proceedings, though seemingly regular, will fall under this prohibited self-revenge: see how strict the law of Christ is in this matter, Mat. v. 38-40. It is forbidden not only to take it into our own hands to avenge ourselves, but to desire and thirst after even that judgment in our case which the law affords, for the satisfying of a revengeful humour. It is a hard lesson to corrupt nature; and therefore he enjoins,

First. A remedy against it. "Rather give place unto wrath." Not to our own wrath; to give place to that is to give place to the devil, Eph. iv. 26, 27. We must resist, and stifle, and smother, and suppress that. But, 1st. To the wrath of our enemy. Give place to it; that is, be of a yielding temper; do not answer wrath with wrath, but with love rather. "Yielding pacifies great offences," Ecc. x. 4. Receive affronts and injuries, as a stone is received into a heap of wool, which gives way to it, and so it doth not rebound back or go any farther. So it explains that of our Saviour, Mat. v. 39, "Whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." Instead of meditating how to revenge one wrong, prepare to receive another. When men's passions are up, and the stream is strong, let it have its course, lest by an unreasonable opposition it may be made to rage and swell the more. When others are angry, let us be calm. This is a remedy against revenge, and seems to be the genuine sense. But, 2nd. Many apply it to the wrath of God. Give place to that; make room for him to take the throne of judgment, and let him alone to deal with thine adversary.

Secondly. A reason against it. "For it is written, Vengeance is mine." We find it written, Deu. xxxii. 35. God is the sovereign King, the righteous Judge, and to him it belongs to administer justice; for, being a God of infinite knowledge, by his actions are weighed in unerring balances; and being a God of infinite purity, he hates sin, and cannot endure to look upon iniquity. Some of this power he hath trusted in the hands of the civil magistrates, Gen. ix. 6; ch. xiii. 4. Their legal punishments therefore are to be looked upon as a branch of God's revengings. This is a good reason why we should not avenge ourselves; for if vengeance be God's, then, 1st. We may not do it. We step into the throne of God if we do, and take his work out of his hand. 2nd. We need not do it; for God will, if we meekly leave the matter with him. He will avenge us as far as there is reason and justice for it, and farther we cannot desire it: see Ps. xxxviii. 14, 15, "I heard not, for thou wilt hear;" and what need I hear and God hear too?

2nd. We must not only not do hurt to our enemies, but our religion goes higher, and teacheth us to do them all the good we can. It is a command peculiar to Christianity, and which doth highly commend it; "Love your enemies," Mat. v. 44. And we are here taught to shew that love to them, both in word and deed.

First. In word: ver. 14, "Bless them which persecute you." It hath been the common lot of God's people to be persecuted, either with a powerful hand or with a spiteful tongue. Now we are here taught to bless those that persecute us. Bless them, that is, 1st. Speak well of them. If there be any thing in them that is commendable and praiseworthy, take notice of it and mention it to their honour. 2nd. Speak respectfully to them, according as their place is; not rendering railing for railing, and bitterness for bitterness. And, 3rd. We must wish well to them, and desire their good, so far from seeking any revenge. Nay, 4th. We must offer up that desire to God by prayer for them. If it be not in the power of our hand to do any thing else for them, yet we can testify our goodwill by praying for them, for which our Master hath given us not only a rule, but an example to back that rule, Lu. xxiii. 34. "Bless, and curse not." It notes a thorough-paced goodwill in all the instances and expressions of it; not, bless them when you are at prayer, and curse them at other times; but bless them always, and curse not at all. Cursing ill becomes the mouths of those whose work it is to bless God, and whose happiness it is to be blessed of him.

Secondly. In deed; ver. 20, "If thine enemy hunger," that is, As thou hast ability and opportunity, be ready and forward to shew him any kindness, and to do him any office of love for his good, and never the less forward for his having been thine enemy, but rather the more, that thou mayest thereby testify the sincerity of thy forgiving of him. It was said of Archbishop Cranmer that the way for a man to make him his friend was to do him an ill turn. It is quoted from Pr. xxv. 21, 22; so that, as high a precept as it seems to be, the Old Testament was not a stranger to it. Observe here,

1st. What we must do; we must do good to our enemies. "If he hunger," do not insult over him, and say, Now God is avenging me of him and pleading my cause; do not make such a construction of his wants; but "feed him." Then, when he hath need of thine help, and thou hast an opportunity of starving him and trampling upon him, then feed him; φιλέκε αὐτόν, a significant word, feed him abundantly, nay, feed him carefully and indulgently; frustulatum pascere,—"feed him with small pieces," as we do children and sick people, with much tenderness; contrive to do it so as to express thy love. "If he thirst, give him drink;" ποτίσε αὐτόν; drink to him in token of reconciliation and friendship, so confirm your love to him.

2nd. Why we must do this; because "in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." Two senses are given of this, which I think are both to be taken in disjunctively. "Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head;" that is, Thou shalt either, (1.) Melt him into repentance and friendship, and mollify his spirit towards thee,—alluding to those who melt metals,—they not only put fire under them, but heap fire upon them; thus Saul was melted and conquered with the kindness of David, 1 Sam. xxiv. 16; xxvi. 21. Thou wilt win a friend by it; and if thy kindness have not that effect, then, (2.) It will aggravate his condemnation, and make his malice against thee the more inexcusable; thou wilt hereby hasten upon him the tokens of God's wrath and vengeance. Not that this must be our intention in shewing him kindness, but for our encouragement such will be the effect. To this purpose is the exhortation in the last verse, which suggests a paradox not easily understood by the world; that in all matters of strife and contention those that revenge are the conquered, and those that forgive are the conquerors. (1st.) "Be not overcome of evil;" that is, Let not the evil of any provocation that is given you have such a power over you, or make such an impression upon you, as to dispossess you of yourselves, to disturb your peace, to destroy your love, to ruffle and discompose your spirits, to transport you to any indecencies, or to bring you to study or endeavour any revenge. He that cannot quietly bear an injury is perfectly conquered by it. (2nd.) "But overcome evil with good;" with the good of patience and forbearance, nay, and of kindness and beneficence to those that wrong you; learn to defeat their ill design against you, and either to change them, or howsoever to preserve your own peace. He that hath this rule over his spirit is better than the mighty.

[This is the noble and grand sentiment of the Christian religion. Nothing like this is to be found in the heathen classics, and nothing like it ever existed among pagan nations. Christianity alone has brought forth this lovely and mighty principle; and one design of it is to advance the welfare of man by promoting peace, harmony, and love. The idea of overcoming evil with good never occurred to men until the Gospel was preached. It never has been acted on except under the influences of the Gospel. On this principle God shews kindness; on this principle the Saviour came, and bled, and died; and on this principle all Christians should act in treating their enemies, and in bringing a world to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus. If Christians will shew benevolence, if they will send forth proofs of love to the ends of the earth, the evils of the world will be overcome. Nor can the nations be converted until Christians act on this great and most important principle of their religion, on the largest scale possible, to "overcome evil with good."—A. B.]

To conclude, there remain two exhortations yet untouched, which are general, and which recommend all the rest as good in themselves, and of good report.

1. As good in themselves; ver. 9, "Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good." God hath shewed us what is good,—these Christian duties here enjoined; and that is evil which is opposite to them. Now observe, 1st. We must not only not do evil, but we must "abhor that which is evil." We must hate sin with an utter and irreconcilable hatred; have an antipathy to it as the worst of evils, and contrary to our new nature, and to our true interest; hating all the appearances of sin, even the garment spotted with the flesh. 2nd. We must not only do that which is good, but we must cleave to it. It notes a deliberate choice of a sincere affection for, and a constant perseverance in, that which is good. So cleave to it as not to be allured or affrighted from it; "cleave to him that is good," even to the Lord, Acts xi. 23, with a dependence and acquiescence. It is subjoined to the precept of brotherly love, as directive of it; we must love our brethren, but not love them so much as for their sakes to commit any sin, or omit any duty; not think the better of any sin for the sake of the person that commits it, but forsake all the friends in the world to cleave to God and duty.

2. As of good report; ver. 17, "Provide things honest in the sight of all men;" that is, Do not only do, but study and forecast, and take care to do, that which is amiable and creditable, and recommends religion to all with whom you converse: see Phil. iv. 8. These acts of charity and beneficence are in a special manner of good report among men, and therefore are to be industriously followed by all that consult the glory of God and the credit of their profession.

CHAPTER XIII.

There are three good lessons taught us in this chapter, where the apostle enlargeth more upon his precepts than he had done in the foregoing chapter, finding them more needful to be fully pressed. I. A lesson of subjection to lawful authority, ver. 1-6. II. A lesson of justice and love to our brethren, ver. 7-10. III. A lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves, ver. 11-14.

ET every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. 2 Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. 3

For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power?

meanour as a citizen should be. In this chapter he takes up the question of toleration among fellow-Christians. "Him that is weak," &c.: the weakness here referred to is "over-scrupulousness of conscience." Such a one is to be "received"—i.e., is to be accounted a brother, not to be rejected because of his peculiarities. The caution "not to doubtful disputations" is most needful. The strong often hold out the hand of patronising fellowship to the weak, with a proud expectation of removing their scruples. This is walked; when it comes to the great retrospect in which the whole past life shall be seen as one single act." "Honestly;" more than mere honesty is implied; "decorously," "seemly," "becomingly," would better convey the meaning.

xiii. 14. "Make not provision;" "Take no forethought for the flesh, in the direction of lusts."

xiv. 1. The apostle brings Christian principles into every sphere of life. In the previous chapter he showed what the Christian's de-do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: 4 For he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. 5 Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. 6 For for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing.

We are here taught how to carry ourselves towards magistrates and those that are in authority over us, called here the higher powers; intimating their authority, they are powers; and their dignity, they are higher powers; including not only the king, as supreme, but all inferior magistrates under him; and yet it is expressed not by the persons that are in that power, but the place of power itself in which they are. However the persons themselves may be wicked, and of those vile persons which the citizen of Zion contemneth, Ps. xv. 4, yet the just power which they have must be submitted to and obeyed. He had taught us in the foregoing chapter not to avenge ourselves or to recompense evil for evil. Lest it should seem as if that did cancel the ordinance of a civil magistracy among Christians, he takes occasion to assert the necessity of it, and of the due inflicting of punishment upon evil-doers, however it looks like recompensing evil for evil. Observe,

First. The duty enjoined: "Let every soul be subject." Every soul, that is, every person, one as well as another, not excluding the clergy, who call themselves spiritual persons, however the church of Rome doth not only exempt such from subjection to the civil powers, but place them in authority above them, making the greatest princes subject to the pope, who thus exalteth himself above all that is called God. "Every soul." Not that our consciences are subjected to the wills of any man, (it is God's prerogative to make laws immediately to bind conscience, and we must render to God the things that are God's;) but it intimates that our subjection must be free and voluntary, sincere and hearty: "Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought," Ecc. x. 20. To compass and imagine is treason begun. This subjection of soul here required includes inward honour, 1 Pet. ii. 17, and outward reverence and respect, both in speaking to them and in speaking of them; obedience to their commands in things lawful and honest, and in other things a patient subjection to the penalty without resistance; a conformity in every thing to the place and duty of subjects, bringing our minds to the relation and condition, and the inferiority and subordination of it. They are higher powers; be content they should be so, and submit to them accordingly. Now there was good reason for the pressing of this duty of subjection to civil magistrates. 1. Because of the reproach which the Christian religion lay under in the world, as an enemy to the public peace, order, and government; as a sect that turned the world upside down, and the embracers of it as enemies to Caesar, and the more because the leaders were Galileans; an old slander.—Jerusalem was represented as a "rebellious city, hurtful to kings and provinces," Ezr. iv. 15, 16. Our Lord Jesus was so reproached, though he told them his kingdom was not of this world. No marvel, then, if his followers have been loaded, in all ages, with the like calumnies, called factious, and seditious, and turbulent, and looked upon as the troublers of the land, their enemies having found such representations needful for the justifying of their barbarous rage against them. The apostle, therefore, for the obviating of that reproach, and the clearing of Christianity from it, shews that obedience to civil magistrates is one of the laws of Christ, whose religion helps to make people good subjects; and it was very unjust to charge upon Christianity that faction and rebellion which its principles and rules are so directly contrary to. 2. Because of the temptation which the Christians lay under to be otherwise affected to civil magistrates, some of them being originally Jews, and so leavened with a principle that it was unmeet for any of the seed of Abraham to be subject to one of another nation; their king must be of their brethren, Deu. xvii. 15. Besides, Paul had taught them that they were not under the law, they were made free by Christ. Lest that liberty should be turned into licentiousness, and misconstrued to countenance faction and rebellion, the apostle enjoins obedience to civil government, which was the more necessary to be pressed now, because the magistrates were heathen and unbelievers, which yet doth not destroy their civil power and authority. Besides, the civil powers were persecuting powers; the body of the law was against them.

Secondly. The reasons to enforce this duty. Why must we be subject? 1. "For wrath's sake." Because of the danger we run ourselves into by resistance. Magistrates bear the sword, and to oppose them is to hazard all that is dear to us in this world, for it is to no purpose to contend with him that bears the sword. The Christians were then, in those persecuting times, obnoxious to the sword of the magistrate for their religion, and they needed not make themselves more obnoxious by their rebellion. The least show of resistance or sedition in a Christian would soon be aggravated and improved, and would be very prejudicial to the whole society; and therefore they had more need than others to be exact in their subjection, that those who had so much occasion against them in the matter of their God might have no other occasion. To this head must that argument be referred, ver. 2, "They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." Κριμα ληφονται, they shall be called to an account for it. God will reckon with them for it, because the resistance reflects upon him; the magistrate will reckon with them for it. They will come under the lash of the law, and will find the higher powers too high to be trampled upon, all civil governments being justly strict and severe against treason and rebellion; so it follows, ver. 3, "Rulers are a terror." This is a good argument, but it is low for a Christian.

2. "We must be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience sake." Not so much formidine penae,—from the fear of punishment; as virtutis amore,—for the love of virtue. This makes common civil offices acceptable to God, when they are done for conscience sake, with an eye to God, to his providence putting us into such relations, and to his precept making subjection the duty of those relations. Thus the same thing may be done from a very different principle. Now to oblige conscience to this subjection, he argues, ver. 1—4, 6,

1st. From the institution of magistracy. "There is no power but of God; that is, God, as the ruler and governor of the world, hath appointed the ordinance of magistracy; so that all civil power is derived from him, as from its original, and he hath, by his providence, put the administration into those hands, whatever they are that have it. By him kings reign, Pr. viii. 15. The usurpation of power, and the abuse of power, are not of God, for he is not the author of sin, but the power itself is. As our natural powers, though often abused and made instruments of sin, are from God's creating power, so civil powers are from God's governing power. The most unjust and oppressive princes in the world have no power but what is given them from above, Jno. xix. 11, the Divine providence, being in a special manner conversant about those changes and revolutions of governments which have such an influence upon states and kingdoms, and such a multitude of particular persons and lesser communities. Or it may be meant of government in general. It is an instance of God's wisdom, power, and goodness in the management of mankind, that he hath disposed them into such a state as distinguisheth between governors and governed, and hath not left them like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser. He did herein consult the benefit of his creatures. "The powers that be." Whatever the particular form and method of government is, whether by monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy, wherever the governing power is lodged, it is an ordinance of God, and it is to be received and submitted to accordingly; though immediately an ordinance of man, 1 Pet. ii. 13, yet originally an ordinance of God. "Ordained of God;" ταρταμένη, a military word, signifying not only the ordination of magistrates, but the subordination of inferior magistrates to the supreme, as in an army; for among magistrates there is a diversity of gifts, and trusts, and services. Hence it follows, ver. 2, that "whosoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God." There are other things from God that are the greatest calamities, but magistracy is from God, as an ordinance, that is, it is a great law, and it is a great blessing. So that the children of Belial, that will not endure the yoke of government, will be found breaking a law, and despising a blessing. Magistrates are therefore called gods, Ps. lxxxix. 6, because they bear the image of God's authority; and those who spurn at their power reflect upon God himself. This is not at all applicable to the particular rights of kings and kingdoms, and the branches of their constitution; nor can any certain rule be fetched from hence for the modelling of the original contracts betwixt the governors and governed. But it is intended for direction to private persons in their private capacity, to behave themselves quietly and peaceably in the sphere which God hath set them in, with a due regard to the civil powers which God in his providence hath set over them, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Magistrates are here again and again called God's ministers; "He is the minister of God," ver. 4, 6. Magistrates are in a more peculiar manner God's servants; the dignity they have calls for duty. Though they are lords to us they are servants to God, have work to do for him, and an account to make up to him. In the administration of public justice the determining of quarrels, the protecting of the innocent, the righting of the wronged, the punishing of offenders, and the preserving of national peace and order, that every man may not do what is right in his own eyes; in these things it is that magistrates act as God's ministers. As the killing of an inferior magistrate, while he is actually doing his duty, is accounted treason against the prince, so the resisting of any magistrates in the discharge of these duties of their place is the resisting of an ordinance of God.

2nd. From the intention of magistracy. "Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." &c. Magistracy was designed to be,

First. A terror to evil works and evil workers. They bear the sword, not only the sword of war, but the sword of justice. They are heirs of restraint, to put offenders to shame; Laish wanted such, Jud. xvii. 7. Such is the power of sin and corruption that many will not be restrained from the greatest enormities, and such as are most pernicious to human society, by any regard to the law of God and nature or the wrath to come, but only by the fear of temporal punishments, which the wilfulness and perverseness of degenerate mankind hath made necessary. Hence it appears that laws with penalties for the lawless and disobedient, 1 Tim. i. 7, must be constituted in Christian nations, and are agreeable with, and not contradictory to, the Gospel. When men are become such beasts, such ravenous beasts one to another, they must be dealt with accordingly, taken and destroyed, in terrore,—to deter others. The horse and the mule must thus be held in with bit and bridle. In this work the magistrate is "the minister of God," ver. 4. He acts as God's agent, to whom vengeance belongs, and therefore must take heed of infusing into his judgments any private personal resentments of his own. "To execute wrath upon him that doeth evil." In this the judicial processes of the most vigilant faithful magistrates, though some faint resemblance and prelude of the judgment of the great day, yet come far short of the judgment of God; they reach only to the evil act, can execute wrath only on him that doth evil; but God's judgment extends to the evil thought, and is a discerner of the intents of the heart. "He beareth not the sword in vain." It is not for nothing that God hath put such a power into the magistrate's hand, but it is intended for the restraining and suppressing of disorders. And therefore "if thou do that which is evil," which falls under the cognizance and censure of the civil magistrate, "be afraid," for civil powers have quick eyes and long arms. It is a good thing when the punishment of malefactors is managed as an ordinance of God, instituted and appointed by him. 1st. As a holy God that hates sin; against which, as it appears and puts up head, a public testimony is thus borne. 2nd. As king of nations and the God of peace and order, which are hereby preserved. 3rd. As the protector of the good, whose persons, families, estates, and names are by this means hedged about. 4th. As one that desires not the eternal ruin of sinners, but by the punishment of some would terrify others, and so prevent the like wickedness, that others may hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously. Nay, it is intended for a kindness to those that are punished, that by the destruction of the flesh the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Secondly. A praise to them that do well. Those that keep in the way of their duty shall have a commendation and protection of the civil powers, to their credit and comfort. Do that which is good, ver. 3, and thou needest not be afraid of the power, which, though terrible, reacheth none but those that by their own sin make themselves obnoxious to it; the fire burns only that which is combustible, nay, thou shalt have praise of it. This is the intention of magistracy, and therefore we must for conscience sake be subject to it, as a constitution designed for the public good, to which all private interests must give way. But pity it is that ever this gracious intention should be perverted, and that those that bear the sword, while they countenance and connive at sin, should be a terror to those that do well. But so it is, when the vilest men are exalted, Ps. xii. 1; and yet even then the blessing and benefit of a common protection and a face of government and order, is such, as that it is our duty in that case rather to submit to persecution for well doing, and to take it patiently, than by any irregular and disorderly practices to attempt a redress. Never did sovereign prince pervert the ends of government as Nero did; and yet to him Paul appealed, and under him had the protection of the law and the inferior magistrates more than once. Better a bad government than none at all.

3rd. From our interest in it. "He is the minister of God to thee for good." Thou hast the benefit and advantage of the government, and therefore must do what thou canst to preserve it, and nothing to disturb it. Protection draws allegiance. If we have protection from the government, we owe subjection to it; by upholding the government, we keep up our own hedge. This subjection what they are not to do. The weak is to be received in sympathy and toleration, but not so as to sit in judgment on his scruples—not for the "deciding of doubts," for such is the meaning of "doubtful disputations."

xiv. 3. The words "despise," "judge," are exactly appropriate. The strong might be tempted to "despise" the weak, the weak to "judge" the strong, or set him down as profane.

xiv. 4. "Another's servant:" literally, "the servant of another,"

i.e., Christ. (Compare verses 8, 9.) The word here rendered "servant" is not "slave," which St. Paul applies to himself (chap. i. 1), but signifies "a domestic servant," and suggests the impertinence of the one who would judge and criticise. "He standeth or falleth:" not in the judgment hereafter, but in his place as a Christian, from which the uncharitable judgment of others would exclude him. It is to be observed that the argument of this passage is directed to the weak who "judged" the strong, not to the strong who might is likewise consented to by the tribute we pay; ver. 6, "For for this cause pay you tribute;" as a testimony of your submission, and an acknowledgment that in conscience you think it to be due. You do, by paying taxes, contribute your share to the support of the power; if, therefore, you be not subject, you do but pull down with one hand what you support with the other. And is that conscience? By your paying tribute, you not only own the magistrate's authority, but the blessing of that authority to yourselves; a sense of which you thereby testify, giving him that as a recompence for the great pains he takes in the government; for honour is a burthen, and if he do as he ought, he is "attending continually upon this very thing;" for it is enough to take up all a man's thoughts and time, in consideration of which fatigue we pay tribute, and must be subject. "Pay you tribute," φοροῦτε τελεῖτε. He doth not say, you give it as an alms, but you pay it as a just debt, or lend it, to be repaid in all the blessings and advantage of public government, which you reap the benefit of. This is the lesson the apostle teacheth; and it becomes all Christians to learn and practise it, that the godly in the land may be found, whatever others are, the quiet and the peaceable in the land.

[The obedience which the Scriptures command us to render to our rulers is not unlimited; there are cases in which disobedience is a duty. This is evident, 1. From the very nature of the case. The command to obey magistrates is, from its nature, a command to obey them as magistrates in the exercise of their rightful authority. 2. From the fact that the same inspired men who enjoin, in such general terms, obedience to rulers, themselves uniformly and openly disobeyed them whenever their commands were inconsistent with other and higher obligations. "We ought to obey God rather than men," was the principle which the early Christians avowed, and on which they acted. They disobeyed the Jewish and heathen authorities whenever they required them to do any thing contrary to the will of God. There are cases, therefore, in which disobedience is a duty. How far the rightful authority of rulers extends, the precise point at which the obligation to obedience ceases, must often be a difficult question, and each case must be decided on its own merits. The same difficulty exists in fixing the limits of the authority of parents over their children, husbands over their wives, masters over their servants. This, however, is rather a theoretical than a practical difficulty. The general principles on which the question in regard to any given case is to be decided are sufficiently plain. No command to do any thing morally wrong can be binding; nor can any which transcends the rightful authority of the power whence it emanates, ver. 1-7.—H.]

7 Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour. 8 Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. 9 For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 10 Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law.

We are here taught a lesson of justice and charity.

First. Of justice; ver. 7, "Render therefore to all their dues," especially to magistrates, for this refers to what goes before; and likewise to all with whom we have to do. To be just is to give to all their due, to give everybody his own. What we have, we have it as stewards; others have an interest in it, and must have their dues. Render to God his due in the first place, to ourselves, to our families, our relations, to the commonwealth, to the church, to the poor, to those that we have dealings with, in buying, selling, exchanging, &c. "Render to all their dues;" and that readily and cheerfully, not tarrying till we are by law compelled to it. He instanteth,

1. In due taxes; "Tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom." Most of the countries where the Gospel was first preached were subject at this time to the Roman yoke, and were made provinces of the empire. He wrote this to the Romans, who, as they were rich, so they were drained by taxes and impositions, to the just and honest payment of which they are here pressed by the apostle. Some distinguish between tribute and custom, understanding by the former constant standing taxes, and by the other those which were occasionally required; both which are to be faithfully and conscientiously paid as they become legally due. Our Lord was born when his mother went to be taxed; and enjoined the payment of tribute to Cæsar. Many, who in other things seem to be just, yet make no conscience of this, but pass it off with a false, ill-favoured maxim, that it is no sin to cheat the king; directly contrary to Paul's rule, "Tribute to whom tribute is due."

2. In due respects; "Fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour." This sums up the duty which we owe not only to magistrates, but to all superiors, parents, masters, all that are over us in the Lord, according to the fifth commandment, "Honour thy father and mother;" compare Lev. xix. 3, "Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father;" not with a fear of amazement, but a loving, reverent, respectful, obediential fear. Where there is not this respect in the heart to our superiors, no other duty will be paid aright.

3. In due payment of debts; ver. 8, "Owe no man any thing;" that is, do not continue in any one's debt while you are able to pay it, farther than by at least the tacit consent of the person to whom you are indebted. Give every one his own. Do not spend that upon yourselves, much less heap it up for yourselves, which you owe to others. "The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again," Ps. xxxvii. 21. Many that are very sensible of the trouble, think little of the sin, of being in debt.

Secondly. Of charity; "Owe no man any thing;" ἀρεῖτε, "You do owe" no man any thing, so some read it. Whatever you owe to any relation, or to any with whom you have to do, it is eminently summed up and included in this debt of love; "But to love one another," that is a debt that must be always in the paying, and yet always owing. Love is a debt; the law of God, and the interest of mankind, makes it so; it is not a thing which we are left at liberty about; but it is enjoined us, as the principle and summary of all duty owing one to another; "for love is the fulfilling of the law;" not perfectly, but it is a good step towards it. It is inclusive of all the duties of the second table, which he instanteth in, ver. 9, and those suppose the love of God; see 1 Jno. iv. 20. If the love be sincere, it is accepted as the fulfilling of the law. Surely we serve a good master, that hath summed up all our duty in one word, and that a short word, and a sweet word, love, the beauty and harmony of the universe. Loving and being loved, is all the pleasure, joy, and happiness of an intelligent being. "God is love," 1 Jno. iv. 16, and love is his image upon the soul; where it is, the soul is well moulded, and the heart fitted for every good work. Now, to prove that love is the fulfilling of the law, he gives us,

1. An induction of particular precepts, ver. 9. He instanteth in the last five of the ten commandments, which he observes to be all summed up in this royal law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" with an "as" of quality, not of equality; with the same sincerity that thou lovest thyself, though not in the same measure and degree. He that loves his neighbour as himself will be desirous of the welfare of his neighbour's body, goods, and good name, as of his own. On this is built that golden rule of doing as we would be done by. Were there no restraints of human laws in these things, no punishments incurred, (which the malignity of human nature hath made necessary,) the law of love itself is effectual to prevent all such wrongs and injuries, and to keep peace and good order among us. In the enumeration of these commandments, he puts the seventh before the sixth, and mentions this first, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" for though that commonly goes under the name of love, (pity it is so good a word should be so abused,) yet it is really as great a violation of it as killing and stealing is; which shews that true brotherly love is love to the souls of our brethren in the first place. He that tempts others to sin, and defiles their minds and consciences, though he may pretend the most passionate love, Pr. vii. 15, 18, doth really hate them, just as the devil doth, who wars against the soul.

2. A general rule concerning the nature of brotherly love. "Love worketh no ill," ver. 10; that is, he that walks in love, that is acted and governed by a principle of love, he worketh no ill; he neither practiseth nor contriveth any ill to his neighbour, to any one that he hath any thing to do with; οὐκ ἐργάζεται, the projecting of evil is in effect the performing of it. Hence devising of iniquity is called the working of evil upon the bed, Mic. ii. 1. Love intends and designs no ill to any body, is utterly against the doing of that which may turn to the prejudice, offence, or grief of any. It worketh no ill, that is, it prohibits the working of any ill. More is implied than is expressed; it not only worketh no ill, but it worketh all the good that may be, deviseth liberal things. For it is a sin not only to devise evil against thy neighbour, but to withhold good from them to whom it is due; both are forbidden together, Pr. iii. 27. This proves that "love is the fulfilling of the law," answers all the end of it; for what else is that but to restrain us from evil-doing, and to constrain us to well-doing? Love is a living, active principle of obedience to the whole law. The whole law is written in the heart, if the law of love be there.

11 And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. 12 The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. 13 Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. 14 But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

We are here taught a lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves. Our main care must be to look to ourselves. Four things we are here taught, as a Christian's directory for his day's work; when to awake, how to dress ourselves, how to walk, and what provision to make.

First. When to awake; "Now it is high time to awake," ver. 11. To awake out of the sleep of sin, for a sinful condition is a sleeping condition; out of the sleep of carnal security, sloth, and negligence; out of the sleep of spiritual death, and out of the sleep of spiritual deadness. Both the wise and foolish virgins slumbered and slept, Mat. xxv. 5. We have need to be often excited and stirred up to awake. The word of command to all Christ's disciples is, Watch, awake; that is, be concerned about your souls, and your eternal interest; take heed of sin, be ready to, and serious in, that which is good, and live in a constant expectation of the coming of our Lord. Considering,

1. The time we are cast into. "Knowing the time," Consider what time of day it is with us, and you will see it is high time to awake. It is gospel time, it is the accepted time, it is working time; it is a time when more is expected than was in the times of that ignorance which God winked at, when people sat in darkness. It is high time to awake; for the sun hath been up a great while, and shines in our faces. Have we this light to sleep in? See 1 Thes. v. 5, 6. It is high time to awake; for others are awake and up about us. Know the time to be a busy time; we have a great deal of work to do, and our Master is calling us to it again and again. Know the time to be a perilous time; we are in the midst of enemies and snares; it is high time to awake, for the Philistines are upon us; our neighbour's house is on fire, and our own in danger. It is time to awake, for we have slept enough, 1 Pet. iv. 3; high time indeed, for "Behold the bridegroom cometh."

2. The salvation we are upon the brink of. "Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed;" that is, than when we first believed, and so took upon us the profession of Christianity. The eternal happiness we chose for our portion is now nearer us than it was when we became Christians. Let us mind our way, and mend our pace, for we are now nearer our journey's end than we were when we had our first love. The nearer we are to our centre the quicker should our motion be. Is there but a step betwixt us and heaven, and shall we be so very slow and dull in our Christian course, and move so heavily? The more the days are shortened, and the more grace is increased, the nearer is our salvation, and the more quick and vigorous we should be in our spiritual motions.

Secondly. How to dress ourselves. That is the next care when we are awake and up. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand;" therefore it is time to dress ourselves. Clearer discoveries will be quickly made of gospel grace than have been yet made, as light gets ground. The night of Jewish rage and cruelty is just at an end; their persecuting power is near a period; the day of our deliverance from them is at hand, that day of redemption which Christ promised, Luk. xxi. 28. And the day of our complete salvation, in the heavenly glory, is at hand.

"despise" the weak; for it is the over-scrupulous who is prone to set down the strong, who does not conform to his practice, as profane. The exhortation to the strong comes on later in the chapter.

xiv. 5. "Fully persuaded in his own mind;" let a man have some personal sentiment on these matters, though they are indifferent. They are "indifferent" questions in Christian society, they are not "indifferent" to individual Christians.

xiv. 6. The clause, "And he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it," is omitted in all the best MSS. "To the Lord he eateth not;" i.e., his abstinence, or abstemiousness rather, has a reference to his master, Christ. Yet over that scantier meal "he giveth thanks." He that eateth may think the abstinence of his brother almost an ingratitude to God, who giveth all things liberally to enjoy.

xiv. 9. "Christ died," &c.: read, "Christ died, and lived that he," &c. The parallel with verse 8 is thus preserved.

[The night here must be the time of the believer's being on earth; for his earthly state, with all its comparative light, is but night with respect to the light of heaven. The day which was at hand was not the day of judgment, but the day of death, with respect to those addressed.—R. H.]

Observe then, 1. What we must put off. Put off our night clothes, which it is a shame to appear abroad in. "Cast off the works of darkness." Sinful works are works of darkness; they come from the darkness of ignorance and mistake, they covet the darkness of privacy and concealment, and they end in the darkness of hell and destruction. Let us therefore who are of the day cast them off; not only cease from the practice of them, but detest and abhor them, and have no more to do with them. Because eternity is just at the door, take heed lest we be found doing that which will then make against us, 2 Pet. iii. 11, 14.

2. What we must put on. The Christian's care must be wherewithal we shall be clothed; how shall we dress our souls? 1st. "Put on the armour of light." Christians are soldiers in the midst of enemies, and their life a warfare, therefore their array must be armour, that they may stand upon their defence; the armour of God, which we are directed to, Eph. vi. 13, &c. A Christian may reckon himself undressed, if he be unarmed. The graces of the Spirit are this armour, to secure the soul from Satan's temptations, and the assaults of this present evil world. This is called the armour of light, some think, alluding to the bright glittering armour which the Roman soldiers used to wear, or such armour as becomes us to wear in the daylight. The graces of the Spirit are suitable, splendid ornaments; are in the sight of God of great price. 2nd. "Put on the Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 14. This stands in opposition to a great many base lusts, mentioned, ver. 13. "Rioting and drunkenness," which must be cast off. One would think it should follow, But put on sobriety, temperance, chastity, the opposite virtues. No, "put on Christ," that includes all. Put on the righteousness of Christ for justification; be found in him, Phil. iii. 9, as a man is found in his clothes; put on the priestly garments of the elder brother, that in them you may obtain the blessing; put on the Spirit and grace of Christ for sanctification; "put on the new man," Eph. iv. 24; get the habit of grace confirmed, the acts of it quickened. Jesus Christ is the best clothing for Christians to adorn themselves with, to arm themselves with; it is decent, distinguishing, dignifying, and defending. Without Christ we are naked, deformed; all other things are filthy rags, fig-leaves, a sorry shelter. God has provided us coats of skins, large, strong, warm, and durable. By baptism we have in profession put on Christ, Gal. iii. 27. Let us do it in truth and sincerity. The Lord Jesus Christ. Put him on as Lord to rule you, as Jesus to save you, and in both as Christ anointed and appointed by the Father to this ruling, saving work.

Thirdly. How to walk. When we are up and dressed, we are not to sit still in an affected closeness and privacy, as monks and hermits. What have we good clothes for, but to appear abroad in them. "Let us walk." Christianity teaches us how to walk so as to please God, whose eye is upon us; 1 The. iv. 1, "Walk honestly as in the day;" compare Eph. v. 8, "Walk as children of the light." Our conversation must be as becomes the Gospel. "Walk honestly;" εὐσχημίως, decently, and becomingly, so as to credit your profession, and to adore the doctrine of God our Saviour, and recommend religion in its beauty to others. Christians should be in a special manner careful to carry themselves well in those things wherein men have an eye upon them, and to study that which is lovely and of good report. Particularly, here are three pair of sins we are cautioned against. 1. We must not walk in rioting and drunkenness; abstain from all excess in eating and drinking. We must not give the least countenance to revelling, nor indulge our sensual appetite in any private excesses. Christians must not overcharge their hearts with surfeiting and drunkenness, Lu. xxi. 34. This is not walking as in the day; for "they that are drunk are drunk in the night," 1 The. v. 7. 2. "Not in chambering and wantonness;" not in any of those lusts of the flesh, those works of darkness, which are forbidden in the seventh commandment. Downright adultery and fornication is the chambering forbidden; lascivious thoughts and affections, lascivious looks, words, books, songs, gestures, dances, dalliances, which lead to, and are degrees of, that uncleanness, are the wantonness here forbidden; whatsoever transgresseth the pure and sacred law of chastity and modesty. 3. "Not in strife and envying." These are also works of darkness; for, though the acts and instances of strife and envy are very common, yet none are willing to own the principles, or to acknowledge themselves envious and contentious. It may be the lot of the best saints to be envied and striven with; but to strive and to envy ill become the disciples and followers of the peaceable and humble Jesus. Where there is riot and drunkenness, there use to be chambering and wantonness, and strife and envy. Solomon puts them all together, Pr. xxiii. 29, &c. Those that tarry long at the wine, ver. 30, have contentions and wounds without cause, ver. 29, and their eyes behold strange women, ver. 33.

Fourthly. What provision to make; ver. 14. "Make not provision for the flesh." Be not careful about the body. Our great care must be to provide for our souls. But must we take no care about our bodies? Must we not provide for them when they need it? Yes, but two things are here forbidden: 1. Perplexing ourselves with an inordinate care, intimated in those words, πρόνοιαν μὴ ποιεῖτε; be not solicitous in forecaring for the body, do not stretch your wits, nor set your thoughts upon the tenter-hooks, in making this provision; be not careful and encumbered about it, do not take thought, Mat. vi. 31. It forbids an anxious, encumbering care. 2. Indulging ourselves in an irregular desire. We are not forbidden barely to provide for the body, it is a lamp that must be supplied with oil, but we are forbidden "to fulfil the lusts thereof." The necessities of the body must be considered, but the lusts of it must not be gratified. Natural desires must be answered, but wanton appetites must be checked and denied. To ask meat for our necessities is duty, we are taught to pray for daily bread; but to ask meat for our lusts is provoking, Ps. lxxviii. 18. Those who profess to walk in the Spirit must not fulfil the lusts of the flesh, Gal. v. 16.

[The former verses, 11, 12, tell us, it is time to rise, and call us to put on our clothes, and, being soldiers, our arms. Ver. 13 directeth our behaviour and employment throughout the day. The last verse doth shortly, and clearly, fold up both together.—It contains the words the very reading of which wrought so with Augustine, that, of a licentious young man, he turned a holy faithful servant of Jesus Christ. While you were without Christ you had no higher nor other business to do but to attend and serve the flesh; but once having put him on, you are other men, and other manners do become you. There is a transcendent sweetness in Christ, that puts the flesh out of credit. "Put on Christ," thy royal robe, and "make no provision for the flesh." A soul clothed with Christ, stooping to any sinful delight, or an ardent pursuit of any thing earthly, though lawful, doth wonderfully indignify itself. Oh! raise up your spirits, you that pretend to anything in Christ: delight in him, and let his love satisfy you at all times. What need you go a-begging elsewhere? All you would add makes you the poorer, abates so much of your enjoyment of him; and what can compensate that? "Put on the Lord Jesus," and then view yourself as, and see if you be fit to be slaves to flesh and earth. These two, "put on the Lord Jesus," and "make no provision for the flesh," are directly the representation of the church,—a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, needed borrow no beauty from it, or any thing under it.—Abp. Leighton.]

xiv. 10. "Judgment-seat of Christ;" the best MSS. have "the judgment-seat of God." The word "Christ," it has been supposed, was substituted from 2 Cor. v. 10. The reading "of God" is confirmed by verses 11, 12.

xiv. 12. "Of himself;" the emphasis is on these words—about himself, not about his neighbour.

xiv. 13. "Let us not judge;" the word "judge" is in different tenses. The first denotes the habit of judging, the second a definite

CHAPTER XIV.

The apostle having in the former chapter directed our carriage one towards another in civil things, and prescribed the sacred laws of justice, peaceableness, and order, to be observed by us as members of the commonwealth, comes in this and part of the following chapter in like manner to direct our demeanour one towards another in sacred things, which pertain more immediately to conscience and religion, and which we observe as members of the church. Particularly he gives rules how to manage our different apprehensions about indifferent things: in the management of which, it seems, there was something amiss among the Roman Christians to whom he wrote, which he here labours to redress. But the rules are general, and of standing use in the church, for the preservation of that Christian love, which he had so earnestly pressed in the foregoing chapter as the fulfilling of the law. It is certain, nothing is more threatening, nor more often fatal to Christian societies, than the contentions and divisions of their members. By these wounds the life and soul of religion doth expire. Now in this chapter we are furnished with the sovereign balm of Gilead; the blessed apostle prescribes like a wise physician: "Why then is not the hurt of the daughter of my people recovered?" but because his directions are not followed? This chapter, rightly understood, made use of, and lived up to, would set things to rights, and heal us all.

IM that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations. 2 For one believeth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs. 3 Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth: for God hath received him. 4 Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand. 5 One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. 6 He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks. 7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. 8 For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. 9 For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living. 10 But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. 11 For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. 12 So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God. 13 Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. 14 I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean. 15 But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. 16 Let not then your good be evil spoken of: 17 For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and judgment once for all. The second "judge" is like a playful echo of the first.

xiv. 14, 15. "There is nothing unclean of itself;" nothing has any essential pollution. (Compare Mark vii. 15.) But in relation to him who deems it so, it is unclean. The connection of verse 15 is a little difficult, but the simplest way to take it seems to be this: "There is nothing unclean in itself, but it may be so to another." Therefore your conduct must be determined not simply by your knowledge that joy in the Holy Ghost. 18 For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men. 19 Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things where-with one may edify another. 20 For meat destroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence. 21 It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak. 22 Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth. 23 And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

UNCLEAN ANIMALS.—VER. 14.

We have in this chapter,

First. An account of the unhappy contention which had broken out in the Christian church. Our Master had foretold that offences would come; and it seems so they did, for want of that wisdom and love which would have prevented them, and kept up union among them.

1. There was a difference among them about the distinction of meats and days. Those are the two things instanced in. There might be other like occasions of difference, while these made the most noise, and were most taken notice of. The case was this; the members of the Christian church at Rome were some of them originally Gentiles, and others of them Jews. We find Jews at Rome believing, Acts xxviii. 24. Now those that had been Jews were trained up in the observance of the ceremonial appointments touching meats and days. This, which had been bred in the bone with them, would hardly be got out of the flesh, even after they turned Christians; especially with some of them, who were not easily weaned from what they had long been wedded to. They were not well instructed touching the cancelling of the ceremonial law by the death of Christ, and therefore retained the ceremonial institutions, and practised accordingly, while other Christians, that understood themselves better, and knew their Christian liberty, made no such difference.

1st. Concerning meats; ver. 2, "One believeth that he may eat all things," that is, he is well satisfied that the ceremonial distinction of meats into clean and unclean is no longer in force, but that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused,—"nothing unclean of itself," ver. 14. This he was assured of, not only from the general tenor and scope of the Gospel, but particularly from the revelation which Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, (and therefore more immediately concerned in it) had to this purpose, Acts x. 15, 23. This the strong Christian is clear in, and practiseth accordingly; eating what is set before him, and asking no question for conscience' sake, 1 Cor. x. 27. On the other hand, another, who is weak, is dissatisfied in this point, is not clear in his Christian liberty, but rather inclines to think that the meats forbidden by the law remain still unclean; and therefore, to keep at a distance from them he will eat no flesh at all, but "eateth herbs," contenting himself only with the fruits of the earth. See to what degrees of mortification and self-denial a tender conscience will submit. None knows but they that experience it how great both the restraining and the constraining power of conscience is.

2nd. Concerning days, ver. 5. Those that thought themselves still under some kind of obligation by the ceremonial law, esteemed "one day above another," kept up a respect to the times of the passover, pentecost, new moons, and feasts of tabernacles; thought those days better than other days, and solemnized them accordingly with particular observances, binding themselves to some religious rest and exercise on those days. Those who knew that all these things were abolished and done away by Christ's coming esteemed every day alike. We must understand it with an exception of the Lord's day, which all Christians unanimously observed; but they made no account, took no notice, of those antiquated festivals of the Jews. Here the apostle speaks of the distinction of meats and days as a thing indifferent, when it went no farther than the opinion and practice of some particular persons, who had been trained up all their days to such observances, and therefore were the more excusable if they hardly parted with them. But in the epistle to the Galatians, where he deals with those that were originally Gentiles, but were influenced by some Judaizing teachers, not only to believe such a distinction, and to practise accordingly, but to lay a stress upon it as necessary to salvation, and to make the observance of the Jewish festivals public and congregational: here the case was altered, and it is charged upon them as the frustrating of the design of the Gospel, falling from grace, Gal. iv. 9-11. These here did it out of weakness, the Galatians did it out of wilfulness and wickedness, and therefore the apostle handles them thus differently. This epistle is supposed to have been written some time before that to the Galatians. The apostle seems willing to let the ceremonial law wither by degrees, and to let it have an honourable burial. Now these weak Romans seem to be only following it weeping to its grave, but those Galatians were raking it out of its ashes.

2. It was not so much the difference itself that did the mischief as the mismanagement of the difference, making it a bone of contention.

1st. Those that were strong, and knew their Christian liberty, and made use of it, did despise the weak who did not; whereas they should have pitied them, and helped them, and afforded them meek and friendly instruction, they trampled upon them as silly, and humoursome, and superstitious, for scrupling those things which they knew to be lawful. So apt are those that have knowledge to be puffed up with it, and to look disdainfully and scornfully upon their brethren.

2nd. Those that were weak, and durst not use their Christian liberty, did judge and censure the strong who did, as if they were loose Christians, carnal professors, that cared not what they did, but walked at all adventures, and stuck at nothing. They judged them as breakers of the law, contemners of God's ordinance, and the like. Such censures as these discovered a great deal of rashness and uncharitableness, and would doubtless tend much to the alienating of affection. Well, this was the disease, and we see it remaining in the church to this day. The like differences, in like manner mismanaged, are still the disturbers of the church's peace. But,

Secondly. We have proper directions and suggestions laid down for allaying this contention, and preventing the ill consequences of it. The apostle, as a wise physician, prescribes proper remedies for the disease, which are made up of rules and reasons. Such gentle methods doth he take, with such order of a man doth he draw them together, not by excommunicating, suspending, and silencing either side, but by persuading them both to a mutual forbearance. And, as a faithful daysman, he lays his hand upon them both; reasoning the case with the strong, that they should not be so scornful, and with the weak, that they should not be so censorious. And if the contending parties will but submit to this fair arbitration, each abate of his rigour, and sacrifice their differences to their graces, all will be well quickly. Let us observe the rules he gives, some to the strong, and some to the weak, and some to both, for they are interwoven; and reduce the reasons to their proper rules.

1. Those that are weak must be received, "but not to doubtful disputations," ver. 1. Take this for a general rule; spend your zeal in those things wherein you and all the people of God are agreed, and do not dispute about matters that are doubtful. Receive him, προσλαμβάνετε, take him to you, bid him welcome, receive him with the greatest affection and tenderness; porrigite manum, (so the Syriac),—"lend him your hand," to help him, to fetch him to you, to encourage him. "Receive him" into your company, and converse, and communion, entertain him with readiness and condescension, and treat him with all possible endearments. "Receive him," not to quarrel with him, and to argue about uncertain points that are in controversy, which will but confound him, and fill his head with empty notions,—perplex him, and shake his faith. Let not your Christian friendship and fellowship be disturbed with such vain janglings, and strifes of words. "Not to judge his doubtful thoughts," so the margin; that is, not to pump out his weak sentiments concerning those things which he is in doubt about, that you may censure and condemn him. Receive him, not to expose him, but to instruct and strengthen him: see 1 Cor. i. 10; Phil. iii. 15, 16.

2. Those that are strong must by no means despise the weak, nor those that are weak judge the strong, ver. 3. This is levelled directly against the fault of each party. It is seldom that any such contention is but there is a fault on both sides; and both must mend. He argues against both these jointly: we must not despise or judge our brethren. Why so?

1st. Because God hath received them; and we reflect upon him if we reject those whom he hath received. God never cast off any one that had true grace, though he were but weak in it; never broke the bruised reed. Strong believers and weak believers, those that eat, and those that eat not, if they be true believers, are accepted of God. It will be good for us to put this question to ourselves when we are tempted to carry it scornfully towards our brethren, to disdain and censure them, Hath not God owned them? and if he hath dare I disown them? Nay, God doth not only receive them, but hold them up, ver. 4. You think he that eateth will fall by his presumption, or that he that eateth not will sink under the weight of his own fears and scruples. But if they have true faith, and an eye to God, the one in the intelligent use of his Christian liberty, and the other in the conscientious forbearance of it, they shall be held up, the one in his integrity, and the other in his comfort. This hope is built upon the power of God; for "God is able to make him stand;" and, being able, no doubt he is willing to exert that power for the preservation of those that are his own. In reference to spiritual difficulties and dangers, our own and others, much of our hope and comfort is grounded upon the Divine power, 1 Pet. i. 5; Jude 24.

2nd. Because they are servants to their own Master; ver. 4, "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" We reckon it a piece of ill manners to meddle with other people's servants, and to find fault with them, and censure them. Weak and strong Christians are indeed our brethren, but they are not our servants. This rash judging is reproved, Jas. iii. 1, under the notion of being many masters. We make ourselves our brethren's masters, and do in effect usurp the throne of God, when we take upon us thus to judge them; especially to judge their thoughts and intentions, which are out of our view; to judge their persons and state, concerning which it is hard to conclude by those few indications which fall within our cognizance. God sees not as man sees; and he is their Master, and not we. In judging and censuring our brethren, we meddle with that which doth not belong to us. We have work enough to do at home; and, if we must needs be judging, let us exercise our faculty upon our own hearts and ways. "To his own Master he stands or falls," that is, his doom will be according to his Master's sentence, and not according to ours. How well for us is it that we are not to stand or fall by the judgment of another, but by the righteous and unerring judgment of God, which is according to truth! While thy brother's cause is before thy judgment, it is coram non judice,—"before one who is not the judge;" the court of heaven is the proper court for trial, where, and where only, the sentence there is nothing unclean absolutely, but by the practical, commonplace fact that there are weak consciences in the world; for to grieve these is not walking according to love, which is more than liberty. For so trifling and contemptible a thing as a piece of meat, destroy not (i.e., become not the Apollyon of; so Vaughan, who cites Rev. ix. 11 and 1 Cor. viii. 10, 11) a brother for whom Christ died." "Make not more of your food than Christ did of his life" (Bengel).

xiv. 17. "Meat and drink:" better, "eating and drinking."

xiv. 19, 20. "Wherewith one may edify:" mutual edification—i.e., the "building up" of the brethren in their faith individually, and the "building up" of all as one temple collectively. (Compare 1 Cor. iii. 17, vi. 19; Eph. ii. 22.) The metaphor suggests the word in the next verse. It is rendered "destroy," but it is the exact opposite of the word rendered "build up." "Pull down" or "undo" would preserve the figure.

xiv. 22. "Have it to thyself:" i.e., "Enjoy the blessing of this is definitive and concluding; and to which, if his heart be upright, he may comfortably appeal from thy rash censure.

3rd. Because both the one and the other, if they be true believers, are right for the main, have an eye to God, and do approve themselves to God in what they do, ver. 6. "He that regardeth the day," that makes conscience of observing the Jewish fasts and festivals, not imposing it upon others, nor laying a stress upon it, but willing to be, as he thinks, on the surer side, as thinking there is no harm in resting from worldly labours, and worshipping God on those days, it is well. We have reason to think, because in other things he carries himself like a good Christian, that in this also his eye is single, and that he "regardeth it unto the Lord," and God will accept of his honest intention, though he be under a mistake about the observation of days; for the sincerity and uprightness of the heart was never rejected for the weakness and infirmity of the head; so good a Master do we serve. On the other hand, "he that regardeth not the day," that doth not make a difference between one day and another; doth not call one day holy and another profane; one day lucky and another unlucky, but esteemeth every day alike, he doth not do it out of a spirit of opposition, contradiction, or contempt of his brother. If he be a good Christian he doth not, he dares not, do it from such a principle; and therefore we charitably conclude, that "to the Lord he doth not regard it." He therefore makes no such difference of days, because he knows God hath made none; and therefore intends his honour in endeavouring to dedicate every day to him. So for the other instance; "He that eateth" whatever is set before him, though it be blood, though it be swine's flesh, if it be food convenient for him, he "eateth to the Lord." He understands the liberty that God hath granted him, and uses it to the glory of God, with an eye to his wisdom and goodness, in enlarging our allowance now under the Gospel, and taking off the yoke of legal restraints; "and he giveth God thanks" for the variety of food he hath, and the liberty he hath to eat it, and that in those things his conscience is not fettered. On the other hand, he "that eateth not" those meats which were forbidden by the ceremonial law, "to the Lord he eateth not." It is for God's sake, because he is afraid of offending God by eating that which he is sure was once prohibited; "and he giveth God thanks" too that there is enough beside. If he conscientiously deny himself that which he takes to be forbidden fruit, yet he blesseth God that of other trees in the garden he may freely eat. Thus while both have an eye to God in what they do, and approve themselves to him in their integrity, why should either of them be judged or despised? Observe, Whether we eat flesh or eat herbs, it is a thankful regard to God, the Author and Giver of all our mercies, that sanctifies and sweetens it. Bishop Sanderson, in his thirty-fourth sermon, upon 1 Tim. iv. 4, justly makes this observation: "It appears by this, that saying grace" (as we commonly call it, perhaps from 1 Cor. x. 30.) "before and after meat, was the common known practice of the church, among Christians of all sorts, weak and strong. An ancient, commendable, apostolical, Christian practice, derived down from Christ's example, through all the ages of the church, Mat. xiv. 19; xv. 36; Lu. ix. 16; 1 Jo. vi. 8; Mat. xxvi. 30; Acts xvii. 35; blessing the creatures in the name of God before we use them, and blessing the name of God for them after, both included; for εὐλογεῖν and εὐχαριστεῖν are used promiscuously."

To clear this argument against rash judging and despising, he shews how essential it is to true Christianity to have a regard to God, and not to ourselves, which, therefore, unless the contrary do manifestly appear, we must presume concerning those that in lesser things differ from us. Observe his description of true Christians, taken from their end and aim, ver. 7, 8, and the ground of it, ver. 9.

First. Our end and aim. Not self, but the Lord. As the particular end specifies the action, so the general scope and tendency specifies the state. If we would know what way we walk in we must inquire what end we walk towards. 1st. Not to self. We have learned to deny ourselves, that was our first lesson; "None of us liveth to himself." This is a thing in which all the people of God are one, however they differ in other things; though some are weak and others are strong, yet both agree in this, not to live to themselves. Not one that hath given up his name to Christ is allowed a self-seeker; it is contrary to the foundation of true Christianity. We neither live to ourselves nor die to ourselves, that is, we are not our own masters, nor our own proprietors; we are not at our own dispose. The business of our lives is not to please ourselves, but to please God. The business of our deaths, which we are every day exposed to, and delivered to, is not to make ourselves talked of; we run not such hazards out of vain-glory, while we are dying daily. When we come to die actually, neither is that to ourselves; it is not barely that we would be unclothed, and eased of the burthen of the flesh, but it is to the Lord, that we may depart and be with Christ,—may be present with the Lord. 2nd. But to the Lord, ver. 8, to the Lord Christ, to whom all power and judgment is committed, and in whose name we are taught as Christians to do every thing we do, Col. iii. 17; with an eye to the will of Christ as our rule, to the glory of Christ as our end, Phil. i. 21. Christ is the gain we aim at, living and dying. We live to glorify him in all the actions and affairs of life; we die, whether a natural or a violent death, to glorify him, and to go to be glorified with him. Christ is the centre in which all the lines of life and death do meet. This is true Christianity, which makes Christ all in all. So that whether "we live or die, we are the Lord's," devoted to him, depending on him, designed and designing for him. Though some Christians are weak, and others strong, and they of different sizes, capacities, apprehensions, and practices in lesser things, yet they are all the Lord's,—all eyeing, and serving, and approving themselves to Christ; and are accordingly owned and accepted of him. Is it for us then to judge or despise them, as if we were their masters, and they were to make it their business to please us, or to stand or fall by our dooms?

Secondly. The ground of this, ver. 9. It is grounded upon Christ's absolute sovereignty and dominion, which was the fruit and end of his death and resurrection. "To this end he both died, and rose, and revived" (he being risen, entered upon a heavenly life, the glory which he had before) "that he might be Lord both of dead and living," that is, that he might be universal monarch, Lord of all, Acts x. 36, all the animate and inanimate creatures; for he is head over all things to the church. He is Lord of those that are living, to rule them; of those that are dead, to revive them, and raise them up. This was that name above every name, which God gave him as the reward of his humiliation, Phil. ii. 8, 9. It was after he had died and risen that he said, "All power is given unto me," Mat. xxviii. 18; and presently he exerts that power in issuing out commissions, ver. 19, 20. Now if Christ paid so dear for his dominion over souls and consciences, and has such a just and undisputed right to exercise that dominion, we must not so much as seem to invade it, or intrench upon it by judging the consciences of our brethren, and arraigning them at our bar. When we are ready to reproach and reflect upon the name and memory of those that are dead and gone, and to pass a censure upon them, (which some the rather do, because such judgments of the dead are more likely to pass uncontrolled and uncontradicted,) we must consider that Christ is Lord of the dead, as well as of the living. If they are dead they have already given up their account, and let that suffice.

And this leads to another reason against judging and despising; namely, strong faith without obtruding it to the injury of others." "Happy is he," &c.: "Happy is he whose practice does not outrun his convictions."

xv. 1. "We then that are strong:" St. Paul includes himself among the strong; he had said as much in chap. xiv. 14. "Bear the infirmities of the weak:" Vaughan aptly quotes, "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. viii. 17). (Compare Gal. vi. 2.)

4th. Because both the one and the other must shortly give an account, ver. 10–12. A believing regard to the judgment of the great day would silence all these rash judgments. "Why dost thou" that art weak, "judge thy brother" that is strong? "and why dost thou" that art strong, "set at naught thy brother" that is weak? Why is all this clashing, and contradicting, and censuring among Christians? "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ," 2 Cor. v. 10. Christ will be the judge, and he has both authority and ability to determine men's eternal state according to their works, and before him we shall stand as persons to be tried, and to give up an account; expecting our final doom from him, which will be eternally conclusive. To illustrate this, ver. 11, he quotes a passage out of the Old Testament, which speaks of Christ's universal sovereignty and dominion, and that established with an oath; "As I live," saith the Lord, "every knee shall bow to me." It is quoted from Isa. xlv. 23: there it is; "I have sworn by myself;" here it is, "As I live." So that whenever God saith, "As I live," it is to be interpreted as swearing by himself; for it is God's prerogative to have life in himself. There is a farther ratification of it there, "The word is gone out of my mouth." It is a prophecy in general of Christ's dominion; and here very fitly applied to the judgment of the great day, which will be the highest and most illustrious exercise of that dominion. Here is a proof of Christ's godhead; he is the Lord, and he is God, equal with the Father. Divine honour is due to him, and must be paid. It is paid to God through him as Mediator. God will judge the world by him, Acts xvii. 31. The bowing of the knee to him, and the confession made with the tongue, are but outward expressions of inward adoration and praise. Every knee and every tongue, either freely or by force.

First. All his friends do it freely: are made willing in the day of his power. Grace is the soul's cheerful, entire, and avowed subjection to Jesus Christ. 1st. Bowing to him; the understanding bowed to his truths, the will to his laws, the whole man to his authority; and this expressed by the bowing of the knee, the posture of adoration and prayer. It is proclaimed before our Joseph, "Bow the knee," Gen. xli. 43. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet, as it is guided by inward fear and reverence, it is accepted. 2nd. Confessing to him; acknowledging his glory, grace, and greatness, acknowledging our own meanness and vileness; confessing our sins to him, so some understand it.

Secondly. All his foes shall be constrained to do it, whether they will or no. When he shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, then, and not till then, will all those promises which speak of his victories over his enemies and their subjection to him, have their full and complete accomplishment. Then his foes shall be his footstool, and all his enemies shall lick the dust. Hence he concludes, ver. 12, "Every one of us shall give account of himself to God." We must not give account for others, nor they for us; but every one for himself. We must give an account how we have spent our time; how we have improved our opportunities; what we have done, and how we have done it. And therefore, 1st. We have little to do to judge others, for they are not accountable to us, nor are we accountable for them; Gal. vi. 6, "Whosoever they were, it maketh no matter to me, God accepteth no man's person." Whatever they are, and whatever they do, they must give account to their own master, and not to us. If we can in any thing be helpers of their joy, it is well; but we have not dominion over their faith. And, 2nd. We have the more to do to judge ourselves; we have an account of our own to make up, and that is enough for us; "let every man prove his own work" Gal. vi. 4, state his own accounts, search his own heart and life. Let that take up his thoughts, and he that is strict in judging himself, and abasing himself, will not be apt to judge and despise his brother. Let all these differences be referred to the arbitration of Christ at the great day.

5th. Because the stress of Christianity is not to be laid upon these things, nor are they at all essential to religion, either on the one side or on the other. This is his reason, ver. 17, 18, which is reducible to this branch of exhortation: Why should you spend your zeal either for or against those things which are so minute and inconsiderable in religion? Some make it a reason why, in case of offence likely to be taken we should refrain the use of our Christian liberty; but it seems directed in general against that heat about those things which he observed on both sides. "The kingdom of God is not meat," &c. Observe here.

First. The nature of true Christianity, what it is. It is here called, "the kingdom of God;" it is a religion intended to rule us, a kingdom; it stands in a true and hearty subjection to God's power and dominion. The gospel dispensation is in a special manner called the kingdom of God, in distinction from the legal dispensation, Mat. iii. 2; iv. 17.

1st. It is "not meat and drink." It doth not consist either in using or abstaining from such and such meats and drinks. Christianity gives no rule in that case either one way or other. The Jewish religion consisted much in meats and drinks, Heb. ix. 10; abstaining from some meats religiously, Lev. xi. 2; eating other meats religiously; as in several of the sacrifices, part of which were to be eaten before the Lord. But all those appointments are now abolished, and are no more, Col. ii. 21, 22. The matter is left at large; "every creature of God is good," 1 Tim. iv. 4. So, as to other things, it is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, Gal. v. 6; vi. 15; 1 Cor. vii. 19. It is not being of this party and persuasion, of this or the other opinion in lesser things, that will recommend us to God. It will not be asked at the great day who ate flesh, and who ate herbs; who kept holidays, and who did not; nor will it be asked, who was conformist, and who was nonconformist; but asked who feared God and worked righteousness, and who did not. Nothing more destructive to true Christianity than placing it in modes, and forms, and circumstantialities, which eat out the essentials.

2nd. It is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." These are some of the essentials of Christianity; things in which all the people of God are agreed, in the pursuit of which we must spend our zeal, and which we must mind with an excellent care. Righteousness, peace, and joy, are very comprehensive words; and each of them includes much both of the foundation and the superstructure of religion. Might I limit the sense of them, it should be thus: As to God, our great concern is righteousness, to appear before him justified by the merit of Christ's death, sanctified by the Spirit of his grace; for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness; as to our brethren, it is peace; to live in peace, and love, and charity with them; following peace with all men; Christ came into the world to be the great peacemaker; as to ourselves, it is "joy in the Holy Ghost;" that spiritual joy which is wrought by the blessed Spirit in the hearts of believers, which respects God as their reconciled Father, and heaven as their expected home. Next to our complacency with God, the life of religion consists in our complacency in him; to delight ourselves always in the Lord. Surely we serve a good Master, who makes peace and joy so essential to our religion. Then and then only, we may expect peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, when the foundation is laid in righteousness, Isa. xxxiii. 17.

3rd. It is in these things to serve Christ, ver. 18; to do all this out of a respect to Christ himself as our Master, to his will as our rule, and to his glory as our end. That which puts an acceptableness upon all our good duties is a regard to Christ in the doing of them. We are to serve his interests and designs in the world, which are in the first place to reconcile us to God,

xv. 2. "Please his neighbour:" not simply studying his fancies, so as merely to please, as the next clause shows, but for his good to edification. The wish merely to please men is never to have influence among Christian motives. St. Paul disclaims it as incompatible with the service of Christ (Gal. i. 10). (Compare 1 Thess. ii. 4.) It is forbidden in that sphere where it would seem most allowable (Eph. vi. 6). Christ hints that it hinders the acceptance of himself (John v. 44). The Christian "pleasing" is to be with a view to a brother's and then to reconcile us one to another. What is Christianity but the serving of Christ? And we may well afford to serve him who for us and for our salvation took upon him the form of a servant.

Secondly. The advantages of it. He that duly observeth these things, 1st. Is acceptable to God. God is well pleased with such a one, though he be not in every thing just of our length. He hath the love and favour of God; his person, his performances, are acceptable of God, and we need no more to make us happy. If God now accepteth thy works, thou mayest eat thy bread with joy. Those are most pleasing to God that are best pleased with him; and they are those that abound most in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. 2nd. He is approved of men, that is, of all wise and good men, and the opinion of others is not to be regarded. The persons and things which are acceptable to God should be approved of us. Should not we be pleased with that which God is pleased with? What is it to be sanctified, but to be of God's mind? Observe, The approbation of men is not to be slighted; for we must "provide things honest in the sight of all men," and study those things that "are lovely and of good report." But the acceptance of God is to be desired and aimed at in the first place, because sooner or later God will bring all the world to be of his mind.

3. Another rule here given is this, that in these doubtful things every one not only may, but must, walk according to the light that God hath given him. This is laid down ver. 5, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind," that is, practise according to your own judgment in those things, and leave others to do so too. Do not censure the practice of others, let them enjoy their own opinion; if they be persuaded in their own mind that they ought to do so and so, do not condemn them; but if your sober sentiments be otherwise, do not make their practice a rule to you, any more than you must prescribe yours as a rule to them. Take heed of acting contrary to the dictates of a doubting conscience. First be persuaded that what you do is lawful, before you venture to do it. In doubtful things it is good keeping on the sure side of the hedge. If a weak Christian doubt whether it be lawful to eat flesh, while he remains under that doubt he had best forbear, till he be fully persuaded in his own mind. We must not pin our faith upon any one's sleeve, or make others' practice our rule; but follow the dictates of our own understanding. To this purpose he argues, ver. 14, 23; which two verses explain this, and give us a rule not to act against the dictates.

1st. Of a mistaken conscience, ver. 14. If a thing be indifferent, so that it is not in itself a sin not to do it, if we really think it a sin to do it, it is to us a sin, though not to others, because we act against our consciences, though mistaken and misinformed. He instanceth in the case in hand, concerning the difference of meats. Observe,

First. His own clearness in this matter. "I know and am persuaded,"—that is, I am fully persuaded, I am acquainted with my Christian liberty, and am satisfied in it, without any doubt or scruple,—"that there is nothing unclean of itself;" that is, no kind of meat that lies under any ceremonial uncleanness, nor is forbidden to be eaten, if it be food proper for human bodies. Several kinds of meat were forbidden to the Jews, that in that as in other things they might be a peculiar and separate people, Lev. xi. 44; Deu. xiv. 2, 3. Sin had brought a curse upon the whole creation, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake;" the use of the creatures, and dominion over them, was forfeited, so that to man they were all unclean, Gen. i. 15. In token of which, God in the ceremonial law prohibited the use of some, to shew what he might have done concerning all; but now Christ has removed the curse, the matter is set at large again, and that prohibition is taken away. Therefore he saith he was persuaded by the Lord Jesus, not only as the author of that persuasion, but as the ground of it; it was built upon the efficacy of Christ's death, which removed the curse, took off the forfeiture, and restored our right to the creatures in general, and consequently put a period to that particular distinguishing prohibition. So that now there is nothing unclean of itself, every creature of God is good; "nothing common," so the margin, οὐδὲν κοινόν; nothing which is common to others to eat, from the use of which the professors of religion are restrained. Nothing profane; in this sense the Jews used the word common. It is explained by the word καθαίματος, Acts x. 14: nothing common or unclean. It was not only from the revelation made to Peter in this matter, but from the tenor and tendency of the whole Gospel, and the manifest design of Christ's death in general, that Paul learned to count nothing common or unclean. This was Paul's own clearness, and he practised accordingly.

Secondly. But here is a caution he gives to those who had not that clearness in this matter which he had. "To him that esteemeth any thing to be unclean," though it be his error, yet "to him it is unclean." This particular case thus determined gives a general rule, that he that doth a thing which he verily believeth to be unlawful, however the thing be in itself, to him it is a sin. This ariseth from that unchangeable law of our creation, which is, that our wills, in all their choices, motions and directions, should follow the dictates of our understandings. This is the order of nature; which order is broken if the understanding (though misguided) tell us that such a thing is a sin, and yet we will do it. This is a will to do evil; for, if it appears to us to be sin, there is the same pravity and corruption of the will in the doing of it as if really it were a sin; and therefore we ought not to do it. Not that it is in the power of any man's conscience to alter the nature of the action in itself, but only as to himself. It must be understood likewise with this proviso; though men's judgments and opinions may make that which is good in itself to become evil to them, yet they cannot make that which is evil in itself to become good, either in itself or to them. If a man were verily persuaded, (it is Dr. Sanderson's instance, Sermon on ch. xiv. 23), that it were evil to ask his father's blessing, that mispersuasion would make it become evil to him; but if he should be as verily persuaded that it were good to curse his father, that would not make it become good. The Pharisees taught people to plead conscience, when they made corban an excuse for denying relief to their parents, Mat. xv. 5, 6. But that would not serve any more than Paul's erroneous conscience would justify his rage against Christianity, Acts xxvi. 9; or theirs, 1 Jno. xvi. 2.

2nd. Nor must we act against the dictates of a doubting conscience. In those indifferent things which we are sure it is no sin not to do, and yet are not clear that it is lawful to do them, we must not do them while we continue under those doubts; for "he that doubteth is damned if he eat," ver. 23, that is, it turns into sin to him; he is damned, κατακεκρίσται,—he is condemned of his own conscience, because he "eateth not of faith," that is, because he doth that which he is not fully persuaded he may lawfully do. He is not clear that it is lawful for him to eat swine's flesh, (suppose,) and yet is drawn, notwithstanding his doubts, to eat it, because he sees others do it, because he would gratify his appetite with it, or because he would not be reproached for his singularity. Here his own heart cannot but condemn him as a transgressor. Our rule is to walk as far as we have obtained, not farther, Phil. iii. 15, 16: "For whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Taking it in general it is the same with that of the apostle, Heb. xi. 6, "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Whatever we do in religion it will not turn to any good account except we do it from a principle of faith, with a believing regard to the will of Christ as our rule, to the glory of Christ as our end, and to the righteousness of Christ as our plea. Here it seems to be taken more strictly; whatever is not of faith, that is, whatever is done while we are not clearly persuaded of the lawfulness of it, is a sin against conscience. He that will venture to do that which his own conscience suggests to him to be unlawful, when it is not so in itself, will by a like temptation be brought to do that which his conscience tells him is unlawful, when it is really so. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, and it is a dangerous thing to debase and put a force upon conscience, though it be under a mistake. This seems to be the meaning of that aphorism, which sounds somewhat darkly, ver. 22, "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth." Many a one alloweth himself in practice to do that which yet in his judgment and conscience he condemneth himself for; allows it for the sake of the pleasure, profit, or credit of it; allows it in conformity to the custom; and yet, whilst he doth it, and pleads for it, his own heart gives him the lie, and his conscience condemns him for it. Now, happy is the man who so orders his conversation as not in any action to expose himself to the challenges and reproaches of his own conscience; that doth not make his own heart his adversary, as he must needs do, who doth that which he is not clear he may lawfully do. He is happy that hath peace and quietness within; for the testimony of conscience will be a special cordial in troublesome times; though men condemn us, it is well enough if our own hearts condemn us not, 1 Jno. iii. 21.

4. Another rule here prescribed is, to those who are clear in these matters, and do know their Christian liberty, yet to take heed of using it so as to give offence to a weak brother. This is laid down, ver. 13, "Let us not judge one another any more;" let it suffice that you have hitherto continued in this uncharitable practice, and do so no more. The better to insinuate the exhortation, he puts himself in; "Let us not," as if he had said, It is what I have resolved against, therefore do you leave it. "But judge this rather;" instead of censuring the practice of others, let us look to the conduct of our own, "that no man put a stumblingblock, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way," πρόσκομμα ἢ σκάνδαλον. We must take heed of saying or doing any thing which may occasion our brother to stumble or fall; the one signifies a lesser, the other a greater degree of mischief and offence. That which may be an occasion, 1st. Of grief to our brother. One that is weak, and thinks it unlawful to eat such and such meats, will be greatly troubled to see thee eat them, out of a concern for the honour of the law which he thinks forbids them, and for the good of thy soul which he thinks is wronged by them; especially when thou dost it wilfully, and with a seeming presumption, and not with that tenderness, and that care to give satisfaction to thy weak brother, which would become thee. Christians should take heed of grieving one another, and of saddening the hearts of Christ's little ones: see Mat. xvii. 6, 10.

2nd. Of guilt to our brother. The former is a stumblingblock, that gives our brother a great shake, and is a hindrance and discouragement to him, but this is an occasion to fall. If thy weak brother, purely by thine example and influence, without any satisfaction received concerning his Christian liberty, be drawn to act against his conscience, and to walk contrary to the light he has, and so to contract guilt upon his soul, though the thing were lawful to thee, yet not being so to him, having not yet thereto attained, thou wast to be blamed for giving him the occasion. See this case explained, 1 Cor. viii. 8—11. To the same purpose, ver. 21, he recommends it to our care, not to give offence to any one by the use of lawful things. "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine;" these are things lawful indeed, and comfortable, but not necessary to the support of human life, and therefore we may and must deny ourselves in them, rather than give offence. "It is good," pleasing to God, profitable to our brother, and no harm to ourselves. Daniel and his fellows were in better liking with pulse and water than they were that ate the portion of the king's meat. It is a generous piece of self-denial, for which we have Paul's example, 1 Cor. viii. 13. "If meat make my brother to offend," he doth not say, I will eat no meat, that is to destroy himself, but, "I will eat no flesh," that is to deny himself, "while the world stands." This is to be extended to all such indifferent things, "whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended," is involved either in sin or trouble; "or is made weak," his graces weakened, his comforts weakened, his resolutions weakened; "is made weak," that is, takes occasion to shew his weakness, by his censures and scruples. We must not weaken those that are weak; that is to quench the smoking flax, and to break the bruised reed. Observe the motives to enforce this caution.

First. Consider the royal law of Christian love and charity which is hereby broken; ver. 15, "If thy brother be grieved with thy meat," that is, be troubled to see thee eat those things which the law of Moses did forbid, which yet thou mayest lawfully do, possibly thou art ready to say, Now he talks foolishly and weakly, and it is no great matter what he saith; we are apt, in such a case, to lay all the blame on that side. But the reproof here is given to the stronger and more knowing Christian, "Now walkest thou not charitably." Thus the apostle takes part with the weakest, and condemns the defect in love on the one side more than the defect in knowledge on the other side, agreeable to his principles elsewhere, that the way of love is the "more excellent way," 1 Cor. xii. 31; "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth," 1 Cor. viii. 1—3. "Now walkest thou not charitably." Charity to the souls of our brethren is the best charity. True love would make us tender of their peace and purity, and begot a regard to their consciences as well as to our own. Christ deals gently with those that have true grace, though they are weak in it.

Secondly. Consider the design of Christ's death. "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died," ver. 5. 1st. Drawing of a soul to sin threatens the destruction of that soul. By shaking his faith, provoking his passion, and tempting him to act against the light of his own conscience, thou dost as much as in thee lies destroy him, giving him an occasion to return to Judaism again. Μὴ ἀπολλύς. It notes an utter destruction. The beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water, we are not sure that it will stop anywhere on this side eternal destruction. 2nd. The consideration of the love of Christ in dying for souls should make us very tender of the happiness and salvation of souls, and careful not to do anything which may obstruct and hinder it. Did Christ quit a life for souls, such a life, and shall not we quit a morsel of meat for them? Shall we despise those whom Christ valued at so high a rate? Did he think it worth while to deny himself so much for them, as to die for them, and shall not we think it worth while to deny ourselves so little for them as abstaining from flesh comes to? "With thy meat." Thou pleadest that it is thy own meat, and thou mayest do what thou wilt with it; but remember that, though the meat is thine, the brother offended by it is Christ's, and a part of his purchase. While thou destroyest thy brother, thou art helping forward the devil's design, for he is the great destroyer; and, as much as in thee lies, thou art crossing the design of Christ, for he is the great Saviour; and dost not only offend thy brother, but offend Christ, for the work of salvation is that which his heart is upon. But are any destroyed for whom Christ died? If we understand it of the sufficiency and general intentment of Christ's death, which was to save all upon gospel terms, no doubt but multitudes are. If of the particular determination of the efficacy of his death to the elect, then, though none that were given to Christ shall perish, Jno. vi. 39, yet thou mayest, as much as is in thy power, destroy such. No thanks to thee if they be not; by doing that which hath a tendency to it, thou dost manifest a great opposition to Christ. Nay, and thou mayest utterly destroy, some, whose profession may be so justifiable, that good, and that good his edification, his growth and confirmation in the faith.

xv. 3. "Even Christ:" "How much less we; but on the contrary, so entirely forgot himself that he bore the very reproaches which were designed for another, even God" (Vaughan). The quotation is made to show that Christ did not seek to please himself, and that he ever had in mind the work which his Father gave him to do. Following this, the Christian will not think of self, nor yet of pleasing men, but steadily keep in mind the purpose of his brother's good. Thus the quotation touches the two points—self-denial, and self-denial for another's good, not our gain.

xv. 4. This justifies the application of the quotation in verse 3 and those which follow, in verses 9—12. "Patience and comfort of the Scriptures:" both "patience" and "comfort" may be connected with "Scripture." "Through patience of (i.e., arising from the study of) the Scriptures, and comfort of (i.e., communicated by) the Scripthou art bound to believe, in a judgment of charity, that Christ died for them. Compare this with 1 Cor. viii. 10, 11.

Thirdly. Consider the work of God; ver. 20, "For meat destroy not the work of God," that is, the work of grace, particularly the work of faith in thy brother's soul. The work of peace and comfort are destroyed by such an offence given; take heed of it therefore, do not undo that which God hath done; you should work together with God, do not countermining his work. 1st. The work of grace and peace is the work of God; it is wrought by him, it is wrought for him, it is a good work of his beginning, Phil. i. 6. Observe, the same for whom Christ died, ver. 15, are here called the work of God; besides the work that is wrought for us, there is a work to be wrought in us, in order to our salvation. Every saint is God's workmanship, his husbandry, his building, Eph. ii. 10; 1 Cor. iii. 9. 2nd. We must be very careful to do nothing which tends to the destruction of this work, either in ourselves or others. We must deny ourselves in our appetites, inclinations, and in the use of Christian liberty, rather than obstruct and prejudice our own or others' grace and peace. Many do for meat and drink destroy the work of God in themselves; nothing more destructive to the soul than pampering and pleasing the flesh, and fulfilling the lusts of it; so likewise in others, by wilful offence given. Think what thou destroyest,—the work of God, whose work is honourable and glorious; think for what thou destroyest it,—for meat, which was but for the belly, and the belly for it.

Fourthly. Consider the evil of giving offence, and what an abuse it is of our Christian liberty. He grants, that "all things indeed are pure;" we may lawfully eat flesh, even those meats which were prohibited by the ceremonial law, but if we abuse this liberty it turns into sin to us: "it is evil to him that eats with offence." Lawful things may be done unlawfully. "Eats with offence;" either carelessly or designedly giving offence to his brethren. It is observable, that the apostle directs his reproof most against those who gave the offence; not as if they were not to be blamed who causelessly or weakly took the offence from the ignorance of Christian liberty, and the want of that charity which is not easily provoked, and which thinketh no evil, (he doth several times tacitly reflect upon them,) but he directs his speech to the strong, because they were better able to bear the reproof, and to begin the reformation. For the farther pressing of this rule, we may here observe two directions which have relation to it.

1st. "Let not then your good be evil spoken of," ver. 16, that is, take heed of doing anything which may give occasion to others to speak evil, either of the Christian religion in general or of your Christian liberty in particular. The Gospel is your good; the liberties and franchises, the privileges and immunities granted by it are your good; your knowledge and strength of grace to discern and use your liberty in things disputed, is your good, a good which the weak brother hath not. Now, let not this be evil spoken of. It is true we cannot hinder loose and ungoverned tongues from speaking evil of us, and of the best things we have, but we must not, if we can help it, give them any occasion to do it. Let not the reproach arise from any default of ours; as, 1 Tim. iv. 12. "Let no man despise thee," that is, do not make thyself despicable, so here, Do not use your knowledge and strength in such a manner as to give occasion to people to call it presumption, and loose walking, and disobedience to God's law. We must deny ourselves in many cases for the preservation of our credit and reputation; forbearing to do that which we rightly know we may lawfully do, when our doing of it may be a prejudice to our good name; as, when it is suspicious, and hath the appearance of evil, or when it is become scandalous among good people, or hath any way a brand upon it. In such a case we must rather cross ourselves than shame ourselves. Though it be but a little folly, it may be like a dead fly, very prejudicial to one that is in reputation for wisdom and honour, Ecc. x. 1. We may apply it more generally. We should manage all our good duties in such a manner as that they may not be evil spoken of. That which for the matter of it is good and unexceptionable may sometimes, by a mismanagement, be rendered liable to a great deal of censure and reproach. Good praying, preaching, and discourse, many times for want of prudence in ordering the time, the expression, and other circumstances to edification, may be evil spoken of. It is indeed their sin that do speak evil of that which is good, for the sake of any such circumstantial errors, but it is our folly, if we give any occasion to do so. As we tender the reputation of the good we profess and practise, let us so order it as that it may not be evil spoken of.

2nd. "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God," ver. 22. It is not meant of justifying faith, that must not be hid, but manifested by our works, but of a knowledge and persuasion of our Christian liberty in things disputed. Hast thou clearness in such a particular? Art thou satisfied that thou mayest eat all meats, and observe all days, except the Lord's day, alike? "Have it to thyself," that is, enjoy the comfort of it in thy own bosom, and do not trouble others by the imprudent use of it, when it might give offence and cause thy weak brother to stumble and fall. In these indifferent things, though we must never contradict our persuasion, yet we may sometimes conceal it, when the avowing of it will do more hurt than good. "Have it to thyself;" a rule to thyself, not to be imposed upon others, or made a rule to them; or, a rejoicing to thyself. Clearness in doubtful matters contributes very much to our comfortable walking, as it frees us from those scruples, jealousies, and suspicions, which those who have not such clearness are entangled in endlessly. Compare Gal. vi. 4. "Let every man prove his own work," that is, bring it to the touchstone of the word, and try it by that so exactly, as to be well satisfied in what he doth, and "then he shall have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another." Paul had faith in these things, "I am persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself;" but he had it to himself, so as not to use his liberty to the offence of others. How happy were it for the church, if those that have a clearness in disputable things would be satisfied to have it to themselves before God, and not impose those things upon others, and make them terms of communion, than which nothing is more opposite to Christian liberty, nor more destructive both to the peace of churches and the peace of consciences! That healing method is never the less excellent for being common. In things necessary let there be unity, in things unnecessary let there be liberty, and in both let there be charity, then all will be well quickly. "Have it to thyself before God." The end of such knowledge is, that being satisfied in our liberty we may have a conscience void of offence towards God, and let that content us. That is the true comfort which we have before God. Those are right indeed that are so in God's sight.

5. There is one rule more laid down here, and it is general, "Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another," ver. 19. Here is the sum of our duty towards our brethren. 1st. We must study mutual peace. Many wish for peace, and talk loud for it, that do not follow the things that make for peace, but the contrary. Liberty in things indifferent, condescension to those that are weak and tender, zeal in the great things of God wherein we are all agreed, these are things that make for peace. Meekness, humility, self-denial, and love, are the springs of peace, the things that make for our peace. We are not always so happy as to obtain peace, there are so many that delight in war; but the God of peace will accept us if we follow after the things that make for peace, that is, if we do our endeavour. 2nd. We must study mutual edification. The former makes way for this. We cannot edify one another while we are quarrelling and contenting. There are many ways by which we may edify one another, if we did but seriously mind it; by good counsel, reproof, instruction, example, building up not only ourselves, but one another, in the most holy faith. We are God's building, God's temple, and have need to be edified, and therefore must study to promote the spiritual growth one of another. None so strong but they may be edified, none so weak but may edify, and while we edify others we benefit ourselves.

[We are not to imagine of this chapter, that the subject of it has now gone by. There are principles here of universal and abiding application—lessons of standing authority, the obligation and importance of which remain to this day; and though the casuistry of Jewish meats may seldom or never be in practical demand amongst us, yet is there a certain other casuistry, which gives rise, as before, to the distinction between weak and strong, and which still continues to exercise, and sometimes to perplex, the consciences of inquirers. In separating, as our great apostle did with inimitable skill, the clear from the doubtful, there is one obvious consideration which ought never to be forgotten. Each man is still his brother's keeper. We are all responsible to a certain extent for the Christianity of other men; and though there be many indulgences, which, viewed singly and in themselves, the light and liberty of the Gospel would allow, yet are we bound to abstain from them, if our example otherwise would inflict a moral injury upon any of our fellows. After several illustrations of this truth, Dr. Chalmers adds, 'There is another, and we think a most legitimate inference, to be drawn from this passage. It is, that Christians should either cease to differ, or, if this be impossible, that then they should agree to differ. We of course exclude such differences as, relating to what is vital and essential, imply that either one or other of the parties is not Christian, disowning, as they do, some weightier matters, whether of doctrine or of the law.—There are differences, on neither side of which has the Bible left any such express or authoritative deliverance as would lead us to pronounce of one or other of the parties, not only that they are in the wrong, but fatally in the wrong. We should rank among these differences many questions of meats, and days, and priestly vestments, and many points both of church order and church government; so that to recognise as Christians those of the Episcopalian, or Independent, or Methodist, or Baptist persuasions, we should hold not to be liberalism, but right and genuine liberality. Paul exemplified both these methods of dealing with controversies and disposing of them; bold, and resolute, and uncompromising in all that was essential; yielding and generous in all that was not so; and, however strong, and free from all scrupulosity himself, yet deferring with the utmost tenderness to the honest and conscientious scruples of other men. He thus acquitted himself of two most important services,—the one, as an intrepid soldier, the manly defender and guardian of the church's purity; the other, as a discreet and wary counsellor, who knew both how to judge charitably and to arbitrate wisely for the church's unity and peace. And, unless we follow this high example, we do not see how the blissful consummation of that unanimity in the Christian world, of which our Saviour speaks as the stepping-stone to a universal Christianity through the world at large, (Jno. xvii. 21, 23.) is ever to be arrived at. Surely, for the fulfilment of this sacred object, it were well that in the confessions of different churches, articles of faith, viewed as articles of distinction or separation, should not be unnecessarily multiplied; and we would farther submit, whether it is not a most unwarrantable hazarding of this high and precious interest, to speak of the exclusively Divine right of any form whatever of ecclesiastical government. It is thus that certain strenuous advocates, both of Presbytery on the one hand and of Episcopacy on the other, have been heard to affirm, that they will never consent to the loosening or letting down of a single pin in the tabernacle. This tenacity of theirs we should all the more readily understand, if the specific information of each and every pin were really to be had in Scripture; but, in the absence of this, we do think that there might be a great deal more of mutual toleration. It has been well said, that, while it is our duty to be wise up to that which is written, we should not attempt to be wise above or beyond it; and so too, while it is our duty to be inflexible up to that which is written, it is surely not our part to be inflexible beyond it. We feel confident that, with the use and right application of this principle, there is immense room for the abridgment of the church's controversies. Let us hope that the movement is upon the whole in this direction; and that, even amid the fits and fermentations of this busy period, the Christian world is now heaving towards this better state of things, when the war of opinions shall cease, and both truth and charity shall walk hand in hand. Heaven grant that this perspective of brighter and happier days may be speedily realized.—C.]

CHAPTER XV.

The apostle in this chapter continues the discourse of the former, concerning mutual forbearance in indifferent things, and so draws towards a conclusion of the epistle. Where such differences of apprehension, and consequently distances of affection, are among Christians, there is need of precept upon precept, line upon line, to allay the heat, and to beget a better temper. The apostle being desirous to drive the nail home, as it were in a sure place, follows his blow, unwilling to leave the subject till he had some hopes of prevailing; to which end he orders the cause before them, and fills his mouth with the most pressing arguments. We may observe in this chapter, I. His precepts to them. II. His prayers for them. III. His apology for writing to them. IV. His account of himself and his own affairs. V. His declaration of his purpose to come to see them. VI. His desire of a share in their prayers.

Then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. 2 Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification. 3 For even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me.

4 For whatsoever things were written aforetime were tures, we might have hope." This view is adopted by Olshausen and Alford. On the other hand, we may separate "patience," and understand the verse thus: "That we, through the exercise of the Christian grace of patience, and through the comfort derived from Scripture, might have hope."

xv. 6. "God, even the Father," &c.: Alford renders, "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." With this may be compared John xv. 17, and Eph. i. 17. Vaughan remarks that "it is more consistent with common Scripture usage to take it, "Him who is (1) God, and (2) Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

xv. 8. This verse introduces the reason for receiving each other. The Jewish and Gentile believers might be slow to receive each other; Christ, says the apostle, was the minister or servant of both. "Minister of the circumcision;" used of Christ only here. (Compare chap. ix. 5.) Alford thinks that it is used to humble the pride of the "strong," the Gentile Christian.

written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope.

The apostle here lays down two precepts, with reasons to enforce them, shewing the duty of the strong Christian to consider and condescend to the weakest.

First. We must "bear the infirmities of the weak," ver. 1. We all have our infirmities, but the weak are more subject to them than others; the weak in knowledge or grace, the bruised reed, and the smoking flax. We must consider these; not trample upon them, but encourage them, and bear with their infirmities. If through weakness they judge and censure us, and speak evil of us, we must bear with them, pity them, and not have our affections alienated from them. Alas! it is their weakness, they cannot help it. Thus Christ bore with his weak disciples, and excused for them. But there is more in it; we must also bear their infirmities, by sympathizing with them, concerning ourselves for them, ministering strength to them, as there is occasion. That is bearing one another's burthens.

Secondly. We must not please ourselves, but our neighbour, ver. 1, 2. We must deny our own humour in consideration of our brethren's weakness and infirmity. 1. Christians must not please themselves. We must not make it our business to gratify all the little appetites and desires of our own heart; it is good for us to cross ourselves sometimes, and then we shall the better bear others crossing of us. We shall be spoiled, as Atoniah was, if we be always humoured. The first lesson we have to learn is, to deny ourselves, Mat. xvi. 24. 2. Christians must please their brethren. The design of Christianity is to soften and meek the spirit, to teach us the art of obliging, and true complaisance; not to be servants to the lusts of any, but to the necessities and infirmities of our brethren; to comply with all that we have to do with, as far as we can with a good conscience. Christians should study to be pleasing. Not please ourselves in the use of our Christian liberty, which was allowed us not for our own pleasure, but for the glory of God, and the profit and edification of others. So we must please our neighbour. How amiable and comfortable a society would the church of Christ be, if Christians would study to please one another, as now we see them commonly industrious to cross, and thwart, and contradict one another! "Please his neighbour," not in everything, it is not an unlimited rule, "but for his good," especially for the good of his soul. Not please him by serving his wicked wills, and humouring him in a sinful way, or consenting to his enticements, or suffering sin upon him, this is a base way of pleasing our neighbour to the ruin of his soul,—if we thus please men we are not the servants of Christ,—but please him for his good, not for our own secular good, or to make a prey of him, but for his spiritual good. "To edification," that is, not only for his profit, but for the profit of others, to edify the body of Christ by studying to oblige one another. The closer the stones lie, and the better they are squared to fit one another, the stronger is the building. Now observe the reason why Christians must please one another: "For even Christ pleased not himself." The self-denial of our Lord Jesus is the best argument against the selfishness of Christians. Observe,

1. That "Christ pleased not himself." He did not consult his own worldly credit, ease, safety, or pleasure; he had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, would not be made a king, detested no proposal with greater abhorrence than that, "Master, spare thyself," did not seek his own will, Jno. v. 30, washed his disciples' feet, endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, troubled himself, Jno. xi. 33, did not consult his own honour, and, in a word, emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation; and all this for our sakes, to bring in a righteousness for us, and to set us an example. His whole life was a self-denying, self-displeasing life. He bore the infirmities of the weak, Heb. iv. 15.

2. That herein the Scripture was fulfilled. "As it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee, fell on me." This is quoted out of Ps. lxxix. 9, the former part of which verse is applied to Christ, Jno. ii. 17, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," and the latter part here; for David was a type of Christ, and his sufferings of Christ's sufferings. It is quoted to shew, that Christ was so far from pleasing himself, that he did in the highest degree displease himself. Not as if his undertaking, considered in the whole, were a task and grievance to him, for he was very willing to it, and very cheerful in it; but in his humiliation the content and satisfaction of natural inclination was altogether crossed and denied. He preferred our benefit before his own ease and pleasure. This the apostle chooseth to express in Scripture language; for how can the things of the Spirit of God be better spoken of than in the Spirit's own words? and that scripture he allegeth, "The reproaches of them that reproached thee, fell on me."

1st. The shame of those reproaches Christ underwent. Whatever dishonour was done to God was a trouble to the Lord Jesus. He was grieved for the hardness of people's hearts, beheld a sinful place with sorrow and tears. When the saints were persecuted, Christ so far displeased himself as to take what was done to them as done against himself. "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Christ also did himself endure the greatest indignities; there was much of reproach in his sufferings.

2nd. The sin of those reproaches Christ undertook to satisfy for; so many understand it. Every sin is a kind of reproach to God, especially presumptuous sins; now the guilt of these fell upon Christ, when he was made sin, that is, a sacrifice, a sin offering for us. When the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of us all, and he bore our sins in his own body upon the tree, they fell upon him as upon our surety: Upon me be the curse. This was the greatest piece of self-displacement that could be, considering his infinite spotless purity and holiness, the infinite love of the Father to him, and his eternal concern for his Father's glory; nothing could be more contrary to him, nor more against him, than to be made sin and a curse for us, and to have the reproaches of God fall upon him; especially, considering for whom he thus displeased himself, for strangers, enemies, and traitors: "the just for the unjust," 1 Pet. iii. 18. This seems to come in as a reason why we should "bear the infirmities of the weak." We must not please ourselves, for Christ pleased not himself; we must bear the infirmities of the weak, for Christ bore the reproaches of those that reproached God. He bore the guilt of sin, and the curse for it; we are only called to bear a little of the trouble of it. He bore the presumptuous sins of the wicked; we are called only to bear the infirmities of the weak. "Even Christ," καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστός. Even he who was infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself, who needed not us or our services; even he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, who had reason enough to please himself, and no reason to be concerned, much less to be crossed for us; even he pleased not himself, even he bore our sins. And should not we be humble and self-denying, and ready to consider one another, who are members one of another?

3rd. That therefore we must go and do likewise; "For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning." First. That which is written of Christ, concerning his self-denial and sufferings, is written for our learning; he hath left us an example. If Christ denied himself, surely we should deny ourselves from a principle of ingenuousness, and of gratitude, and especially of conformity to his image. The example of Christ in what he did and said is recorded for our imitation. Secondly. That which is written in the Scriptures of the Old Testament, in the general, is written for our learning. What David had said in his own person Paul had just now applied to Christ. Now, lest this should look like a straining of the Scripture, he gives us this excellent rule in general, that all the Scriptures of the Old Testament (much more those of the New) were written for our learning, and are not to be looked upon as of private interpretation. What happened to the Old Testament saints happened to them for ensamples; and the Scriptures of the Old Testament have many fulfillings. The Scriptures are left for a standing rule to us. They are written, that they might remain for our use and benefit. 1st. For our learning. There are many things to be learned out of the Scriptures; and that is the best learning that is drawn from those fountains. Those are the most learned, that are most mighty in the Scriptures. We must therefore labour not only to understand the literal meaning of the Scriptures, but to learn out of it that which will do us good; and have need of help, therefore, not only to roll away the stone, but to draw out the water; for in many places the well is deep. Practical observations are more necessary than critical expositions. 2nd. "That we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." That hope, which hath eternal life for its object, is here proposed as the end of Scripture learning. The Scripture was written that we might know what to hope for from God, and upon what grounds, and in what way. This should recommend the Scripture to us, that it is a special friend to Christian hope. Now the way of attaining this hope is "through patience and comfort of the Scriptures." Patience and comfort suppose trouble and sorrow. Such is the lot of the saints in this world, and were it not so we should have no occasion for patience and comfort; but both these befriend that hope which is the life of our souls. Patience works experience, and experience hope, that maketh not ashamed, ch. v. 3-5. The more patience we exercise under troubles the more hopefully we may look through our troubles; nothing more destructive to hope than impatience. And the comfort of the Scriptures, that is, that comfort which springs from the word of God, (that is the surest and sweetest comfort,) is likewise a great stay to hope, as it is an earnest in hand of the good hoped for. The Spirit, as a comforter, is the earnest of our inheritance.

5 Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be likeminded one toward another according to Christ Jesus: 6 That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle having delivered two exhortations, before he proceeds to more, intermixes here a prayer for the success of what he had said. Faithful ministers water their preaching with their prayers, because, whoever sows the seed, it is God that gives the increase. We can but speak to the ear, it is God's prerogative to speak to the heart. Observe,

First. The title he gives to God; "the God of patience and consolation." Who is both the author and the foundation of all the patience and consolation of the saints; from whom it springs, and on whom it is built. He gives the grace of patience, he confirms and keeps it up as the God of consolation; for the comforts of the Holy Ghost help to support believers, and to bear them up with courage and cheerfulness under all their afflictions. When he comes to beg the pouring out of a spirit of love and unity, he addresseth himself to God as "the God of patience and consolation;" that is, 1. As a God that bears with us, and comforts us; is not extreme to mark what we do amiss, but is ready to comfort them that are cast down; to teach us so to testify our love to our brethren, and by these means to preserve and maintain unity, by being patient one with another and comfortable one to another. Or, 2. As a God that gives us patience and comfort. He had spoken, ver. 4, of patience and comfort of the Scriptures; but here he looks up to God, as "the God of patience and consolation." It comes through the Scripture as the conduit-pipe, but from God as the fountain-head. The more patience and comfort we receive from God, the better disposed we are to love one another. Nothing breaks the peace more than an impatient, and peevish, and fretful melancholy temper.

Secondly. The mercy he begs of God; "Grant you to be likeminded one towards another, according to Jesus Christ." 1. The foundation of Christian love and peace is laid in likemindedness; a consent in judgment, as far as you have attained; or, however, a concord and agreement in affection. Τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν,—"to mind the same thing," all occasions of difference removed, and all quarrels laid aside. 2. This likemindedness must be "according to Christ Jesus;" according to the precept of Christ, the royal law of love, according to the pattern and example of Christ, which he had propounded to them for their imitation, ver. 3. Or, let Christ Jesus be the centre of their unity; agree in the truth, not in any error. It was a cursed concord and harmony of those who were of one mind to give their power and strength to the beast, Rev. xvii. 13; that was not a likemindedness according to Christ, but against Christ; like the Babel builders, who were one in their rebellion, Gen. xi. 6. The method of our prayer must be, first for truth, and then for peace; for such is the method of the wisdom that is from above, it is first pure, then peaceable. That is to be likeminded according to Christ Jesus. 3. Likemindedness among Christians according to Christ Jesus is the gift of God; and a precious gift it is, for which we must earnestly seek unto him. He is the Father of spirits, and fashioneth the hearts of men alike, Ps. xxxiii. 15; opens the understanding, softens the heart, sweetens the affections, and gives the grace of love, and the Spirit as a spirit of love to those that ask him. We are taught to pray, that the will of God may be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Now there it is done unanimously, among the angels, who are one in their praises and services; and our desire must be, that the saints on earth may be so too.

Thirdly. The end of his desire. That God may be glorified, ver. 6. This is his plea with God in prayer, and is likewise an argument with them to endeavour it. We should have the glory of God in our eye in every prayer; therefore our first petition, as the foundation of all the rest, must be, "Hallowed be thy name." Likemindedness among Christians, is in order to their glorifying of God. 1. "With one mind and one mouth." It is desirable, that Christians should agree in everything, that so they may agree in this, to praise God together. It tends very much to the glory of God, who is one, and his name one, when it is so. It will not suffice that there be one mouth, but there must be one mind; for God looks at the heart. Nay, there will hardly be one mouth where there is not one mind; and God will scarce be glorified where there is not a sweet conjunction of both. One mouth in confessing the truths of God, in praising the name of God; one mouth in common converse, not jarring, biting, and devouring one another; one mouth in the solemn assembly; one speaking, but all joining. 2. As "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." That is his New Testament style. God must be glorified as he has now revealed himself in the face of Jesus Christ; according to the rules of the Gospel, and with an eye to Christ, in whom he is our Father. The unity of Christians glorifies God as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" because it is a kind of counterpart or representation of the oneness that is between the Father and

xv. 9. "That the Gentiles might," &c.: the expression, "I say," may be repeated from verse 8 at the beginning of this, and we must translate ("I say") that the Gentiles glorified—i.e., on hearing and receiving the glad tidings.

xv. 14. At this verse commences the concluding portion of the epistle.

xv. 15. "The grace that is given to me of God:" "In virtue of my special commission to the Gentiles" (Vaughan).

xv. 16. The language throughout is strongly figurative. He represents himself as a sacrificing priest offering to God his sacrifice. The sacrifice consists of those who by his means believe in Christ. The sacrifice of the Christian is himself (chap. xii. 1) and those brought through him to offer themselves in like manner.

xv. 17. "I have therefore whereof," &c.: rather, "I have my glorying, an exultation of my own; but not in myself, in Christ Jesus." (Compare Phil. ii. 17.)

the Son. We are warranted so to speak of it, and with that in our eye to desire it, and pray for it, and from Jno. xvii. 21, "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee." A high expression of the honour and sweetness of the saints' unity; and it follows, "That the world may believe that thou hast sent me;" and so God may be glorified as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7 Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God. 8 Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers: 9 And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name. 10 And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people. 11 And again, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people. 12 And again, Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles trust.

The apostle here returns to his exhortation to Christians. What he says here, ver. 7, is to the same purpose with the former; but the repetition shews how much the apostle's heart was upon it. Receive one another into your affection, into your communion, and into your common conversation, as there is occasion. He had exhorted the strong to receive the weak, ch. xiv. 1; here "Receive ye one another," for sometimes the prejudices of the weak Christian make him shy of the strong, as much as the pride of the strong Christian makes him shy of the weak, neither of which ought to be. Let there be a mutual embracing among Christians. Those that have received Christ by faith must receive all Christians by brotherly love; though poor in the world, though persecuted and despised, though it may be matter of reproach and danger to you to receive them, though in the less weighty matters of the law they are of different apprehensions, though they may have been occasion for private piques, yet, laying aside these and the like considerations, "receive ye one another." Now the reason why Christians must receive one another is taken, as before, from the condescending love of Christ to us; "as Christ also received us to the glory of God." Can there be a more cogent argument? Hath Christ been so kind to us, and shall we be unkind to those that are his? Was he so forward to entertain us, and shall we be backward to entertain our brethren? Christ has received us into the nearest and dearest relations to himself; hath received us into his fold, into his family, into the adoption of sons, into a covenant of friendship, yea, into a marriage covenant with himself; hath received us, though we were strangers and enemies, and had played the prodigal, into fellowship and communion with himself. Those words, "to the glory of God," may refer both to Christ's receiving us, which is our pattern, and to our receiving one another, which is our practice according to that pattern.

First, Christ hath received us to the glory of God. The end of our reception by Christ is, that we might glorify God in this world, and be glorified with him in that to come. It was the glory of God, and our glory in the enjoyment of God, that Christ had in his eye when he condescended to receive us. We are called to an eternal glory by Christ Jesus, Jno. xvii. 24. See to what he received us,—to a happiness transcending all comprehension; see for what he received us,—for his Father's glory: he had that in his eye in all the instances of his favour to us.

Secondly, We must receive one another to the glory of God. That must be our great end in all our actions, that God may be glorified; and nothing doth more conduce to that than the mutual love and kindness of those that profess religion: compare ver. 6, "That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God." That which was a bone of contention among them was a different apprehension about meats and drinks, which took rise in distinction between Jews and Gentiles. Now, to prevent and make up this difference, he shews how Jesus Christ hath received both Jews and Gentiles; in him they are both one, "one new man," Eph. ii. 14–16. Now it is a rule, Quæ conveniunt in aliquo tertio inter se conveniunt,—"Things which agree with a third thing agree with one another." Those that agree in Christ, who is the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, and the great centre of unity, may well afford to agree among themselves. This coalescence of the Jews and Gentiles in Christ and Christianity, was a thing that filled and affected Paul so much, that he could not mention it without some enlargement and illustration.

1. He received the Jews, ver. 8. Let not any think hardly or scornfully therefore of those that were originally Jews, and still through weakness retain some savour of their old Judaism; for,

1st. Jesus Christ was "a minister of the circumcision." That he was a minister, διάκονος, "a servant," speaks his great and exemplary condescension, and puts an honour upon the ministry; but that he was a minister of the circumcision, was himself circumcised, and made under the law, and did in his own person preach the Gospel to the Jews, who were of the circumcision,—this makes the nation of the Jews more considerable than otherwise they appear to be. Christ conversed with the Jews, blessed them, looked upon himself as primarily sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, laid hold of the seed of Abraham, (Heb. ii. 16, margin,) and by them, as it were, caught at the whole body of mankind. Christ's personal ministry was appropriated to them, though the apostles had their commission enlarged.

2nd. He was so for "the truth of God." That which he preached to them was the truth, for he came into the world to bear witness to the truth, Jno. xviii. 37; and he is himself the truth, Jno. xiv. 6. Or, for "the truth of God," that is, to make good the promises given to the patriarchs, concerning the special mercy God had in store for their seed. It was not for the merit of the Jews, but for "the truth of God," that they were thus distinguished, that God might approve himself true to this word which he had spoken; "To confirm the promises made unto the fathers." The best confirmation of promises is the performance of them. It was promised that in the seed of Abraham all the nations of the earth should be blessed; that Shiloh should come from between the feet of Judah; that out of Israel should proceed he that should have the dominion; that out of Zion should go forth the law; and many the like. There were many intermediate providences which seemed to weaken those promises, providences which threatened the fatal decay of that people. But when Messiah the prince appeared in the fulness of time, as "a minister of the circumcision," all these promises were confirmed, and the truth of them was made to appear; for in Christ all the promises of God, both those of the Old Testament and those of the New, are Yea, and in him Amen. Understanding by "the promises made unto the fathers," the whole covenant of grace, darkly administered under the Old Testament, and brought to a clearer light now under the Gospel, it was Christ's great errand to confirm that covenant, Dan. ix. 27. He confirmed it by shedding the blood of the covenant.

2. He received the Gentiles likewise. This he shews, ver. 9–12. 1st. Observe Christ's favour to the Gentiles, in taking them in to praise God, the work of the church on earth, and the wages of that in heaven. One design of Christ was, that the Gentiles likewise might be converted that they might be one with the Jews in Christ's mystical body,—a good reason why they should not think the worse of any Christian for his having been formerly a Gentile, for Christ hath received him. He invites the Gentiles, and welcomes them. Now observe how their conversion is here expressed, "That the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy," a periphrasis of conversion. First. They shall have matter for praise, even the mercy of God. Considering the miserable and deplorable condition that the Gentile world was in, the receiving of them appears more an act of mercy than the receiving of the Jews. They that were Lo-ammi, "not a people," were Lo-ruhamah, "not obtaining mercy," Hos. i. 6, 9; ii. 23. The greatest mercy of God to any people is the receiving of them into covenant with himself; and it is good to take notice of God's mercy in receiving us. Secondly. They shall have a heart for praise; they shall "glorify God for his mercy." Unconverted sinners do nothing to glorify God; but converting grace works in the soul a disposition to speak and do all to the glory of God. God intended to reap a harvest of glory from the Gentiles, who had been so long turning his glory into shame.

2nd. The fulfilling of the Scriptures in this. The favour of God to the Gentiles was not only mercy, but truth; though there were not promises directly given to them, as to the fathers of the Jews, yet there were many prophecies concerning them, which related to the calling of them, and the embodying of them in the church. Some of which he mentions, because it was a thing that the Jews were hardly persuaded to believe. Thus, by referring them to the Old Testament, he labours to qualify their dislike of the Gentiles, and so to reconcile the parties at variance. First. It was foretold that the Gentiles should have the Gospel preached to them. "I will confess to thee among the Gentiles," ver. 9; that is, thy name shall be known, and owned in the Gentile world; there shall Gospel grace and love be celebrated. This is quoted from Ps. xviii. 49, "I will give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen." A thankful explication, and commemoration of the name of God, is an excellent means of drawing others to know and praise God. Christ in and by his apostles and ministers, whom he sent to disciple all nations, did confess to God among the Gentiles. The exaltation of Christ, as well as the conversion of sinners, is set forth by the praise of God; Christ's declaring God's name to his brethren is called his praising of God in the midst of the congregation, Ps. xxii. 22. Taking these words as spoken by David, they were spoken when he was old and dying, and he was not likely to confess to God among the Gentiles. But when David's psalms are read and sung among the Gentiles, to the praise and glory of God, it may be said, that David is confessing to God among the Gentiles, and singing to his name. He that was the sweet psalmist of Israel is now the sweet psalmist of the Gentiles. Converting grace makes people greatly in love with David's psalms; taking them as spoken by Christ the Son of David, it may be understood of his spiritual indwelling by faith in the hearts of all the praising saints. If any confess to God among the Gentiles, and sing to his name, it is not they, but Christ and his grace in them. "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me;" so, I praise, yet not I, but Christ in me. Secondly. That the Gentiles should rejoice with his people, ver. 10. This is quoted from that song of Moses, Deu. xxxii. 43. Observe, That those who were incorporated among his people are said to rejoice with his people. No greater joy can come to any people than the coming of the Gospel among them in power. Those Jews that retain a prejudice against the Gentiles will by no means admit them to any of their joyful festivities; for, say they, a stranger intermeddled not with the joy, Pr. xiv. 10. But, the partition wall being taken down, the Gentiles are welcome to rejoice with his people. Being brought into the church they share in its sufferings, are companions in patience and tribulation; to recompense which they share in the joy. Thirdly. That they should praise God; ver. 11, "Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles." This is quoted out of that short psalm, Ps. exxii. 1. Converting grace sets people praising God, furnisheth with the richest matter for praise, and gives a heart to it. The Gentiles had been for many ages praising their idols of wood and stone, but now they are brought to praise the Lord; and this, David in spirit speaks of. In calling upon all the nations to praise the Lord, it is intimated, that they shall have the knowledge of him. Fourthly. That they should believe in Christ, ver. 12, quoted from Isa. xi. 10; where observe, 1st. The revelation of Christ as the Gentiles' king. He is here called the "Root of Jesse;" that is such a branch from the family of David as is the very life and strength of the family: compare Isa. xi. 1. Christ was David's Lord, and yet vithal he was the Son of David, Mat. xxii. 45, for he was the "root and offspring of David," Rev. xxii. 16. Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring. "And he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles." This explains the figurative expression of the prophet, "he shall stand for an ensign of the people." When Christ rose from the dead, when he ascended on high, it was to reign over the Gentiles. 2nd. The recourse of the Gentiles to him; "In him shall the Gentiles trust." Faith is the soul's confidence in Christ, and dependence on him. The prophet hath it, "To him shall the Gentiles seek." The method of faith is, first to seek unto Christ, as to one proposed to us for a Saviour; and, finding him able and willing to save, then to trust in him: they that know him will trust in him. Or, this seeking to him is the effect of a trust in him; seeking him by prayer, and pursuant endeavours. We shall never seek to Christ till we trust in him. Trust is the mother, diligence in the use of means the daughter. Jews and Gentiles being thus united in Christ's love, why should they not be united in one another's love?

13 Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

Here is another prayer directed to God, as the God of hope; and it is, as the former, ver. 5, 6, for spiritual blessings. Those are the best blessings, and to be first and chiefly prayed for.

First. Observe how he addresseth himself to God, as "the God of hope." It is good in prayer to fasten upon those names, titles, and attributes of God, which are most suitable to the errand we come upon, and will best serve to encourage our faith concerning it; every word in the prayer should be a plea. Thus should the cause be skilfully ordered, and the mouth filled with arguments. God is "the God of hope." He is the foundation on which our hope is built, and he is the builder that doth himself raise it; he is both the object of our hope and the author of it. That hope is but fancy, and will deceive us, xv. 19. "Round about unto Illyricum:" "round about" is to be united with Jerusalem; Jerusalem and the neighbourhood, the eastern limit of St. Paul's preaching; Illyricum the western limit. There is no record of his having preached in Illyricum, though Acts xx. 1, 2 makes a visit there possible; but the language here does not necessarily imply that he actually preached in Illyricum, but that he went preaching as far as, i.e., up to the borders of Illyricum.

xv. 22. "For which cause:" i.e., through my exertions in preaching the Gospel. "Hindered;" the word may suggest the idea of an enemy impeding by trench or barricade the advance of an army.

xv. 23. "In these parts:" "having no more occupation here." The word rendered "parts" is that from which our word "clime" is derived. It occurs only in three of St. Paul's epistles—here, 2 Cor. xi. 10, Gal. i. 21.

xv. 24. "Spain:" this proposed visit was not accomplished before which is not fastened upon God as the goodness hoped for, and the truth hoped in, and which is not of his working in us. We have both together. Ps. cxix. 49. "Thy word," (there is God the object,) "on which thou hast caused me to hope;" there is God the author of our hope, 1 Pet. i. 4.

Secondly. What he asketh of God; not for himself, but for them.

1. That they might be filled "with all joy and peace in believing." Joy and peace are two of those things in which the kingdom of God consists, ch. xiv. 17. Joy in God, peace of conscience, both arising from a sense of our justification: see ch. v. 1, 2. Joy and peace in our own bosoms would promote a cheerful unity and unanimity with our brethren. Observe, 1st. How desirable this joy and peace is; it is filling. Carnal joy puts up the soul, but cannot fill it; therefore in laughter the heart is sad. True, heavenly, spiritual joy is filling to the soul; it hath a satisfaction in it answerable to the soul's vast and just desires. Thus doth God satiate and replenish the weary soul. Nothing more than this joy, only more of it, even the perfection of it in glory, is the desire of the soul that hath it, Ps. iv. 6, 7; xxxvi. 8; lxxiii. 5; lxxv. 4. 2nd. How it is attainable. First. By prayer. We must go to God for it; he will for this be inquired of. Prayer fetcheth in spiritual joy and peace. Secondly. By believing. That is the means to be used. It is vain, and flashy, and transient joy, that is the product of fancy; true, substantial joy is the fruit of faith. "Believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable," 1 Pet. i. 8. It is owing to the weakness of our faith that we are so much wanting in joy and peace. Only believe; believe the goodness of Christ, the love of Christ, the promises of the covenant, and the joys and glories of heaven; let faith be the substance and evidence of these things, and the result must needs be joy and peace. Observe, it is "all joy and peace;" all sorts of true joy and peace. When we come to God by prayer, we must enlarge our desires; we are not straitened in him, why should we be straitened in ourselves? Ask for all joy; open thy mouth wide and he will fill it.

2. That they might "abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost;" the joy and peace of believers ariseth chiefly from their hopes. What is laid out upon them is but little, compared with what is laid up for them; therefore, the more hope they have, the more joy and peace they have. We do then abound in hope when we hope for great things from God, and are greatly established and confirmed in these hopes. Christians should desire and labour after an abundance of hope, such a hope as will not make ashamed. This is "through the power of the Holy Ghost;" the same almighty power that works grace begets and strengthens this hope. Our own power will never reach it; and, therefore, where this hope is, and is abounding, the blessed Spirit must have all the glory.

14 And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another. 15 Nevertheless, brethren, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God, 16 That I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

Here, First. He commends these Christians with the highest characters that could be. He began his epistle with their praises, ch. i. 5. "Your faith is spoken of throughout the world," thereby to make way for his discourse; and now he concludes with the like commendation, because sometimes he had reproved them sharply, to qualify them, and to part friends. This he doth like an orator; it was not a piece of idle flattery and compliment, but a due acknowledgment of their worth, and of the grace of God in them. We must be forward to observe and commend that in others which is excellent and praiseworthy; it is part of the present recompence of virtue and usefulness, and will be of use to quicken others to a holy emulation. It was a great credit to the Romans to be commended by Paul, a man of so great judgment and integrity, too skilful to be deceived, and too honest to flatter. Paul had no personal acquaintance with these Christians, and yet he saith he was persuaded of their excellences, though he knew it only by hearsay. As we must not on the one hand be so simple as to believe every word, so on the other hand, we must not be so wilful as to believe nothing, but especially we must be forward to believe good concerning others; in that case charity hopeth all things, and believeth all things, and (if the probabilities be any thing strong, as here they were,) is persuaded. It is safer to err on that hand.

[From this verse we may learn, 1. That when it is our duty to give instruction, admonition, or advice, it should be in a kind, conciliating manner; not with harshness, or with the severity of authority. Even an apostle did not assume harshness or severity in his instructions. 2. There is no impropriety in speaking of the good qualities of Christians in their presence; or even of commending and praising them when they deserve it. The apostle Paul was as far as possible from always dwelling on the faults of Christians. When it was necessary to reprove them, he did it, but did it with tenderness and tears. When he could commend, he preferred it; and never hesitated to give them credit to the utmost extent to which it could be rendered. He did not flatter, but he told the truth; he did not commend to excite pride and vanity, but to encourage and to prompt to still more active efforts. The minister who always censures and condemns, whose ministry is made up of complaints and lamentations, who never speaks of Christians but in a strain of fault-finding, is unlike the example of the Saviour and of Paul, and may expect little success in his work. Compare ch. i. 8; ver. 19; 1 Cor. i. 5; 2 Cor. viii. 7; ix. 2; Phil. i. 3-7; Heb. vi. 9; 2 Pet. i. 12-18.]

Now observe what it was that he commended them for. 1. That they were "full of goodness;" therefore, the more likely to take in good part what he had written, and to account it a kindness, and not only so, but to comply with it, and to put it in practice; especially that which relates to their union, and to the healing of their differences. A good understanding of one another, and a good will to one another, would soon put an end to strife. 2. "Filled with all knowledge;" goodness and knowledge together! A very rare and an excellent conjunction; the head and the heart of the new man. All knowledge, all necessary knowledge, all the knowledge of those things which belong to their everlasting peace. 3. "Able to admonish one another;" to this there is a farther gift requisite, even the gift of utterance. Those that have goodness and knowledge should communicate what they have for the use and benefit of others; as if he had said, You that excel so much in good gifts may think you have no need of any instructions of mine. It is a comfort to faithful ministers to see their work superseded by the gifts and graces of their people. How gladly would ministers leave off their admonishing work, if people were able and willing to admonish one another! Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets. But that which is everybody's work is nobody's work; and, therefore,

Secondly. He clears himself from the suspicion of intermeddling needlessly with that which did not belong to him, ver. 15. Observe how lovingly he speaks to them: "My brethren," ver. 14; and again, "Brethren," ver. 15. He had himself, and taught others, the art of obliging; he calls them all his brethren, to teach them brotherly love one to another. Probably he wrote the more courteously to them, because, being Roman citizens, living near the court, they were more genteel, and made a better figure; and therefore, Paul, who became all things to all men, was willing by the respectfulness of his style to please them in their good. He acknowledgeth he had written "boldly in some sort;" τολμωροτέρως ἀπὸ μένους, in a manner that looked like boldness and presumption, and for which some might perhaps charge him with taking too much upon him. But then consider.

1. He did it only as their remembrancer; "as putting you in mind." Such humble thoughts had Paul of himself, though he excelled in knowledge, that he would not pretend to tell them that which they did not know before; but only to mind them of that in which they had formerly been by others instructed: so Peter, 2 Pet. i. 12; iii. 1. People commonly excuse themselves from the hearing of the word, that the minister can tell them nothing but what they knew before. If it be so, yet have they not need to know it better, and to be put in mind of it?

2. He did it as the apostle of the Gentiles; it was in pursuance of his office. "Because of the grace" (that is, the apostleship, ch. i. 13.) "given to me of God;" namely, to "be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles," ver. 16. Paul reckoned it a great favour and an honour that God had put upon him, in putting him into that office, ch. i. 13. Now, because of this grace given to him, he thus laid out himself among the Gentiles, that he might not receive that grace of God in vain. Christ received that he might give, so did Paul; so have we talents which must not be buried. Places and offices must be filled up with duty; it is good for ministers to be often remembering the grace that is given them of God. Minister verbi es, hoc age.—You are a minister of the word, give yourself wholly to it, was Mr. Perkins' motto. Paul was a minister. Observe here, 1st. Whose minister he was; "the minister of Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. iv. 1. He is our Master; his we are, and him we serve. 2nd. To whom; to the Gentiles. So God had appointed him, Acts xxii. 21; so Peter, and he had agreed, Gal. ii. 7-9. These Romans were Gentiles; Now, saith he, I do not thrust myself upon you, or seek any lordship over you; I am appointed to it. If you think I am rude and bold, my commission is my warrant, and must bear me out. 3rd. What he ministered; "the Gospel of God," εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ, "ministering as about holy things," so the word signifies, executing the office of a Christian priest, more spiritual, and therefore more excellent than the Levitical priesthood. 4th. For what end; "That the offering up" (or sacrificing) "of the Gentiles might be acceptable;" that is, that God may have the glory which would redound to his name by the conversion of the Gentiles. Paul laid out himself thus to bring about something that might be acceptable to God. Observe how the conversion of the Gentiles is expressed; it is the "offering up of the Gentiles," it is προσφορά τῶν ἐθνῶν, "the oblation of the Gentiles." In which the Gentiles are looked upon either, First. As the priests offering the oblation of prayer and praise, and other acts of religion. Long had the Jews been the holy nation, the kingdom of priests; but now the Gentiles are become priests unto God, Rev. v. 10; by their conversion to the Christian faith consecrated to the service of God, that the Scripture might be fulfilled; Mal. i. 11. "In every place incense shall be offered, and a pure offering." The converted Gentiles are said to be "made nigh," Eph. ii. 13; the periphrasis of priests. Or, Secondly. The Gentiles are themselves the sacrifice offered up to God, by Paul, in the name of Christ; a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, ch. xii. 1. A sanctified soul is offered up to God, in the flames of love, upon Christ the altar. Paul gathered in souls by his preaching, not to keep them to himself, but to offer them up to God. "Behold I, and the children that God hath given me." And it is an acceptable offering; "being sanctified by the Holy Ghost." Paul preached to them, and dealt with them, but that which made them sacrifices to God was their sanctification; and that was not his work, but the work of the Holy Ghost. None are acceptably offered to God, but those that are sanctified; unholy things can never be pleasing to the holy God.

In this beautiful passage we see the nature of the only priesthood which belongs to the Christian ministry. It is not their office to make atonement for sin, or to offer a propitiatory sacrifice to God, but by the preaching of the Gospel to bring men, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, to offer themselves as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God.—H.]

17 I have therefore whereof I may glory through Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God. 18 For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, 19 Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ. 20 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation: 21 But as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand.

The apostle here gives some account of himself and of his own affairs. Having mentioned his ministry and apostleship, he goes on farther to magnify his office in the efficacy of it; and to mention to the glory of God the great success of his ministry, and the wonderful things that God hath done by him; for encouragement to the Christian church at Rome, that they were not alone in the profession of Christianity, but, though compared with the multitude of their idolatrous neighbours, they were but a little flock, yet up and down the

St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome. It is possible that it may have been made in the interval between his first and second imprisonment. "I will come to you:" these words are not found in the best MSS. "To be brought on my way;" "to be started on my way." A graphic account of such a scene is given in Acts xxi. 5. "Filled with;" satisfied with. This being satisfied with their company could only be "somewhat," i.e., in some degree. He did not anticipate that he would be able to stay with them as long as he would wish.

Vaughan notes this as "one of St. Paul's delicate touches of tenderness, implying that his stay with them, so far from wearying him, would but partially satisfy his longing after them."

xv. 25. "I go unto Jerusalem:" this is the journey mentioned in Acts xx. 3, 16, xxi. 15. The purpose of the journey is alluded to in Acts xxiv. 17. The liberality of the Macedonian Christians is spoken of in 2 Cor. viii. 1-4. (Compare 1 Cor. xvi. 1-4.)

xv. 26. "The poor saints:" "the poor among the saints."

country there were many that were their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It was likewise a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian doctrine, that it had such strange success, and was so far propagated by such weak and unlikely means; such multitudes captivated to the obedience of Christ by the foolishness of preaching. Therefore Paul gives them this account; which he makes the matter of his glorying, not vain glory, but holy, gracious glorying, which appears by the limitations; it is "through Christ Jesus." Thus doth he centre all his glorying in Christ; he teacheth us to do so, 1 Cor. i. 31. "Not unto us," Ps. cxv. 5; and it is "in those things which pertain to God." The conversion of souls is one of those things that pertain to God, and therefore is the matter of Paul's glorying, not the things of the flesh. "Whereof I may glory," ἐξ οὗ δύναμαι καυχέσθαι ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ πρὸς Θεόν. I would rather read it thus, "Therefore I have a rejoicing in Christ Jesus;" (it is the same word that is used 2 Cor. i. 12; Phil. iii. 3, where it is the character of the circumcision that they rejoice, καυχόμενοι, in Christ Jesus,) "concerning things of God;" or those things that are offered to God, namely, the living sacrifices of the Gentiles, ver. 16. Paul would have them to rejoice with him in the extent and efficacy of his ministry; of which he speaks not only with the greatest deference possible to the power of Christ, and the effectual working of the Spirit as all in all, but with a protestation of the truth of what he said; ver. 18, "I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me." He would not boast of things without his line, nor take the praise of another man's work, as he might have done when he was writing to distant strangers, who perhaps could not contradict him; but, saith he, I dare not do it. A faithful man dares not lie, however he be tempted; dares be true, however he be terrified. Now in this account of himself, we may observe,

First. His unwearied diligence and industry in his work. He was one that "laboured more abundantly than they all."

1. He preached in many places; "From Jerusalem," whence the law went forth as a lamp that shineth, and "round about unto Illyricum," many hundred miles distant from Jerusalem. We have in the book of the Acts an account of Paul's travels. There we find him, after he was sent forth to preach to the Gentiles, Acts xiii., labouring in that blessed work in Seleucia, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia, ch. xiii. 14. Afterwards travelling through Syria and Cilicia, Phrygia, Galatia, Mysia, Troas; and thence called over to Macedonia, and so into Europe, ch. xv. 16. Then we find him very busy at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and the parts adjacent. And those that know the extent and distance of these countries, will conclude Paul an active man, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race. Illyricum is the country now called Slavonia, bordering upon Hungary; some take it for the same with Bulgaria, others for the Lower Pannonia; however, it was a great way from Jerusalem. Now, it might be suspected, that if Paul undertook so much work, surely he did it by the halves. No, saith he, "I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ;" gave them a full account of the truth and terms of the Gospel; shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God, Acts xx. 27; kept back nothing that was necessary for them to know. "Filled the Gospel," so the word is, πεπληρωμένοι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον; filled it as the net is filled with fishes in a large draught; or filled the Gospel, that is, filled them with the Gospel. Such a change doth the Gospel make, that when it comes in power to any place it fills the place. Other knowledge is airy, and leaves souls empty, but the knowledge of the Gospel is filling.

2. He preached in places that had not heard the Gospel before, ver. 20, 21. He broke up fallow ground, laid the first stone in many places, and introduced Christianity there, where nothing had reigned for many ages but idolatry and witchcraft, and all sorts of diabolism. Paul broke the ice, and therefore must needs meet with the more difficulties and discouragements in his work. Those that preached in Judea, had upon this account a much easier task than Paul, who was the apostle of the Gentiles; for they entered into the labours of others, Jno. iv. 38. Paul, being a hardy man, was called out to the hardest work; there were many instructors, but Paul was the great father: many that watered, but Paul was the great planter. Well, he was a bold man that made the first attack upon the palace of the strong man armed in the Gentile world; that first assaulted Satan's interest there, and Paul was that man who ventured the first onset in many places, and suffered greatly for it. He mentions this as a proof of his apostleship; for the office of the apostles was especially to bring in those that were without, and to lay the foundations of the new Jerusalem: see Rev. xxi. 14. Not but that Paul preached in many places where others had been at work before him; but he principally and mainly laid himself out for the good of those that sat in darkness. He was in care not to build upon another man's foundation, lest he should thereby disprove his apostleship, and give occasion to those who sought occasion to reflect upon him. He quotes a scripture for this out of Isa. lii. 15, "To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see." "That which had not been told them, shall they see;" so the prophet hath it, much to the same purpose. This made the success of Paul's preaching the more remarkable. The transition from darkness to light is more sensible than the after-growth and increase of that light; and, commonly, the greatest success of the Gospel is at its first coming to a place; afterwards people become sermon-proof.

Secondly. The great and wonderful success that he had in this work. It was effectual "to make the Gentiles obedient." The design of the Gospel is to bring people to be obedient; it is not only a truth to be believed, but a law to be obeyed. This Paul aimed at in all his travels, not his own wealth and honour,—if he had, he had sadly missed his aim,—but the conversion and salvation of souls. That his heart was upon, and for that he travailed in birth again. Now how was this great work wrought?

1. Christ was the principal agent. He doth not say, Which I worked, but, Which Christ "wrought by me," ver. 18. Whatever good we do, it is not we, but Christ by us that doth it; the work is his, the strength is his; he is all in all, he worketh all our works, Phil. ii. 13; Isa. xxvi. 12. Paul takes all occasions to own this, that the whole praise might be transmitted to Christ.

2. Paul was a very active instrument. "By word and deed," that is, by his preaching, and by the miracles he wrought to confirm his doctrine, or his preaching and his living. Those ministers are likely to win souls that preach both by word and deed, by their conversation shewing forth the power of the truths they preach. This is according to Christ's example, who began both to do and teach, Acts i. 11. "Through mighty signs and wonders;" ἐν δυνάμει σημείων, by the power or in the strength of signs and wonders. These made the preaching of the word so effectual, being the appointed means of conviction, and the Divine seal affixed to the Gospel charter, Mar. xvi. 17, 18.

3. "The power of the Spirit of God" made this effectual, and crowned all with the desired success, ver. 19. 1st. The power of the Spirit in Paul, as in other the apostles, for the working of those miracles. Miracles were wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, Acts i. 8; therefore reproaching the miracles is called the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Or, 2nd. The power of the Spirit in the hearts of those to whom the word was preached, and who saw the miracles, making these means effectual to some and not to others. It is the Spirit's operation that makes the difference. Paul himself, as great a preacher as he was, with all his mighty signs and wonders, could not make one soul obedient farther than the power of the Spirit of God accompanied his labours. It was the Spirit of the Lord of hosts that made those great mountains plain before this Zerubbabel. This is an encouragement to faithful ministers, who labour under the sense of great weakness and infirmity, that it is all one to the blessed Spirit to work by many or by those that have no power. The same Almighty Spirit that wrought with Paul often perfecteth strength in weakness, and ordains praise out of the mouth of babes and sucklings. This success which he had in preaching is that which he here rejoiceth in; for the converted nations were his joy and crown of rejoicing; and he tells them of it, not only that they might rejoice with him, but that they might be the more ready to receive the truths which he had written to them, and to own him whom Christ had thus signally owned.

22 For which cause also I have been much hindered from coming to you. 23 But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you; 24 Whosoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled with your company. 25 But now I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. 26 For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. 27 It hath pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things. 28 When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by you into Spain. 29 And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

St. Paul here declares his purpose to come and see the Christians at Rome and upon this head his matter is but common and ordinary, appointing a visit to his friends; but the manner of his expression is gracious and savoury, and very instructive, and for our imitation. We should learn by it to speak of our common affairs in the language of Canaan; even our common discourse should have an air of grace: by that it will appear what country we belong to. It should seem that Paul's company was very much desired at Rome. He was a man that had as many friends and as many enemies as most men ever had; he passed through evil report and good report. No doubt they had heard much of him at Rome, and longed to see him. Should the apostle of the Gentiles be a stranger at Rome, the metropolis of the Gentile world? Why, as to this he excuseth it that he had not come yet; he promiseth to come shortly, and gives a good reason why he should not come now.

First. He excuseth it that he never came yet. Observe how careful Paul was to keep in with his friends, and to prevent and anticipate any exceptions against him; not as one that lorded it over God's heritage.

1. He assures them that he had a great desire to see them,—not to see Rome, though it was now in its greatest pomp and splendour, nor to see the emperor's court, nor to converse with the philosophers and learned men that were then

xv. 28. "Sealed to them:" secured to them this fruit—i.e., the fruit of the love and faith of the Gentiles.

xv. 29. "Of the Gospel:" these words are omitted by the best MSS.

xvi. 1. "Phebe" (Phœbe): described as a sister and also a servant; literally, a deaconess. The term is not necessarily an official one, but it seems to be probable that St. Paul uses the word in an official sense in 1 Tim. iii. 11. Phebe is here called not a servant of Christ, but of a particular church. This at least suggests a recognised position of usefulness at Cenchrea. The name is properly Kenchra; it was the port of Corinth, and, situated on the Saronic Gulf of the Ægean, received the Eastern traffic.

xvi. 2. "Succourer;" protectress, champion. The term "would seem to indicate one who had stood forth as the patroness of the unprotected and despised." "Of myself also:" the circumstances to which the apostle alludes are not known.

at Rome, though such conversation must needs be very desirable to so great a scholar as Paul was,—but “to come unto you,” ver. 23, a company of poor despised saints in Rome, hated of the world, but loving God and beloved of him. These were the men that Paul was ambitious of an acquaintance with at Rome; they were the excellent ones in whom he delighted, Ps. xvi. 3. And he had a special desire to see them, because of the great character they had in all the churches for faith and holiness; they were men that excelled in virtue, and therefore Paul was so desirous to come to them. This desire Paul had for “many years,” and yet could never compass it. The providence of God wisely overrules the purposes and desires of men. God’s dearest servants are not always gratified in every thing that they have a mind to; and yet all that delight in God have the desire of their heart fulfilled, Ps. xxxvii. 4, though all the desires in their heart be not humoured.

2. He tells them that therefore he could not come to them, because he had so much work cut out for him elsewhere. “For which cause,” that is, because of his labours in other countries, thence it was that he was so much hindered. God had opened a wide door for him in other places, and so diverted him. Observe in this, 1st. The gracious providence of God conversant in a special manner about his ministers, casting their lot, not according to their contrivance, but according to his own purpose. Paul was several times crossed in his intentions; sometimes hindered by Satan, as 2 Thes. ii. 16, 17; sometimes forbidden by the Spirit, Acts xvi. 17; and here diverted by other work. Man purposeth, but God disposeth, Pr. xvi. 9; xix. 21; Jer. x. 23. Ministers purpose, and their friends purpose concerning them, but God overrules both, and orders the journeys, removes, and settlements of his faithful ministers as he pleaseth. The stars are in the right hand of Christ, to shine where he sets them. The Gospel doth not come by chance to any place, but by the will and counsel of God. 2nd. The gracious providence of Paul in bestowing his time and pains where there was most need. Had Paul consulted his own ease, wealth, and honour, the greatness of the work would never have hindered him from seeing Rome, but would rather have driven him thither, where he might have had more preferment, and taken less pains. But Paul sought the things of Christ more than his own things, and therefore would not leave his work of planting churches; no, not for a time, to go see Rome. The Romans were whole, and needed not the physician so as other poor places that were sick and dying. While men and women were every day dropping into eternity, and their precious souls perishing for lack of vision, it was no time for Paul to trifle. There was now a gale of opportunity, the fields were white unto the harvest; such a season slipped might never be retrieved; the necessities of poor souls were pressing, and called aloud, and therefore Paul must be busy. It concerns us all to do that first which is most needful. True grace teacheth us to prefer that which is necessary before that which is unnecessary, Luk. x. 41, 42; and Christian prudence teacheth us to prefer that which is more necessary before that which is less so. This Paul mentions as a sufficient satisfying reason. We must not take it ill of our friends if they prefer necessary work, which is pleasing to God, before unnecessary visits and compliments that may be pleasing to us. In this, as in other things, we must deny ourselves.

Secondly. He promiseth to come and see them shortly, ver. 23, 24, 29. “Having no more place in these parts,” namely, in Greece, where he then was. The whole of that country being more or less leavened with the savour of the Gospel, churches being planted in the most considerable towns, and pastors settled to carry on the work which Paul had begun, he had little more to do there. He had driven the chariot of the Gospel to the sea coast; and, having thus conquered Greece, he is ready to wish there was another Greece to conquer. Paul was one that went through with his work, and yet then did not think of taking his ease, but sets himself to contrive more work, to devise liberal things; here was a workman that needed not be ashamed. Observe,

1. How he forecasts his intended visit. His project was to see them in his way to Spain. It appears by this that Paul intended a journey into Spain, to plant Christianity there. The difficulty and peril of the work, the distance of the place, the danger of the voyage, the other good works,—though less needful, he thinks,—which Paul might find to do in other places, did not quench the flame of his holy zeal for the propagating of the Gospel, which did even eat him up, and make him forget himself. But it is not certain whether ever he fulfilled this purpose, and went to Spain. Many of the best expositors think he did not, but was hindered in this as he was in others of his purposes. He did indeed come to Rome, but he was brought thither a prisoner, and there was detained two years, and whither he went after is uncertain; but several of his epistles, which he wrote in prison, intimate his purpose to go eastward, and not towards Spain. However, Paul, “forasmuch as it was in thine heart” to bring the light of the Gospel into Spain, “thou didst well, in that it was in thine heart,” as God said to David, 2 Chr. vi. 8. The grace of God oftentimes with favour accepts the sincere intention, when the providence of God in wisdom prohibits the execution; and do not we serve a good Master then? 2 Cor. viii. 12. Now in his way to Spain he purposed to come to them. Observe his prudence; it is wisdom for every one of us to order our affairs so as that we may do the most work in the least time. Observe how doubtfully he speaks, “I trust to see you,” not, I am resolved I will, but, I hope I shall. We must purpose all our purposes, and make all our promises in like manner, with a submission to the Divine providence, not boasting ourselves of to-morrow, because we know not what a day may bring forth, Pr. xxvii. 1; Jas. iv. 13–15.

2. What he expected in this intended visit. 1st. What he expected from them. He expected they would bring him on his way towards Spain. It was not a stately attendance, such as princes have, but a loving attendance, such as friends give, that Paul expected. Spain was then a province of the empire, well known to the Romans, who had a great correspondence with it, and therefore they might be helpful to Paul in his voyage thither; and it was not barely the accompanying of him part of the way, but their furthering him in his expedition, that he counted upon; not only out of their respect to Paul, but out of respect to the souls of those poor Spaniards that Paul was going to preach to. It is justly expected from all Christians, that they should lay out themselves for the promoting and furthering of every good work, especially that blessed work of the conversion of souls, which they should contrive to make as easy as may be to their ministers, and as successful as may be to poor souls. 2nd. What he expected in them; to “be somewhat filled with their company.” That which Paul desired was their company and conversation. The good company of the saints is very desirable and delightful. Paul was himself a man of great attainments in knowledge and grace, taller by head and shoulders than other Christians in these things, and yet see how he pleased himself with the thoughts of good company; for, as iron sharpens iron, so doth a man the countenance of his friend. He intimates that he intended to make some stay with them, for he would be filled with their company, not just look at them and away; and yet he thinks their converse so pleasant that he should never have enough of it: it is but somewhat filled; he thought he should leave them with a desire of more of their company. Christian society, rightly managed and improved, is a heaven upon earth, a comfortable earnest of our gathering together unto Christ at the great day. Yet observe, it is but “somewhat filled,” ἀπὸ μέρους,—“in part.” The satisfaction we have in communion with the saints in this world is but partial; we are but somewhat filled. It is partial, compared with our communion with Christ; that, and that only, will completely satisfy, that will fill the soul. It is partial, compared with the communion we hope to have with the saints in the other world. When we shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, with all the saints, and none but saints, and saints made perfect, we shall have enough of that society, and be quite filled with that company. 3rd. What he expected from God with them, ver. 29. He expected to come “in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ.” Observe, concerning what he expected from them he speaks doubtfully; I trust to be brought on my way and to be filled with your company. Paul had learnt not to be too confident of the best; these very men slipped from him afterwards, when he had occasion to use them, 2 Tim. iv. 16. “At my first answer no man stood with me;” none of the Christians at Rome. The Lord teach us to cease from man. But concerning what he expected from God he speaks confidently, it was uncertain whether he should come or no, but “I am sure when I do come, I shall come in the fulness,” &c. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. Now Paul expected that God would bring him to them, loaded with blessings, so that he should be the instrument of doing a deal of good among them, and fill them with the blessings of the Gospel; compare ch. i. 11, “That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift.” Note, First. The blessing of the Gospel of Christ is the best and most desirable blessing. When Paul would raise their expectation of something great and good in his coming, he directs them to hope for the blessings of the Gospel, spiritual blessings, knowledge, and grace, and comfort. Secondly. There is then a happy meeting between people and ministers, when they are both under the fulness of the blessing. The blessing of the Gospel is the treasure, which we have in earthly vessels. When ministers are fully prepared to give out, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy. Many have the Gospel that have not the blessing of the Gospel, and so they have it in vain. The Gospel will not profit unless God bless it to us, and it is our duty to wait upon him for that blessing, and for the fulness of it.

Thirdly. He gives them a good reason why he could not come and see them now; because he had other business upon his hands which required his attendance, upon which he must first make a journey to Jerusalem, ver. 25–28. He gives a particular account of it, to shew that the excuse was real. He was going to Jerusalem as the messenger of the church’s charity to the poor saints there. Observe what he saith,

1. Concerning this charity itself. And he speaks of that upon this occasion probably to excite the Roman Christians to do the like, according to their ability. Examples are moving, and Paul was very ingenious at begging, not for himself, but for others. Observe, 1st. For whom it was intended. For the poor saints which are at Jerusalem,” ver. 26. It is no strange thing for saints to be poor. Those whom God favours many times the world frowns upon; therefore riches are not the best things, nor poverty a curse. It seems the saints at Jerusalem were poorer than other saints, either because the wealth of that people in general was now declining, as their utter ruin was hastening on, (and to be sure if any must be kept poor, the saints must,) or because the famine that was over all the world in the days of Claudius Cæsar did in a special manner prevail in Judæa, a dry country; and God having called the poor of this world, the Christians smarted most by it. This was the occasion of that contribution mentioned Acts xi. 28–30. Or, because the saints at Jerusalem suffered most by persecution; for of all people the unbelieving Jews were most inveterate in their rage and malice against the Christians, wrath being come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thes. ii. 16. The Christian Hebrews are particularly noted to have their goods spoiled, Heb. x. 34, in consideration of which this contribution was made for them. Though the saints at Jerusalem were at a great distance from them, yet they thus extended their bounty and liberality to them; to teach us, as we have ability, and as there is occasion, to stretch out the hand of our charity to all that are of the household of faith, though in place distant from us. Though in personal instances of poverty every church should take care to maintain their own poor,—for such poor we have always with us,—yet sometimes, when more public instances of poverty are presented as objects of our charity, though a great way off from us, we must extend our bounty, as the sun his beams, and with the virtuous woman stretch out our hands to the poor, and reach forth our hands to the needy, Pr. xxxi. 20. 2nd. By whom it was collected. By “them of Macedonia,” the chief of whom were the Philippians, “and Achaia,” the chief of whom were the Corinthians, two flourishing churches, though yet in their infancy, newly converted to Christianity. And I wish the observation did not hold, that people are commonly more liberal at their first acquaintance with the Gospel than they are afterwards; that as well as other instances of the first love, and the love of the espousals, being apt to cool and decay after a while. It seems they of Macedonia and Achaia were rich and wealthy, while they at Jerusalem were poor and needy: Infinite Wisdom ordering it so that some should have what others want, and so this mutual dependence of Christians one upon another may be maintained. “It pleased them;” this intimates how ready they were to it; they were not pressed or constrained to it, but they did it of their own accord. And how cheerful they were in it; they took a pleasure in doing good, and God loves a cheerful giver. “To make a certain contribution;” κοινωνία, a communication, in token of the communion of saints and their fellow membership, as in the natural body one member communicates to the relief, and succour, and preservation of another, as there is occasion. Every thing that passeth between Christians should be a proof and instance of that communion which they have one with another in Jesus Christ. Time was when the saints at Jerusalem were on the giving hand, and very liberal they were. When they laid their estates at the apostles’ feet for charitable uses, and took special care that the Grecian widows should not be neglected in the daily ministrations, Acts vi. 1. And now the providence of God had turned the scale, and made them necessitous, they found the Grecians kind to them, for the merciful shall obtain mercy. We should therefore give a portion to seven, and also to eight, because we know not what evil may be on the earth which may make us glad to be beholden to others. 3rd. What reason there was for it; ver. 27. “And their debtors they are.” Alms are called “righteousness,” Ps. cxli. 9. Being but stewards of what we have, we owe it there where our great Master (by the calls of providence concurring with the precepts of the word) orders us to dispose of it; but here there was a special debt owing, the Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From the stock of Israel came Christ himself, according to the flesh, who is the Light to lighten the Gentiles; out of the same stock came the prophets and apostles and first preachers of the Gospel. The Jews, having had the lively oracles committed to them, were the Christians’ library keepers; out of Zion went forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; their political church state was dissolved, and they were cut off, that the Gentiles might be admitted in. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, and did receive the Gospel of salvation as it were at second-hand from the Jews; and therefore “their duty is,” they are bound in gratitude “to minister unto them in carnal things.” It is the least they can do; λειστουρησα, to minister as unto God in holy things, so the word signifies. A conscientious regard to God in works of charity and almsgiving, makes them an acceptable service and sacrifice to God, and fruit abounding to a good account. Paul mentions this

xvi. 3. “Priscilla and Aquila:” the form of the first name is here Prisca, as in 2 Tim. iv. 19, names familiar to us. They seem to have often changed their abode. Acts xviii. 2 places them at Corinth; later in the same chapter (verses 18, 19–26) we find them at Ephesus. (Compare also 1 Cor. xvi. 19.) Here they are at Rome. In 2 Tim. iv. 19 they are at Ephesus again.

xvi. 4. “Laid down their own necks:” it is uncertain where this took place—not improbably at Ephesus. (See Acts xix. 21–xx.) xvi. 5. “Epenetus:” rather, “Epænetus.” Read, “firstfruits of Asia,” not Achaia. Stephanas is called (1 Cor. xvi. 15) the firstfruits of Achaia.

xvi. 6. “Mary:” Jowett notices that this is the only Jewish name in the list. “Labour on us:” some MSS. read “on you.” In either case the services are not known.

xvi. 7. “My kinsmen:” probably, “my countrymen.” “Fellow-prisoners:” the allusion is to some imprisonment of the apostle not probably as the argument he had used with them to persuade them to it, and it is an argument of equal cogency to other Gentile churches.

 2. Concerning Paul's agency in this business. He could himself contribute nothing. Silver and gold he had none, but lived upon the kindness of his friends; yet he ministered unto the saints, ver. 25, by stirring up others, receiving what was gathered, and transmitting it to Jerusalem. Many good works of that kind stand at a stay for want of some one active person to lead in them, and to set the wheels going. Paul's labour in this work is not to be interpreted as any neglect of his preaching work, nor did Paul leave the word of God to serve tables; for, besides that Paul had other business in this journey—to visit and confirm the churches, and took this by the bye, this was indeed a part of the trust committed to him, in which he was concerned to approve himself faithful; Gal. ii. 10, "They would that we should remember the poor." Paul was one that laid out himself to do good every way, like his Master, to the bodies as well as the souls of people. Ministering to the saints is good work, and is not below the greatest apostles. This Paul had undertaken, and therefore he resolves to go through with it before he fell upon other work; ver. 28, "When I have sealed to them this fruit." He calls the alms fruit, for it is one of the fruits of righteousness; it sprang from a root of grace in the givers, and redounded to the benefit and comfort of the receivers. And his sealing of it intimates his great care about it, that what was given might be kept entire, and not embezzled, but disposed of according to the design of the givers. Paul was very solicitous to approve himself faithful in the management of this matter. An excellent pattern for ministers to write after, that the ministry may in nothing be blamed.

30 Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me; 31 That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints; 32 That I may come unto you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed. 33 Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

Here we have,
 First. St. Paul's desire of a share in the prayers of the Romans for him, expressed very earnestly, ver. 30—32. Though Paul was a great apostle, yet he begged the prayers of the meanest Christians, not here only, but in several other of the epistles. He had prayed much for them, and this he desires as the return of his kindness. Interchanging of prayers is an excellent token of the interchanging of loves. Paul speaks like one that knew himself, and would hereby teach us how to value the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous. How careful should we be lest we do any thing to forfeit our interest in the love and prayers of God's praying people!

1. Observe why they must pray for him. He begs it with the greatest importunity. He might suspect they would forget him in their prayers, because they had no personal acquaintance with him, and therefore he urgeth it so closely, and begs it with the most affectionate obtestations, by all that is sacred and valuable. "I beseech you," 1st. "for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake." He is my Master, I am going about his work, and his glory is interested in the success of it. If you have any regard to Jesus Christ, and to his cause and kingdom, pray for me. You love Christ, and own Christ; for his sake then do me this kindness. 2nd. "For the love of the Spirit." As a proof and instance of that love which the Spirit works in the hearts of believers one to another, pray for me; as a fruit of that communion which we have one with another by the Spirit, though we never saw one another. If ever you experienced the Spirit's love to you, and would be found returning your love to the Spirit, be not wanting in this office of kindness.

2. How they must pray for him. "That ye strive together." 1st. That you strive in prayers. Those that would prevail in prayer must strive in prayer. We must put forth all that is within us in that duty; pray with fixedness, faith, and fervency; wrestle with God, as Jacob did; pray in praying, as Elias did, Jas. v. 17, and stir up ourselves to take hold on God, Isa. lxi. 7. And this not only when we are praying for ourselves, but when we are praying for our friends. True love to our brethren should make us as earnest for them as sense of our own need makes us for ourselves. 2nd. "That you strive together with me." When he begged their prayers for him, he did not intend thereby to excuse his praying for himself; no, "Strive together with me," who am wrestling with God daily, upon my own and my friends' account. He would have them to ply the same oar. Paul and these Romans were distant in place, and like to be so, and yet they might join together in prayer. Those who are put far asunder by the disposal of God's providence may yet meet together at the throne of his grace. Those who beg the prayers of others must not neglect to pray for themselves.

3. What they must beg of God for him. He mentions particulars; for, in praying both for ourselves and for our friends, it is good to be particular. "What wilt thou that I shall do for thee?" so saith Christ, when he holds out the golden sceptre. Though he knows our state and wants perfectly, he will know them from us. He recommends himself to their prayers with reference to three things: 1st. His dangers which he was exposed to. "That I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa." The unbelieving Jews were the most violent enemies Paul had, and most enraged against him, and some prospect he had of trouble from them in this journey; and therefore they must pray that God would deliver him. We may, and must, pray against persecution. This prayer was answered in several remarkable deliverances of Paul, recorded Acts xxi.—xxiv. 2nd. His services. Pray "that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints." Why was there any danger that it would not be accepted? Can money be other wise than acceptable to the poor? Yes, there was some ground of suspicion in this case; for Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and as the unbelieving Jews looked spitefully at him, which was their wickedness, so those that believed were shy of him upon that account, which was their weakness. He doth not say, Let them choose whether they will accept it or no, if they will not, it shall be better bestowed; but pray that it may be accepted. As God must be sought unto for the restraining of the ill-will of our enemies, so also for the preserving and increasing of the good-will of our friends; for God hath the hearts both of the one and of the other in his hands. 3rd. His journey to them. To engage their prayers for him, he interests them in his concerns; ver. 32, "That I may come unto you with joy." If his present journey to Jerusalem proved unsuccessful, his intended journey to Rome would be uncomfortable. If he should not do good, and prosper in one visit, he thought he should have small joy of the next. "May come with joy, by the will of God." All our joy depends upon the will of God. The comfort of the creature is in every thing according to the disposal of the Creator.

Secondly. Here is another prayer of the apostle for them; ver. 33, "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen." The Lord of hosts, the God of battle, is the God of peace, the author and lover of peace. He describes God under this title here, because of the divisions among them, to recommend peace to them. If God be the God of peace, let us be men of peace. The Old Testament blessing was, "Peace be with you;" now, "The God of peace be with you." They who have the fountain cannot want any of the streams. "With you all;" both weak and strong. To dispose them to a nearer union, he puts them all together in this prayer. Those who are united in the blessing of God should be united in affection one to another.

CHAPTER XVI.

Paul is now concluding this long and excellent epistle, and he doth it with a great deal of affection. As in the main body of the epistle he appears to have been a very knowing man, so in these appurtenances of it he appears to have been a very loving man. So much knowledge, and so much love, is a very rare, but (where it is) a very excellent and amiable composition; for what is heaven but knowledge and love made perfect? It is observable how often Paul speaks as if he were concluding, and yet takes fresh hold again. One would have thought that solemn benediction which closed the foregoing chapter should have ended the epistle; and yet here he begins again, and in this chapter he repeats the blessing, ver. 20, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." And yet he hath something more to say; nay, again he repeats the blessing, ver. 24, and yet hath not done,—an expression of his tender love. These repeated benedictions, which stand for valedictions, speak Paul loath to part. Now in this closing chapter we may observe, I. His recommendation of one friend to the Roman Christians, and his particular salutation of several among them, ver. 1—16. II. A caution to take heed of those who caused divisions, ver. 17—20. III. Salutations added from some who were with Paul, ver. 21—24. IV. He concludes with a solemn celebration of the glory of God, ver. 25—27.

COMMEND unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea: 2 That ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you: for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also.

3 Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ

ROMAN GREETING.—BRITISH MUSEUM.

Jesus: 4 Who have for my life laid down their own necks: unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles. 5 Likewise greet the church that is in their house. Salute my wellbeloved Epenetus, who is the firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ. 6 Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. 7 Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellowprisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before mentioned in the Acts. "Of note among the apostles;" some understand this to mean, "highly thought of by the apostles." Others take it as applying the term "apostle" in an extended sense to Andronicus and Junia, and stating that they had distinguished themselves among those sent to preach. It seems a mistake to restrict the title "apostle" to the Twelve. It is applied to Barnabas (Acts xiv. 14; Gal. ii. 9).

xvi. 11. "Narcissus;" some have identified him with Narcissus who was secretary to the Emperor Claudius. It is improbable, as this Narcissus died before this epistle was written. Still, the household (the body of his slaves) may have remained together and been known as those belonging to Narcissus.

xvi. 13. "His mother and mine;" i.e., who has also been a mother to me. "Rufus" has been identified, not without some plausibility, with the Rufus mentioned in Mark xv. 21. The name, however, was a common one.

me. 8 Greet Amplias my beloved in the Lord. 9 Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ, and Stachys my beloved. 10 Salute Apelles approved in Christ. Salute them which are of Aristobulus' household. 11 Salute Herodion my kinsman. Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord. 12 Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord. Salute the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord. 13 Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine. 14 Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren which are with them. 15 Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus, and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints which are with them. 16 Salute one another with an holy kiss. The churches of Christ salute you.

Such remembrances as these are usual in letters between friends; and yet Paul, by the savouriness of his expression, sanctifies these common compliments.

[It might at first sight appear strange, that in an inspired letter, which was to be preserved to the end of the world for the edification and instruction of the churches, there should be so much of it taken up with what many might consider as useless ceremony. But as the apostle was inspired by the Spirit of God in this, as well as in the highest matters, it is evident, that we ought to look for instruction from this peculiarity of his writings. This shews the value of inspiration; for were these writings merely human we should not look for instruction from such things. It shews us that every attention that expresses and promotes love ought to be exhibited among Christians. The forms and courtesies of social life, that manifest respect, are to be employed by them, to shew their esteem and affection for one another.—R. H.]

First. Here is the commendation of a friend, by whom, as some think, this epistle was sent, one Phebe, ver. 1, 2. It should seem that she was a person of quality and estate, who had business which called her to Rome, where she was a stranger; and therefore Paul recommends her to the acquaintance of the Christians there. An expression of his true friendship to her. Paul was as well skilled in the art of obliging as most men. True religion, rightly received, never made any man unkind. Courtesy and Christianity agree well together. It was not in compliment to her, but in sincerity, that,

1. He gives a very good character of her. 1st. As a sister to Paul. "Phebe our sister." Not in nature, but in grace; not in affinity or consanguinity, but in pure Christianity. His own sister in the faith of Christ; loving Paul, and beloved of him, with a pure, and chaste, and spiritual love, as a sister; for there is neither male nor female, but all are one in Christ Jesus, Gal. iii. 28. Both Christ and his apostles had some of their best friends among the devout, and upon that account honourable, women. 2nd. As a servant to the church at Cenchrea; διακονῶν, a servant by office, a stated servant, not to preach the word, that was forbidden to women; but in acts of charity and hospitality. Some think she was one of the widows that ministered to the sick, and were taken into the church's number, 1 Tim. v. 9. But those were old and poor, whereas Phebe seems to have been a person of some account; and yet it was no disparagement to her to be a servant to the church. Probably they used to meet at her house, and she undertook the care of entertaining the ministers, especially strangers. Every one in their place should strive to serve the church, for therein they serve Christ, and it will turn to a good account another day. Cenchrea was a small seaport town adjoining to Corinth, about twelve furlongs distant. Some think there was a church there distinct from that at Corinth; though, being so near, it is very probable that the church at Corinth is called the church at Cenchrea, because their place of meeting might be there, because of the great opposition to them in the city, Acts xviii. 12. As at Philippi, they met out of the city by the waterside, Acts xvi. 13. So the reformed church of Paris might be called the church at Charenton, where they formerly met out of the city. 3rd. As a succourer of many, and particularly of Paul, ver. 2. She relieved many that were in want and distress; a good copy for women to write after, that have ability. She was kind to those that needed kindness, intimated in her succouring of them; and her bounty was extensive, she was "a succourer of many." Observe the gratitude of Paul in mentioning her particular kindness to him; "and of myself also." Acknowledgment of favours is the least return we can make. It was much to her honour that Paul left this upon record; for wherever this epistle is read her kindness to Paul is told for a memorial of her.

2. He recommends her to their care and kindness, as one worthy to be taken notice of with peculiar respect. 1st. "Receive her in the Lord." Entertain her, bid her welcome. This pass under Paul's hand could not but recommend her to any Christian church. "Receive her in the Lord;" that is, for the Lord's sake, receive her as a servant and friend of Christ. As it becometh saints to receive, who love Christ, and therefore love all that are his for his sake; or, as becometh saints to be received, with love and honour, and the tenderest affection. There may be occasion sometimes to improve our interest in our friends, not only for ourselves, but for others also; interest being a price in the hand for doing good. 2nd. "Assist her in whatsoever business she has need of you." Whether she had business of trade, or law business at the court, is not material; however, being a woman, a stranger, a Christian, she had need of help, and Paul engageth them to be assistant to her. It becometh Christians to be helpful one to another in their affairs, especially to be helpful to strangers; for we are members one of another, and we know not what need of help we may have ourselves. Observe, Paul bespeaks help for one that had been so helpful to many. He that watereth shall be watered also himself.

Secondly. Here are commendations to some particular friends among those to whom he wrote more than in any other of the epistles. Though the care of all the churches came upon Paul daily, enough to distract an ordinary head, yet he could retain the remembrance of so many; and his heart was so full of love and affection as to send salutations to each of them, with particular characters of them, and expressions of love to them, and concern for them.

xvi. 18. "Good words and fair speeches:" "The distinction is that between good speaking and well speaking, between plausibility and flattery" (Vaughan). Who these were is not very clear, but they were probably similar to those pointed out in Phil. iii. 2, 18; 1 Tim. vi. 3; 2 Cor. xi. 2.

xvi. 20. "God of peace:" the description is appropriate. God is called the God of peace, since he can give the victory, bruising Satan under their feet. (Compare Gen. iii. 15)

"Greet them," salute them; it is the same word, ἀντίσπετε. Let them know that I remember them, and love them, and wish them well. There is something observable in divers of these salutations.

1. Concerning Aquila and Priscilla, a famous couple, that Paul had a special kindness for. They were originally of Rome, but were banished thence by the edict of Claudius, Acts xviii. 2. At Corinth Paul became acquainted with them, wrought with them at the trade of tent-making. After some time, when the edge of that edict was abated, they returned to Rome, and thither he now sends commendations to them. He calls them his "helpers in Christ Jesus;" by private instructions and converse furthering the success of Paul's public preaching; one instance whereof we have in their instructing of Apollos, Acts xviii. 26. Those are helpers to faithful ministers that lay out themselves in their families, and among their neighbours, to do good to souls. Nay, they did not only do much, but they ventured much for Paul; they have "for my life laid down their own necks." They exposed themselves to secure Paul, hazarded their own lives for the preservation of his, considering how much better they might be spared than he. Paul was in a great deal of danger at Corinth, while he sojourned with them; but they sheltered him, though they thereby made themselves obnoxious to the enraged multitude, Acts xviii. 12, 17. It was a good while ago that they had done Paul this kindness; and yet he speaks as sensibly of it as if it had been but yesterday. "To whom," saith he, "not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles;" who were all beholden to these good people for helping to save the life of him that was the apostle of the Gentiles. Paul mentions this to engage the Christians at Rome to be the more kind to Aquila and Priscilla.

[We have here Aquila and Priscilla at Rome. St. Paul became acquainted with these persons in his first visit to Greece, Acts xviii. 2; they accompanied him to Ephesus, ver. 18, and were there when he wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians. After writing that epistle, Paul staid some little time at Ephesus, he was a considerable time in Macedonia, and three months in Greece, and, as this epistle to the Romans was written at the close of that second visit, a sufficient interval elapsed for the return of Aquila and Priscilla to Rome, so as to be there when the apostle wrote this greeting to them. Paley remarks how fully this statement shews that names and circumstances are so implicated with dates and places in writings like the present, that nothing but truth could preserve consistency.—R. T. S. Com.]

He sends greeting likewise to the church in their house, ver. 5. It seems, then, a church in a house is no such absurd thing as some make it to be. Perhaps there was a congregation of Christians that used to meet at their house at stated times; and then no doubt but it was like the house of Obed-Edom, blessed for the ark's sake. Others think, the church was no more than a religious, pious, well-governed family, that kept up the worship of God. Religion, in the power of it reigning in a family, will turn a house into a church. And doubtless it had a good influence upon this, that Priscilla, the goodwife of the family was so very eminent and forward in religion; so eminent, that she is often named first. A virtuous woman, that looks well to the ways of her household, may do much towards the advancement of religion in a family. When Priscilla and Aquila were at Ephesus, though but sojourners there, yet there also they had a church in their house, 1 Cor. xvi. 19. A truly godly man will be careful to take religion along with him wherever he goes. When Abraham removed his tent, he renewed his altar, Gen. xiii. 18.

2. Concerning Epenetus, ver. 5. He calls him his "well-beloved." Where the law of love is in the heart, the law of kindness will be in the tongue. Endearing language should pass among Christians, to express love, and to engage love. So he calls Amplias "beloved in the Lord," with true Christian love for Christ's sake; and Stachys his "beloved." A sign Paul had been in the third heaven, he was so much made up of love. Of Epenetus it is farther said that he was the "firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ;" not only one of the most eminent believers in that country, but one of the first that was converted to the faith of Christ; one that was offered up to God by Paul, as the firstfruits of his ministry there; an earnest of a great harvest, for in Corinth, the chief city of Achaia, God had much people, Acts xviii. 10. Special respect is to be paid to those that set out early, and come to work in the vineyard at the first hour, at the first call. The household of Stephanas is likewise said to be the firstfruits of Achaia, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. Perhaps Epenetus was one of that household; or, however, he was one of the first three; not the first alone, but one of the first fleece of Christians that the region of Achaia afforded.

3. Concerning Mary, and some others who were laborious in that which is good,—industrious Christians; "Mary, who bestowed much labour on us." True love never sticks at labour, but rather takes a pleasure in it; where there is much love there will be much labour. Some think this Mary had been at some of those places where Paul was, though now removed to Rome, and had personally ministered to him; others think Paul speaks of her labour as bestowed on him, because it was bestowed upon his friends and fellow-labourers, and he took what was done to them as done to himself. He saith of Tryphena and Tryphosa, two useful women in their places, that they "laboured in the Lord," ver. 12; and of the "beloved Persis," another good woman, that she "laboured much in the Lord," more than others did. Among useful people some are more useful than others; abounding more in the work of the Lord.

4. Concerning Andronicus and Junia, ver. 7. Some take them for a man and his wife, and the original will well enough bear it; and, considering the name of the latter, that is more probable than that they should be two men, as others think, and brethren. Observe, 1st. They were Paul's cousins, akin to him; so was Herodion, ver. 11. Religion doth not take away, but rectifies, sanctifies, and improves our respect to our kindred; engaging us to lay out ourself as most for their good, and to rejoice in them the more when we find them related to Christ by faith. 2nd. They were his fellow-prisoners. Partnership in suffering sometimes doth much towards the union of souls, and the knitting of affections. We do not find in the story of the Acts any imprisonment of Paul before the writing of this Epistle, but that at Philippi, Acts xvi. 23. But Paul was "in prisons more frequent," 2 Cor. xi. 23, in some of which it seems he met with his friends Andronicus and Junia; yoke-fellows, as in other things, so in suffering for Christ, and bearing his yoke. 3rd. They were "of note among the apostles;" not so much because perhaps they were persons of estate and quality in the world, as because they were eminent for knowledge, and gifts, and graces, which made them famous among the apostles, who were competent judges of those things, and were endued with a spirit of discerning not only the sincerity, but the eminency of Christians. 4th. Whom "also were in Christ before me;" that is, were converted to the Christian faith. In time they had got the start of Paul, though he was converted the next year after Christ's ascension. How ready was Paul to acknowledge in others any kind of precedency!

5. Concerning Apelles, who is here said to be "approved in Christ," ver. 10; a high character. He was one of known integrity and sincerity in his religion, one that had been tried; his friends and enemies had tried him, and he was as gold. He was of approved knowledge and judgment, approved courage and constancy; a man that one might trust, and repose a confidence in.

6. Concerning Aristobulus and Narcissus. Notice is taken of their house—

xvi. 21. "Timotheus:" see Notes on First Epistle to Timothy. "Lucius:" probably the same with Lucius, a Cyrenian, mentioned in Acts xiii. 1. "Jason:" perhaps the Jason of Thessalonica. (See Acts xvii. 5.) "Sosipater:" there is a Sopater of Berea mentioned in Acts xx. 4; some identify him with the one named here.

xvi. 22. "Tertius, who wrote this epistle:" St. Paul usually employed an amanuensis. (See Gal. vi. 11.)

xvi. 23. "Gaius:" mentioned in 1 Cor. i. 14. He was baptised by hold, ver. 11. Those of their household which "are in the Lord," as it is limited, ver. 11, that were Christians. How studious was Paul to leave none out of his salutations that he had any knowledge of, or acquaintance with! Aristobulus and Narcissus themselves, some think, were absent, or lately dead; others think they were unbelievers, and such as did not themselves embrace Christianity, so Pareus; and some think this Narcissus was the same with one of that name who is frequently mentioned in the life of Claudius, as a very rich man that had a great family, but very wicked and mischievous. It seems that there were some good servants or other retainers even in the family of a wicked man; a common case, 1 Tim. vi. 1; compare ver. 2. The poor servant called, and chosen, and faithful, while the rich master was passed by, and left to perish in unbelief. "Even so, Father, because it seemed good unto thee."

7. Concerning Rufus; ver. 13, "chosen in the Lord." He was a choice Christian, whose gifts and graces did evidence that he was eternally chosen in Christ Jesus. He was one of a thousand for integrity and holiness. "And his mother and mine;" his mother by nature, and mine by Christian love and spiritual affection; as he calls Phoebe his sister, and teacheth Timothy to treat the elder women as mothers, 1 Tim. v. 2. This good woman, upon some occasion or other, had been as a mother to Paul, in caring for him, and comforting of him, and Paul here gratefully owns it, and calls her mother.

8. Concerning the rest this is observable, that he salutes "the brethren which are with them," ver. 14; and "the saints which are with them," ver. 15; with them in family relations, with them in the bond of Christian communion. [Here a number of brethren are selected without distinction. This mark of brotherly attention would gratify those whom the apostle here names, besides the brethren who were with them. The Lord's people are not equally distinguished, but they are all brethren equally related to him who is the elder brother of his people. Some of them are eminent, and others are without peculiar distinction. They are all, however, worthy of love. A church is not to consist of the most eminent believers, but of believers, though some be of the lowest attainments. A church of Christ is a school in which their education is to be perfected.—R. H.]

It is the good property of saints to delight in being together; and Paul thus joins them together in his salutations to endear them one to another. Lest any should find themselves aggrieved, as if Paul had forgotten them, he concludes with the remembrance of the rest, as brethren and saints, though not named. In Christian congregations there should be lesser societies linked together in love and converse, and taking opportunities of being often together. Among all these to whom Paul sends greeting here is not a word of Peter, which gives occasion to suspect that he was not bishop of Rome, as the Papists say he was; for, if he was, we cannot but suppose him resident; or, however, how could Paul write so long an epistle to the Christians there, and take no notice of him?

Thirdly. He concludes with the recommendation of them to the love and embraces one of another; "Salute one another with a holy kiss." Mutual salutations, as they express love, so they increase and strengthen love, and endear Christians one to another; therefore Paul doth here encourage the use of them, and only directs that they be holy; a chaste kiss, in opposition to that which is wanton and lascivious; a sincere kiss, in opposition to that which is treacherous and dissembling, as Judas's when he betrayed Christ with a kiss. He adds in the close a general salutation to them all in the name of the churches of Christ, ver. 16, "The churches of Christ salute you;" that is the churches which I am with, and which I am used to visit personally, as knit together in the bonds of the common Christianity, desire me to testify their affection to you, and good wishes for you. This is one way of maintaining the communion of saints.

[It does not follow, because a custom prevailed in the early churches, and received the sanction of the apostles, that we are obliged to follow it. These customs often arose out of local circumstances and previous habits, or were merely conventional modes of expressing certain feelings, and were never intended to be made universally obligatory. As it was common in the East, (and so is, to a great extent, at present, not only there, but on the continent of Europe,) to express affection and confidence by "the kiss of peace," Paul exhorts the Roman Christians to salute one another with a holy kiss; that is, to manifest their Christian love to each other according to the mode to which they were accustomed. The exercise and manifestation of the feeling, but not the mode of its expression, are obligatory on us.—H.]

17 Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them. 18 For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple. 19 For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad therefore on your behalf: but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. 20 And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

The apostle having endeavoured by his endearing salutations to unite them together, it was not improper to subjoin a caution to take heed of those whose principles and practices were destructive to Christian love. And we may observe,

First. The caution itself, which is given in the most obliging manner that could be, "I beseech you, brethren." He doth not will and command, as one that lorded it over God's heritage, but for love's sake beseeches. How earnest, how endearing are Paul's exhortations! He teaches them,

1. To see their danger; "Mark them which cause divisions and offences." Our Master had himself foretold that divisions and offences would come; but had entailed a woe on those by whom they come, Mat. xviii. 7, and against such we are here cautioned. Those who burthen the church with dividing and offending impositions, who uphold and enforce those impositions, who introduce and propagate dividing and offending notions, which are erroneous or justly suspected; who out of pride, ambition, affectation of novelty, or the like, causelessly separate from their brethren, and by perverse disputes, censures, and evil surmisings, alienate the affections of Christians one from another; these "cause divisions and offences contrary to," or different from, (for that also is implied, it is παρά την διδασχιν), "the doctrine which we have learned." Whatever varies from the form of sound doctrine which we have in the Scriptures opens a door to division and offences. If truth be once deserted, unity and peace will not last long. Now, mark those that thus cause divisions, οκορειν. Observe them, the method they take, the end they drive at; there is need of a piercing, watchful eye to discern the danger we are in from such people; for commonly the pretences are plausible, when the projects are very pernicious. Do not look only at the "divisions and offences," but run up those streams to the fountain, and mark those that cause them; and especially that in them which doth cause these divisions and offences; those lusts on each side, from whence come these wars and fightings. A danger discovered is half prevented.

2. To shun it, "and avoid them." Shun all unnecessary communion and communication with them, lest you be leavened and infected by them. Do not strike in with any dividing interests, nor embrace any of those principles or practices which are destructive to Christian love and charity, or to the truth which is according to godliness. Their word will eat as doth a canker. Some think he doth especially warn them to take heed of the Judaizing teachers, who, under the covert of the Christian name, kept up the Mosaic ceremonies, and preached the necessity of them; who were industrious in all places to draw disciples after them, and whom Paul in most of his epistles cautions the churches to take heed of.

Secondly. The reasons to enforce this caution.

1. Because of the pernicious policy of these seducers, ver. 18. The worse they are the more need we have to watch against them. Now, observe his description of them in two things: 1st. The master they serve. "Not our Lord Jesus Christ;" though they call themselves Christians they do not serve Christ, do not aim at his glory, promote his interest, or do his will, whatever they pretend. How many are there who call Christ master and Lord that are far from serving him? But they serve "their own belly;" that is, their carnal, sensual, secular interests. It is some base lust or other that they are pleasing; pride, ambition, covetousness, luxury, lasciviousness, these are the designs which they are really carrying on: their "God is their belly," Phil. iii. 19. What a base master do they serve, and how unworthy to come in competition with Christ; that serve their own bellies; that make gain their godliness, and the gratifying of a sensitive appetite the very scope and business of their lives, to which all other purposes and designs must truckle and be made subservient. 2nd. The method they take to compass their design. "By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple." Their words and speeches have a show of holiness and zeal for God, (it is an easy thing to be godly from the teeth outward,) and a show of kindness and love to those into whom they instil their corrupt doctrines, speaking them fair when they intend them the greatest mischief. Thus by good words and fair speeches the serpent beguiled Eve. Observe, they corrupt their heads by deceiving their hearts; pervert their judgments by a sly insinuating of themselves into their affections. We have great need therefore to keep our hearts with all diligence, especially when seducing spirits are abroad.

2. Because of the peril we are in through our proneness and aptness to be inveigled and ensnared by them; for "your obedience is come abroad unto all men." You are noted in all the churches for a willing, tractable, complying people; and, 1st. Therefore because it was so these seducing teachers would be the more apt to assault them. The devil and his agents have a particular spite at flourishing churches, and flourishing souls. The ship that is known to be richly laden is most exposed to privateers; the adversary and enemy covets such a prey, therefore look to yourselves, 2 Jno. 8. The false teachers hear that you are an obedient people, and therefore they will be likely to come among you, to see if you will be obedient to them. It hath been the common policy of seducers to set upon those who are softened by convictions, and begin to inquire what they shall do, because such do most easily receive the impressions of their opinions. Sad experience witnesseth how many who have begun to ask the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward, have fatally split upon this rock; which speaks it much the duty of ministers, with a double care, to feed the lambs of the flock, to lay a good foundation, and gently to lead those that are with young. 2nd. Though it were so, yet they were in danger from these seducers. This Paul suggests with a great deal of modesty and tenderness; not as one suspicious of them, but as one solicitous for them. "Your obedience is come abroad unto all men;" we grant that, and rejoice in it: "I am glad therefore on your behalf." Thus doth he insinuate their commendation, the better to make way for the caution. A holy jealousy of our friends may very well consist with a holy joy in them. You think yourselves a very happy people, and so do I too; but for all that you must not be secure, "I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil." You are a willing, good-natured people, but you had best take heed of being imposed upon by those seducers. A pliable temper is good when it is under good conduct, but otherwise it may be very ensnaring; and therefore he gives two general rules: First. To be "wise unto that which is good;" that is, to be skilful and intelligent in the truths and ways of God. Be wise to try the spirits, to prove all things, and then to hold fast that only which is good. There is need of a great deal of wisdom in our adherence to good truths, and good duties, and good people, lest in any of these we be imposed upon and deluded. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents," Mat. x. 16; wise to discern that which is really good from that which is counterfeit; wise to distinguish things that differ, to improve opportunities. While we are in the midst of so many deceivers we have great need of that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, Pr. xiv. 8. Secondly. To be "simple concerning evil;" so wise as not to be deceived, and yet so simple as not to be deceivers. It is a holy simplicity not to be able to contrive, or palliate, or carry on any evil design; ακεραιους, harmless, unmix'd, inoffensive. "In malice be ye children," 1 Cor. xiv. 20. The wisdom of the serpent becomes Christians, but not the subtlety of the old serpent. We must withal be harmless as doves. That is a wisely simple man that knows not how to do anything against the truth. Now Paul was the more solicitous for the Roman church that that might keep its integrity, because it was so famous; it was a city upon a hill, and many eyes were upon the Christians there, so that an error prevailing there would be a bad precedent, and have an ill influence upon other churches; as indeed it hath since proved in fact, the great apostacy of the latter days taking its rise from that capital city. The errors of leading churches are leading errors. When the bishop of Rome fell as a great star from heaven, Rev. viii. 10 "his tail drew a third part of the stars" after him, Rev. xii. 4.

3. Because of the promises of God that we should have victory at last, which is given to quicken and encourage, not to supersede, our watchful cares and vigorous endeavours. It is a very sweet promise, ver. 20, "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet." 1st. The titles he gives to God; "The God of peace;" that is, the author and giver of all good. When we come to God for spiritual victories, we must not only eye him as the Lord of hosts, whose all power is, but as the God of peace, a God at peace with us, speaking peace to us, working peace in us, creating peace for us. Victory comes from

St. Paul. "Of the whole church:" it is inferred that the Christians of Corinth met for worship in his house. "Erastus, the chamberlain;" better, treasurer of the city—i.e., Corinth. (Compare Acts xix. 22; 2 Tim. iv. 20.)

xvi. 25. "The mystery, which was kept secret;" or, "kept in silence."

Additional Notes.—Chap. i. 14. "Debtor;" because of the obligation laid on him to preach the Gospel (1 Cor. ix. 16). "Greeks," "barbarians;" i.e., to all Gentiles, whatever their race or capacity. He does not speak of his being debtor to Jews, though he yearned for their conversion (chap. ix. 1—3, x. 1); his obligation was toward Gentiles, not Jews (Gal. ii. 7).

i. 16. "Ashamed;" suggested by the idea of preaching at Rome. "Though your city be mistress of the world, though your emperors be worshipped as present deities, though you be elated by your pomps, and luxuries, and victories, yet I am not ashamed,"

God more as the God of peace than as the God of war; for in all our conflicts peace is the thing we must contend for. God, as the God of peace, will restrain and vanquish all those that cause divisions and offences, and so break and disturb the peace of the church. 2nd. The blessing he expects from God; a victory over Satan. If he mean primarily those false doctrines and seducing spirits spoken of before, of which Satan was the prime founder and author, yet doubtless it comprehends all the other designs and devices of Satan against souls, to defile, disturb, and destroy them; all his attempts to keep us from the purity of heaven, the peace of heaven here, and the possession of heaven hereafter. Satan, tempting and troubling, acting as a deceiver, and as a destroyer, the God of peace will bruise under our feet. He had cautioned them before against simplicity; now, they being conscious of their own great weakness and folly, might think, How shall we wade and escape these snares that are laid for us? Will not these adversaries of our souls be at length too hard for us? No, saith he, fear not; though you cannot overcome in your own strength and wisdom, yet the God of peace will do it for you; and through him that loved us we shall be more than conquerors. First. The victory shall be complete. He "shall bruise Satan under your feet," plainly alluding to the first promise of the Messiah, made in paradise, Gen. iii. 15, that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head; which is in the fulfilling every day, while the saints are enabled to resist and overcome the temptations of Satan; and will be perfectly fulfilled when, in spite of all the powers of darkness, all that belong to the election of grace shall be brought triumphantly to glory. When Joshua had conquered the kings of Canaan, he called the captains of Israel to set their feet upon the necks of those kings, Jos. x. 24; so will Christ, our Joshua, enable all his faithful servants and soldiers to set their feet upon Satan's neck, to trample upon, and triumph over, their spiritual enemies. Christ hath overcome for us, disarmed the strong man armed, broken his power, and we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory, and divide the spoil. Let this quicken us to our spiritual conflict, to fight the good fight of faith. We have to do with a conquered enemy, and the victory will be perfect shortly. Secondly. The victory shall be speedy. He shall do it "shortly." Yet a little while and he that shall come will come. He hath said it, "Behold, I come quickly." When Satan seems to have prevailed, and we are ready to give up all for gone, then will the God of peace cut the work short in righteousness. It will encourage soldiers, when they know the war will be at an end quickly, in such a victory. Some refer it to the happy period of their contentions in true love and unity; others to the period of the church's persecutions, in the conversion of the powers of the empire to Christianity, when the bloody enemies of the church were subdued and trampled on by Constantine, and the church under his government. It is rather to be applied to the victory which all the saints shall have over Satan when they come to heaven, and shall be for ever out of his reach, together with the present victories which through grace they obtain in earnest of that. Hold out therefore, faith and patience, yet a little while; when we are once got through the Red sea we shall see our spiritual enemies dead on the shore, and triumphantly sing the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb. To this therefore he subjoins the benediction, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you." The good will of Christ towards you, the good work of Christ in you. This will be the best preservative against the snares of heretics, and schismatics, and false teachers. If the grace of Christ be with us, who can be against us so as to prevail? Be strong therefore in the grace which is in Christ Jesus. Paul, not only as a friend, but as a minister and an apostle, who had received grace for grace, thus with authority blest them with his blessing, and repeats it, ver. 24.

[This form of expression has always been understood to import the deity of Jesus Christ, and justly it has been so understood. It is essentially and necessarily a prayer to our Lord Jesus Christ; and if he is not God, what grace has he to bestow on his people? It implies that there is a constant supply of grace to be communicated from Christ to his people, and if Christ so communicates his holy influences to his people in all ages, in all countries, to every individual of them, at every instant of time, what can he be but the Almighty God? This implies that they who have been bought by the blood of Christ are to be supplied with grace by him continually, in order to their standing in the truth. All their perseverance is in virtue of this. Of his church it is said, "I, the Lord, do keep it; I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."—R. H.]

21 Timothy my workfellow, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sospater, my kinsmen, salute you. 22 I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord.

ROMAN SCRIBE

23 Gaius mine host, and of the whole church, saluteth you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth you, and Quartus a brother. 24 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

As the apostle had before sent his own salutations to many of this church, and that of the churches round him to them all, he here adds an affectionate remembrance of them from some particular persons, who were now with him, the better to promote acquaintance and fellowship among distant saints; and that the subscribing of these worthy names, known to them, might the more recommend this epistle. He mentions,

1. Some that were his particular friends, and probably known to the Roman Christians. "Timotheus my work-fellow." Paul sometimes calls Timothy his son, as an inferior; but here he styles him his work-fellow, as one equal with him, such a respect doth he put upon him. And Lucius; probably Lucius of Cyrene, a noted man in the church of Antioch, Acts xiii. 1, as Jason was at Thessalonica, where he suffered for entertaining Paul, Acts xvii. 5, 6, and Sospater, supposed to be the same with Sopater of Berea, mentioned Acts xx. 4. These last Paul calls his kinsmen; not only more largely, as they were Jews, but as they were in blood or affinity nearly allied to him. It seems Paul was of a good family, that he met with so many of his kindred in several places. It is a very great comfort to see the holiness and usefulness of our kindred.

2. One that was Paul's amanuensis; ver. 22, "I Tertius, who wrote this epistle." Paul made use of a scribe, not out of state, or idleness, but because he wrote a bad hand, which was not very legible, which he excuseth, when he wrote to the Galatians with his own hand, Gal. vi. 11, πληκτικὸν γράμματιν, "with what kind of letters." Perhaps this Tertius was the same with Silas; for Silas (as some think) signifies the third in Hebrew, as Tertius in Latin. Tertius either wrote as Paul dictated, or transcribed it fair over out of Paul's foul copy. The least piece of service done to the church, and the ministers of the church, shall not pass without a remembrance and a recompence. It was an honour to Tertius, that he had a hand, though but as a scribe, in writing this epistle.

3. Some others that were of note among the Christians; ver. 23, "Gaius mine host." It is uncertain whether this was Gaius of Derbe, Acts xx. 4, or Gaius of Macedonia, Acts xix. 29, or rather Gaius of Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14, and whether any of these was he to whom John wrote his third epistle. However, Paul commends him for his great hospitality; not only mine host, but of the whole church; one that entertained them all, as there was occasion, opened his doors to their church meetings, and eased the rest of the church by his readiness to treat all Christian strangers that came to them.

Erastus "the chamberlain of the city" is another. He means of the city of Corinth, whence this epistle was dated. It seems he was a person of honour and account, one in public place, steward or treasurer. Not many mighty, not many noble, are called, but some are. His estate, and honour, and employment, did not take him off from attending on Paul, and laying out himself for the good of the church, it should seem, in the work of the ministry; for he is joined with Timothy, Acts xix. 22, and is mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 20. No disparagement to the chamberlain of the city to be a preacher of the Gospel of Christ. Quartus is likewise mentioned, and called a brother; for as one is our Father, even Christ, so all we are brethren.

[Ver. 24, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen." This important prayer is repeated from ver. 20, which shows us that all repetition is not vain repetition; but that it may mark a thing of peculiar importance. Our Lord prayed the same words three times. And the apostle, from the abundance of his heart, and his great concern for the Christians at Rome, here twice within a short compass, prays that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ might be with them. Indeed there is great need of such earnest petitions, for without the constant supply of the grace of Christ we could not abide in him.—R. H.]

25 Now to him that is of power to stablish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, 26 But now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith: 27 To God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen.

Here the apostle solemnly closes his epistle with a magnificent ascription of glory to the blessed God, as one that terminated all in the praise and glory of God, and studied to return all to him, seeing all is of him, and from him. He doth as it were breathe out his soul to these Romans in the praise of God, choosing to make that the end of his epistle which he made the end of his life. Observe here,

First, A description of the Gospel of God, which comes in a parenthesis; having occasion to speak of it as the means by which the power of God stablisheth souls, and the rule of that establishment; "To stablish you according to my Gospel." Paul calls it his gospel, because he was the preacher of it, and because he did so much glory in it. Some think he means especially that declaration, explication, and application of the doctrine of the Gospel, which he had now made in this epistle. But it rather takes in all the preaching and writing of the apostles, among whom Paul was a principal labourer. "Through their word," Jno. xvii. 20, the word committed to them. Ministers are the ambassadors, and the Gospel is their embassy. Paul had his head and heart so full of the Gospel that he could scarce mention it without a digression to set forth the nature and excellency of it.

1. It is "the preaching of Jesus Christ." Christ was the preacher of it himself; it "began to be spoken by the Lord," Heb. ii. 3. So pleased was Christ with his undertaking for our salvation, that he would himself be the publisher of it. Or, Christ is the subject matter of it; the sum and substance of the whole Gospel was Jesus Christ and him crucified. "We preach not ourselves," saith Paul, "but Christ Jesus the Lord." That which stablisheth souls is the plain preaching of Jesus Christ.

2. It is "the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began—and by the Scriptures—made known." The subject matter of the Gospel is a mystery; our redemption and salvation by Jesus Christ, in the foundation, method, and fruits of it, is without controversy a

&c. (Alford). "The power of God:" the Gospel is the special and greatest instrument of Divine power; Christ is the living power of it (1 Cor. i. 24). It is a power to salvation; there is a power to destruction (Matt. x. 28).

i. 17. The quotation from Habakkuk is made three times in the New Testament—Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38; and here.

i. 28. "Did not like:" Alford renders "did not choose." There is a play upon the words in the original, which is thus given by Mr.

Conybeare: "As they thought fit to cast out the acknowledgment of God, God gave them over to an outcast mind." "Reprobate mind:" not that the mind had lost the faculty of discerning, but depravity had mastered it. Mind, as well as heart and life, are degraded. (Compare 1 Titus i. 15.) "Convenient:" not in its modern sense of opportune, but in its old sense of fit, or seemly.

i. 30. "Haters of God:" Alford argues for the passive translation—"hated of God."

great mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 16. This speaks the honour of the Gospel; it is no vulgar, common thing, hammered out by any human wit, but it is the admirable product of the eternal wisdom and counsel of God, and hath in it such an inconceivable height, such an unfathomable depth, as passeth knowledge. It is a mystery which the angels desire to look into, and cannot find the bottom of. And yet, blessed be God, there is as much of this mystery made plain as will suffice to bring us to heaven, if we do not wilfully neglect so great salvation. Now, 1st. This mystery was "kept secret since the world began," ἡ ἀποκρυφία τῆς αἰωνίου. It was "wrapt up in silence from eternity;" so some, a temporibus æternis. It is no new and upstart notion, no late invention, but took rise from the days of eternity, and the purposes of God's everlasting love. Before the foundation of the world was laid, this mystery was hid in God, Eph. iii. 9; or, "since the world began," so we translate it. During all the times of the Old Testament this mystery was comparatively kept secret, in the types and shadows of the ceremonial law, and the dark predictions of the prophets, which pointed at it; but so that they could not stedfastly look to the end of those things, 2 Cor. iii. 13. Thus it was hid from ages and generations, even among the Jews, much more among the Gentiles that sat in darkness, and had no notices at all of it. Even the disciples of Christ themselves, before his resurrection and ascension, were very much in the dark about the mystery of redemption, and their notion of it was very much clouded and confused; such a secret was it for many ages. But, 2nd. It "now is made manifest." The veil is rent, the shadows of the evening are done away, and life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel, and the Sun of righteousness is risen upon the world. Paul doth not pretend to have the monopoly of this discovery, as if he alone knew it; no, it is made manifest to many others. But how is it made manifest "by the scriptures of the prophets?" Surely because now the event had given the best exposition to the prophecies of the Old Testament; being accomplished, they were explained. The preaching of the prophets, as far as it related to this mystery, was dark and unintelligible in a great measure, in the ages in which they lived; but "the scriptures of the prophets," that which they left in writing, is now not only made plain in itself, but by it this mystery is "made known to all nations." The Old Testament doth not only borrow light from, but return light to, the revelation of the New Testament. If the New Testament explain the Old, the Old Testament, by way of requital, very much illustrates the New. Thus the Old Testament prophets "prophecy again," now their prophecies are fulfilled, "before many people, and nations, and tongues." I refer to Rev. x. 11, which this explains. Now, Christ appears to have been the treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament; "to him give all the prophets witness;" see Lu. xxiv. 27. 3rd. It is manifested "according to the commandment of the everlasting God;" that is, the purpose, counsel, and decree of God from eternity; and the commission and appointment given first to Christ, and then to the apostles, in the fulness of time. They received commandment from the Father to do what they did in preaching the Gospel. Lest any should object, why was this mystery kept secret so long, and why made manifest now? he resolves it into the will of God, who is an absolute Sovereign, and gives not account of any of his matters. The commandment of the everlasting God was enough to bear out the apostles and ministers of the Gospel in their preaching, "The everlasting God." This attribute of eternity is here given to God very emphatically. First. He is from everlasting; which intimates, that though he had kept this mystery secret since the world began, and had but lately revealed it, yet he had framed and contrived it from everlasting, before the worlds were. The oaths and covenants in the written word are but the copy of that oath and covenant which was between the Father and the Son from eternity; those the extracts, these the original. And, Secondly. He is to everlasting; intimating the eternal continuance of this revelation, and its eternal consequence to us. We must never look for any new revelation, but abide by this, for this is "according to the commandment of the everlasting God." Christ in the Gospel is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. 4th. It is "made known to all nations for the obedience of faith." The extent of this revelation he often takes notice of; that whereas hitherto in Judah only God was known, now Christ is salvation to the ends of the earth, to all nations. And the design and intention of it is very observable, it is "for the obedience of faith;" that is, that they might believe and obey it, receive it, and be ruled by it. The Gospel is revealed, not to be talked of and disputed about, but to be submitted to. "The obedience of faith" is that obedience which is paid to the word of faith, (see that phrase, Acts vi. 7.) and which is produced by the grace of faith. See here what is the right faith, even that which works in obedience; and what is the right obedience, even that which springs from faith; and what is the design of the Gospel, to bring us to both.

Secondly. A doxology to that God whose Gospel it is; ascribing glory to him for ever, ver. 27; acknowledging that he is a glorious God, and adoring him accordingly, with the most awful affections, desiring and longing to be at this work with the holy angels, where we shall be doing it to eternity. This is praising God, ascribing glory to him for ever. Observe,

1. The matter of this praise. In thanking God, we fasten upon his favours to us; in praising and adoring God, we fasten upon his perfections in himself. Two of his principal attributes are here taken notice of. 1st. His power; ver. 25, "To him that is of power to establish you." It is no less than a Divine power that stablisheth the saints. Considering the disposition that is in them to fall, the industry of their spiritual enemies that seek to overthrow them, and the shaking times into which their lot is cast, no less than an almighty power will stablish them. That power of God which is put forth for the establishment of the saints is, and ought to be, the matter of our praise, as Jude 24. "To him that is able to keep you from falling." In giving God the glory of this power, we may and must take to ourselves the comfort of it, that whatever our doubts, and difficulties, and fears may be, our God whom we serve is of power to stablish us: see 1 Pet. i. 5; Jno. x. 29. 2nd. His wisdom; ver. 27, "To God only wise." Power to effect without wisdom to contrive, and wisdom to contrive without power to effect, are alike vain and fruitless; but both together, and both infinite, make a perfect being. He is only wise; not the Father only wise, exclusive of the Son; but Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three persons, and one God. Only wise, compared with the creatures. Man, the wisest of all the creatures in the lower world, is born like a wild ass's colt; nay, the angels themselves are charged with folly, in comparison with God. He only is perfectly and infallibly wise; he only is originally wise, in and of himself; for he is the spring and fountain of all the wisdom of the creatures; the Father of all the lights of wisdom that any creature can pretend to, Jas. i. 17; with him is strength and wisdom, the deceived and deceiver are his.

2. The Mediator of this praise; "Through Jesus Christ." "To God only wise through Jesus Christ," so some. It is in and through Christ that God is manifested to the world as the only wise God; for he is the wisdom of God, and the power of God. Or rather, as we read it, "Glory through Jesus Christ." All the glory that passeth from fallen man to God, so as to be accepted of him, must go through the hands of the Lord Jesus, in whom alone it is that our persons and performances are or can be pleasing to God. Of his righteousness, therefore, we must make mention, even of his only; who, as he is the Mediator of all our prayers, so he is, and I believe will be to eternity, the Mediator of all our praises.

These three verses (25, 26, and 27) might be rendered thus,—"Now to Him who is able to establish you in the discipleship of my gospel, which is nothing else than the gospel of Jesus Christ himself—or in the discipleship of that revelation whereby there has been divulged the truth that was before hidden, and kept back from men in the earlier ages of the world; but is now made manifest, both by the prophetic writings which we in these days have been made more fully to understand—and also by the proclamation of the same agreeably to the commandment of the everlasting God, amongst all nations, for the purpose of obtaining their submission to the faith—to Him, the only wise God, be glory for ever, through Jesus Christ our Lord.—C.]

iii. 2. "Much every way;" i.e., in every direction or sphere of life. "Oracles of God;" it has been hinted that the words of Stephen (Acts vii. 38) were in St. Paul's mind. These oracles must not be limited to the law of Moses; they include all the direct revelations which God made of himself.

iii. 4. "That thou mightest be justified;" shown to be just, vindicated. (Compare Luke vii. 29, 35.) "In thy sayings;" in thy arguments or pleadings. The metaphor employed is forensic: God is represented as entering into controversy with man (compare Isa. i. 2, 18; Mic. vi. 2), and pleading his cause against man before heaven and earth. "Mightest overcome when thou art judged;" "gain thy cause when thou contendest, or enterest into trial as a litigant" (Dr. Vaughan).

vi. 19. For "holiness" read "sanctification," or "consecration."

vi. 21. "What fruit," &c.: read the verse with Alford, thus—"What fruit then had ye at that time? Things whereof ye are now ashamed: for," &c.

viii. 6, 7. "To be carnally minded," &c.: Alford renders, "The mind of the flesh is death, but the mind of the Spirit is life and peace. Because the mind of the flesh is enmity against God; for it doth not submit itself to the law of God, neither indeed can it." The Spirit is the Spirit of life. Hence it follows that the spiritual man cannot mind the things of the flesh, because such mind is death. The addition of 'and peace' seems to be made to enhance the unlikelihood of such a minding, the peace of the Spirit being a blessed contrast to the tumult of the fleshly lusts, even in this life.

viii. 26. "Likewise;" better, "in like manner." "Our infirmities:" Alford renders, "our weakness."

ST. PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

CORINTH was a principal city of Greece, in that particular division of it which was called Achaia. It was situate on the isthmus, or neck of land, that joined Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, on the southern side, and had two ports adjoining; one at the bottom of the Corinthian gulf, called Lechæum, not far from the city, from whence they traded to Italy and the West; the other at the bottom of the Sinus Saronicus, called Cenchrea, at a more remote distance, from whence they traded to Asia. From this situation, it is no wonder that Corinth should be a place of great trade and wealth. And, as affluence is apt to produce luxury of all kinds, neither is it to be wondered if a place so famous for wealth and arts should be infamous for vice. It was in a particular manner noted for lewdness, inasmuch that a Corinthian woman was a proverbial phrase for a woman of bad fame, and κορινθιάζειν, κορινθιάσθαι, 'to play the Corinthian,' is to indulge lewd inclinations. Yet in this debauched city did Paul, by the blessing of God on his labours, plant and raise a Christian church, chiefly among the Gentiles, as seems very probable from the history of this matter, Acts xviii. 1—18, compared with some passages in this epistle, particularly ch. xii. 2, where the apostle tells them, "Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led." Though it is not improbable that many Jewish converts might be also among them, for we are told "that Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house," Acts xviii. 8. He continued in this city near two years, as is plain from Acts xviii. 11 and 18 compared, and laboured with great success, being encouraged by a Divine vision, assuring him God had much people in that city, Acts xviii. 9, 10. Nor did he use to stay long in a place where his ministry met not with acceptance and success.

Some time after he left them he wrote this epistle to them, to water what he had planted, and rectify some gross disorders that during his absence had been introduced, partly from the interest some false teacher or teachers had obtained amongst them, and partly from the leaven of their old maxims and manners that had not been thoroughly purged out by the Christian principles they had entertained. And it is but too visible how much their wealth had helped to corrupt their manners, from the several faults for which the apostle reprehends them. Pride, avarice, luxury, lust, the natural offspring of a carnal and corrupt mind, are all fed and prompted by outward affluence. And with all these, either the body of this people, or some particular persons among them, are here charged by the apostle. Their pride discovered itself in their sidings and factions, and the notorious disorders they committed in the exercise of their spiritual gifts. And this vice was not wholly fed by their wealth, but by the insight they had into the Greek learning and philosophy. Some of the ancients tell us, that the city abounded with rhetoricians and philosophers; and these were men naturally vain, full of self-conceit, and apt to despise the plain doctrine of the Gospel, because it did not feed the curiosity of an inquisitive and disputing temper, nor please the ear with artful speeches and a flow of fine words. Their avarice was manifest in their law-suits and litigations about meum and tuum before heathen judges. Their luxury appeared in more instances than one; in their dress, in their debauching themselves even at the Lord's table, where the rich, who were most faulty on this account, were guilty also of a very proud and criminal contempt of their poor brethren. Their lust broke out in a most flagrant and infamous instance, such as had not been named among the Gentiles, not spoken of without detestation, that a man should have his father's wife, either as his wife, or so as to commit fornication with her. This indeed seems to have been the fault of a particular person, but the whole church were to blame that they had his crime in no greater abhorrence, that they could endure one of such very corrupt morals and so flagitious a behaviour amongst them. But their participation in his sin was yet greater, if, as some of the ancients tell us, they were puffed up on behalf of the great learning and eloquence of this incestuous person. And it is plain from other passages of the epistle that they were not so entirely free from their former lewd inclinations as not to need very strict cautions and strong arguments against fornication: see ch. vi. 9—20. The pride of their learning had also carried many of them so far as to disbelieve or dispute against the doctrine of the resurrection. It is not improbable that they treated this question problematically, as they did many questions in philosophy, and tried their skill by arguing it pro and con.

It is manifest from this state of things that there was much that deserved reprehension and needed correction in this church. And the apostle, under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit, sets himself to do both with all wisdom and faithfulness, and with a due mixture of tenderness and authority, as became one in so elevated and important a station in the church. After a short introduction at the beginning of the epistle, he first blames them for their discord and factions, enters into the original and source of them, shews them how much pride and vanity, and the affectation of science, and learning, and eloquence, flattered by false teachers, had contributed to the scandalous schism; and prescribes humility and submission to Divine instruction, the teaching of God by his Spirit, both by external revelation and internal illumination, as a remedy for the evils that abounded amongst them. He shews them the vanity of their pretended science and eloquence on many accounts. This is his business through the first four chapters. In the fifth he treats of the case of the incestuous person, and orders him to be put out from amongst them. Nor is what the ancients say improbable, that this incestuous person was a man in great esteem, and head of one party at least amongst them. The apostle seems to tax them with being puffed up on his account, ch. v. 2. In the sixth chapter he blames them for their law-suits, carried on before heathen judges, when their disputes about property should have been amicably determined amongst themselves; and in the close of the chapter warns them against the sin of fornication, and urges his caution with variety of arguments. In the seventh chapter he gives advice upon a case of conscience, which some of that church had proposed to him in an epistle, about marriage; and shews it to be appointed of God as a remedy against fornication, that the ties of it were not dissolved, though a husband or wife continued a heathen when the other became a Christian; and, in short, that Christianity made no change in men's civil states and relations. He gives also some directions here about virgins, in answer, as is probable, to the Corinthians' inquiries. In the eighth he directs them about meats offered to idols, and cautions them against abusing their Christian liberty; from whence he also takes occasion in the ninth chapter to expatiate a little on his own conduct upon this head of liberty; for, though he might have insisted on a maintenance from the churches where he ministered, he waived this demand, that he might make the Gospel of Christ without charge; and did in other things comply with, and suit himself to, the tempers and circumstances of those among whom he laboured, for their good. In the tenth chapter he dissuades them, from the example of the Jews, against having communion with idolaters by eating of their sacrifices, inasmuch as they could not be at once partakers of the Lord's table and the table of devils [or, more properly, demons]; though they were not bound to inquire concerning meat sold in the shambles, or set before them at a feast made by unbelievers, whether it were a part of the idol sacrifices or no, but were at liberty to eat without asking questions. In the eleventh chapter he gives direction about their habit in public worship, blames them for their gross irregularities and scandalous disorders in receiving the Lord's supper, and solemnly warns them against the abuse of so sacred an institution. In the twelfth chapter he enters on the consideration of spiritual gifts, which were poured forth in great abundance on this church, upon which they were not a little elated. He tells them in this chapter that all came from the same original, and were all directed to the same end. They issued from one Spirit, and were intended for the good of the church, and must be abused when they were not made to minister to this purpose. Towards the close he informs them that they were indeed valuable gifts, but he could recommend to them somewhat far more excellent. Upon which he breaks out in the thirteenth chapter into the commendation and characters of charity. And then, in the fourteenth, directs them how to keep up decency and order in the churches, in the use of their spiritual gifts, in which they seem to have been exceeding irregular, through pride of their gifts, and a vanity of shewing them. The fifteenth chapter is taken up in confirming and explaining the great doctrine of the resurrection. The last chapter consists of some particular advices and salutations; and thus the epistle closes.

* The original commentary, written by the Rev. Simon Browne, has been revised (with additional notes in brackets) for this Edition by the Rev. R. J. Brown, D.D., Professor of Greek in Marischal College and University, Aberdeen, with a few additional notes, chiefly from Albert Barnes, and marked A.B.

Introductory Note.—"Corinth," not to be confounded with the ancient city of that name, which had been destroyed about two centuries before the time of St. Paul. The new city rose on the ruins of the old, from a colony planted there by Julius Cæsar. (See Acts xviii. 1—18 for an account of Paul's first visit.) This epistle was most probably written from Ephesus, A.D. 57, shortly before the visit to Corinth mentioned in Acts xx. 3. It seems likely that a previous letter was written from Ephesus, which has not been preserved, and it has been conjectured that a short visit was paid to Corinth about the same time, of which no mention is made in the Acts. The temptations of the Corinthians were those of a wealthy commercial city, where a licentious worship was carried on. That vice and immorality had appeared in the Corinthian church is only too apparent from the epistle. The majority of the church were Gentiles, but the epistles give evidence of a strong Judaizing element, and a violent party spirit, threatening the peace and unity of the church.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The preface or introduction to the whole epistle, ver. 1—10. 11. One principal occasion of writing it hinted; viz., their divisions, and the original of them, ver. 10—13. III. An account of Paul's ministry among them, which was principally preaching the Gospel, ver. 13—17. IV. The manner wherein he preached the Gospel, and the different success of it, with an account how admirably it was fitted to bring glory to God, and beat down the pride and vanity of man, ver. 17—31.

AUL, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God, and Sosthenes our brother, 2 Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both their's and our's: 3 Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. 4 I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God which is given you by Jesus Christ; 5 That in every thing ye are enriched by him, in all utterance, and in all knowledge; 6 Even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you: 7 So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: 8 Who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ. 9 God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

We have here the apostle's preface to his whole epistle. In which we may take notice,

First. Of the inscription; in which, according to the custom of writing letters then, the name of the person by whom it was written, and the persons to whom it was written, are both inserted. 1. It is an epistle from Paul the apostle of the Gentiles to the church of Corinth, which himself had planted, though there were some amongst them that now questioned his apostleship, ch. ix. 1, 2, and vilified his person and ministry, 2 Cor. x. 10. The most faithful and useful ministers are not secure from this contempt. He begins with challenging this character; "Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God." He had not taken this honour to himself, but had a Divine commission for it. It was proper at any time, but necessary at this time, to assert his character and magnify his office; when false teachers made a merit of running him down, and their giddy and deluded followers were so apt to set them up in competition with him. It was not pride in Paul, but faithfulness to his trust, in this juncture, to maintain his apostolical character and authority. And, to make this more fully appear, he joins Sosthenes with him in writing, who was a minister of a lower rank. Paul, and Sosthenes his brother, not a fellow apostle, but a fellow minister; once a ruler of a Jewish synagogue, afterwards a convert to Christianity; a Corinthian by birth, as is most probable, and dear to this people, for which reason Paul, to ingratiate himself with them, joins him with himself in his first salutations, though there is no reason to suppose he was made a partaker of the apostle's inspiration, for which reason he speaks through the rest of the epistle in his own name, and in the singular number. Paul did not in any case lessen his apostolical authority, and yet he was ready upon all occasions to do a kind and condescending thing for their good to whom he ministered. 2. The persons to whom this epistle was directed are the church of God that was at Corinth, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. All Christians are thus far sanctified in Christ Jesus, that they are by baptism dedicated and devoted to him; they are under strict obligations to be holy, and they make profession of real sanctity. If they be not truly holy, it is their own fault and reproach. Note, It is the design of Christianity to sanctify us in Christ; "He gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify us to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." In conjunction with the church at Corinth, he directs the epistle "to all that in every place call on the name of Christ Jesus our Lord, both their's and our's." Hereby Christians are distinguished from the profane and atheistical, that they dare not live without prayer; and hereby they are distinguished from Jews and pagans, that they call on the name of Christ, [which implies faith in all his attributes and worship]; he is their common head and Lord. Observe, That in every place in the Christian world there are some that call on the name of Christ. God hath a remnant in all places, and we should have a common concern for, and hold communion with, all that call on Christ's name.

Secondly. Of the apostolical benediction; "Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." An apostle of the Prince of peace must be a messenger and minister of peace. This blessing the Gospel brings with it, and this blessing every preacher of the Gospel should heartily wish and pray may be the lot of all among whom he ministers. Grace and peace, the favour of God and reconciliation to him; it is indeed the summary of all blessings. "The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace," was the form of benediction under the Old Testament, Num. ix. 26; but this advantage we have by the Gospel, 1. That we are directed how to obtain that peace from God. It is in and by Christ. Sinners can have no peace with God, nor any good from him, but through Christ. 2. We are told what must qualify us for this peace, namely, grace; first grace, and then peace. God first reconciles sinners to himself, before he bestows his peace upon them.

Thirdly. Of the apostle's thanksgiving to God on their behalf. Paul begins most of his epistles with thanksgiving to God for his friends, and prayer for them. Note, The best way of manifesting our affection to our friends is by praying and giving thanks for them. It is one branch of the communion of saints to give thanks to God mutually for our gifts, graces, and comforts. He gives thanks, 1. For their conversion to the faith of Christ. That grace was given them by Jesus Christ, ver. 4; he is the great procurer and disposer of the favours of God. Those who are united to him by faith, and made to partake of his Spirit and merits, are the objects of Divine favour. God loves them, bears them hearty goodwill, and bestows on them his fatherly smiles and blessings. 2. For the abundance of their spiritual gifts. This the church of Corinth was famous for. They did not come behind any of the churches in any gift, ver. 7. He instances in utterance and knowledge, ver. 5, [that is, the gift of tongues and a deep insight into things spiritual.] Where God hath given these two gifts he hath given great capacity for usefulness. Many have the flower of utterance that have not the root of knowledge, and their converse is barren. Many have the treasure of knowledge, and want utterance to employ it for the good of others, and then it is in a manner wrapt up in a napkin. But where God gives both, a man is qualified for eminent usefulness. When the church of Corinth was enriched with all utterance and all knowledge, it was fit that a large tribute of praise should be rendered to God, especially when these gifts were a testimony to the truth of the Christian doctrine, a confirmation of the testimony of Christ among them, ver. 6. They were signs, and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which God did bear witness to the apostles, both to their mission and doctrine, Heb. ii. 3. So that, the more plentifully they were poured forth on any church, the more full attestation was given to that doctrine which was delivered by the apostles; the more confirming evidence they had of their Divine mission. And it is no wonder that, when they had such foundation for their faith, they should live in expectation of the coming of their Lord Jesus Christ, ver. 7. It is the character of Christians that they wait for Christ's second coming; all our religion hath regard to that. We believe it and hope for it, and it is the business of our lives to prepare for it, if we are Christians indeed. And the more confirmed we are in the Christian faith the more firm is our belief of our Lord's second coming, and the more earnest our expectation of it.

Fourthly. Of the encouraging hopes the apostle had of them for the time to come, founded on the power and love of Christ and the faithfulness of God, ver. 8, 9. He who had begun a good work in them, and carried it on thus far, would not leave it unfinished. Those that wait for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ will be kept by him and confirmed to the end; and those that are so will be blameless in the day of Christ,—not upon the foot of strict justice, but gracious absolution; not in rigour of law, but from rich and free grace. How desirable is it to be confirmed and kept of Christ for such a purpose as this! How glorious are the hopes of such a privilege, whether for ourselves or others; to be kept by the power of Christ from the power of our own corruptions and Satan's temptations, that we may appear without blame in the great day! Oh, glorious expectation! especially when the faithfulness of God comes in to support our hopes. He who hath called us into the fellowship of his Son is faithful, and will do it, 1 Thes. v. 24. He who hath brought us into near and dear relation to Christ, into sweet and intimate communion with Christ, is faithful; he may be trusted with our dearest concerns. Those that come at his call shall never be disappointed in their hopes in him. If we approve ourselves faithful to God we shall never find him unfaithful to us; "He will not suffer his faithfulness to fail," Ps. lxxix. 33.

10 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment. 11 For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you. 12 Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. 13 Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?

i. 1. "Sosthenes:" not to be identified with the Sosthenes of Acts xviii. 17.

i. 2. "Church:" literally, "congregation or assembly." The word is ecclesia (from which our word "ecclesiastical" is taken), and is derived from a verb signifying to call out; pointing to the mode of gathering or assembling. The members were the "called." "Sanctified:" hallowed, or dedicated to God, and in union with or by means of Jesus Christ. "With all:" St. Paul addresses not merely the Corinthians, but also "all that," &c. Alford observes that this important addition showed the Corinthians that membership of God's holy catholic church did not consist in being planted or presided over by Paul, Apollos, or Cephas, or their successors, but in calling on the name of the Lord. "Both theirs and ours:" perhaps the best rendering is to take these words with "in every place."

i. 3. "Grace and peace:" grace being the favour of God, and peace the result of that favour.

Here the apostle enters on his subject. He exhorts them to unity and brotherly love, and reproves them for their divisions. He had received an account from some that wished them well, of some unhappy differences amongst them. It was neither illwill to the church nor to their ministers that prompted them to give this account, but a kind and prudent concern to have these heats qualified by Paul's interposition. He writes to them in a very engaging way; "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." If you have any regard to that dear and worthy name by which you are called, be unanimous; speak all the same thing; avoid divisions or schisms, (as the original is,) that is, all alienation of affection from each other. "Be perfectly joined together in the same mind," namely, as far as you can, [thus pointing out that unity at which the church should aim.] In the great things of religion be of a mind; but when there is not a unity of sentiment let there be a union of affections. The consideration of being agreed in greater things should extinguish all feuds and divisions about lesser ones.

Secondly, He hints at the original of these contentions. Pride lay at the bottom, and this made them factious; "Only of pride cometh contention," Pr. xiii. 10. They quarrelled about their ministers. Paul and Apollos were both faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, and helpers of their faith and joy; but those who were disposed to be contentious broke into parties, and set their ministers at the head of their several factions; some cried up Paul, perhaps, as the most sublime and spiritual teacher; others cried up Apollos, perhaps, as the most eloquent speaker; some Cephas or Peter, perhaps, for the authority of his age, or because he was the apostle of the circumcision. And some were for neither, but Christ only. [The persons who attempted to form separate parties seem to have been, 1. Greeks; 2. Philosophising Greeks; 3. Judaizers; 4. Persons, perhaps, affecting superiority, as having seen the Lord Jesus Christ.] So liable are the best things in the world to be corrupted, and the Gospel and its institutions, which are at perfect harmony with themselves and one another, to be made the engines of variance, discord, and contention. This is no reproach to our religion, but a very melancholy evidence of the corruption and perversity of human nature. Note, How far will pride carry Christians in opposition to one another. Even so far as to set Christ and his own apostles at variance, and make them rivals and competitors.

Thirdly, He expostulates with them upon their discord and quarrels. "Is Christ divided?" No, there is but one Christ, and therefore Christians should be of one heart. "Was Paul crucified for you?" was he your sacrifice and atonement? Did I ever pretend to be your Saviour, or any more than his minister? "Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" Were you devoted to my service, or engaged to be my disciples, by that sacred rite? Did I challenge that right in you, or dependence from you, which is the proper claim of your God and Redeemer? No, ministers, however instrumental they are of good to us, are not to be put in Christ's stead; they are not to usurp Christ's authority, nor encourage any thing in the people that looks like transferring his authority to them. He is our Saviour and sacrifice; he is our Lord and guide. And happy were it for the churches if there were no name of distinction among them, as Christ is not divided.

14 I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; 15 Lest any should say that I had baptized in my own name. 16 And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other.

Here the apostle gives an account of his ministry amongst them. He thanks God he had baptized but a few among them; Crispus, who had been a ruler of a synagogue at Corinth, Acts xviii. 8. and Gaius, and the household of Stephanas; besides, he says, he did not remember he had baptized any. But how was this a proper matter for thankfulness? Was it not part of the apostolical commission to baptize all nations? And could Paul give thanks to God for his own neglect of duty? He is not to be understood in such a sense, as if he was thankful for not having baptized at all, but for not having done it in present circumstances, lest it should have had this very bad construction put upon it, that he had baptized in his own name, made disciples for himself, or set himself up as the head of a sect. He left it to other ministers to baptize, whilst he set himself to more useful work, and filled up his time with preaching the Gospel. This, he thought, was more his business, because the more important business of the two. He had assistants that could baptize, when none could discharge the other part of his office as well as himself. In this sense he saith Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel; not so much to baptize as to preach. Note, Ministers should esteem themselves sent and set apart more especially to that service in which Christ will be most honoured and the salvation of souls promoted, and for which themselves are best fitted, though no part of their duty is to be neglected. The principal business Paul did amongst them was to preach, to preach the Gospel, ver. 17; the cross, ver. 11; Christ crucified, ver. 23. Ministers are the soldiers of Christ, and are to erect and display the banner of the cross. He did not preach his own fancy, but the Gospel, the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation to God through the mediation of a crucified Redeemer. This is the sum and substance of the Gospel. Christ crucified is the foundation of all our hopes and the fountain of all our joys. By his death we live. This is what Paul preached, what all ministers should preach, and what all the saints live upon.

17 For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. 18 For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God. 19 For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. 20 Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? 21 For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. 22 For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: 23 But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness; 24 But unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God. 25 Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and the weakness of God is stronger than men. 26 For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: 27 But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; 28 And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: 29 That no flesh should glory in his presence. 30 But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: 31 That, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

We have here, First, The manner in which Paul preached the Gospel and cross of Christ; "Not with the wisdom of words," ver. 17, "the enticing words of man's wisdom," ch. ii. 4; the flourish of oratory or the accuracies of philosophical language, upon which the Greeks so much prided themselves, and which seem to have been the peculiar recommendations of some of the heads of the faction in this church, that most opposed this apostle. He did not preach the Gospel in this manner, "lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect;" lest the success should have been ascribed to the force of art, and not of truth; not to the plain doctrine of a crucified Jesus, but the powerful oratory of those who spread it; and hereby the honour of the cross be diminished or eclipsed. Paul had been bred up himself in Jewish learning at the feet of Gamaliel, but in preaching the cross of Christ he laid his learning aside. He preached a crucified Jesus in plain language, and told the people that that Jesus who was crucified at Jerusalem was the Son of God and Saviour of men; and that all who would be saved must repent of their sins and believe in him, and submit to his government and laws. This truth needed no artificial dress, it shone out with the greatest majesty in its own light, and prevailed in the world by its Divine authority and the demonstration of the Spirit, without any human helps. The plain preaching of a crucified Jesus was more powerful than all the oratory and philosophy of the heathen world.

Secondly, We have the different effects of this preaching. To them that perish it is foolishness, "but to them which are saved it is the power of God," ver. 18. "It is to the Jews a stumblingblock, and to the Greeks foolishness, but to them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God," ver. 23, 24. 1. Christ crucified is a stumblingblock to the Jews; they could not get over it. They had a conceit that their expected Messiah was to be a great temporal prince, and therefore would never own one who made so mean an appearance in life, and died so accursed a death, for their deliverer and king. They despised him and looked upon him as execrable because he was hanged on a tree, and because he did not gratify them with a sign to their mind, though his Divine power shone out in innumerable miracles. "The Jews require a sign," ver. 22; see Mat. xii. 38. 2. He was "to the Greeks foolishness." They laughed at the story of a crucified Saviour, and despised the apostles' way of telling it. "They sought for wisdom;" they were men of wit and reading, men that had cultivated arts and sciences, and had for some ages been in a manner the very nunt of knowledge and learning. There was nothing in the plain doctrine of the cross to suit their taste, or humour their vanity, or gratify a curious and wrangling temper; they entertained it therefore with scorn and contempt. What, hope to be saved by one that could not save himself, and trust in one who was condemned and crucified for a malefactor, a man of mean birth and poor condition in life, and cut off by so vile and opprobrious a death! This was what the pride of human reason and learning could not relish. The Greeks thought it little better than stupidity to receive such a doctrine, and pay this high regard to such a person; and thus were they justly left to perish in their pride and obstinacy. Note, It is just with God to leave them to themselves, who pour such proud contempt on Divine wisdom and grace. 3. "To them which are called and saved, he is the wisdom of God and the power of God." Those who are called and sanctified, who receive the Gospel and are enlightened [or who are enabled to receive the Gospel, and are enlightened and made holy by the Spirit] by the Spirit of God, discern more glorious discoveries of God's wisdom and power in the doctrine of Christ crucified than in all his other works. Note, Those who are saved are reconciled to the doctrine of the cross, and led into an experimental acquaintance with the mysteries of Christ crucified.

Thirdly, We have here the triumphs of the cross over human wisdom, according to the ancient prophecy, Isa. xxix. 14; "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" ver. 19, 20. All the valued learning of this world was confounded, baffled, and eclipsed, by the Christian who professed to follow Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, in opposition to Paul; others who preferred the Alexandrian learning of Apollos, and who sought to form for themselves a philosophical Christianity; others, again, who repudiated any human teacher, and who, claiming to be "of Christ," slighted the apostleship of Paul. At the same time, want of brotherly love, spiritual pride, disorder in Christian worship, and immorality were showing themselves amongst them. At the same time, too, it would appear that the answer to St.

revelation and the glorious triumphs of the cross. The heathen politicians and philosophers, the Jewish rabbies and doctors, the curious searchers into the secrets of nature, were all posed and put to a nonplus. This scheme lay out of the reach of the deepest statesmen and philosophers, and the greatest pretenders to learning both among the Jews and Greeks. When God would save the world, he took a way by himself, and good reason, for "the world by wisdom knew not God," ver. 21. All the boasted science of the heathen world did not, could not, effectually bring home the world to God. In spite of all their wisdom, ignorance still prevailed, iniquity still abounded. Men were puffed up by their imaginary knowledge, and rather farther alienated from God; and therefore "it pleased him, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe," "By the foolishness of preaching," not such in truth, but in vulgar reckoning. 1. The thing preached was foolishness in the eyes of worldly wise men. Our living through one that died, our being blessed by one who was made a curse, our being justified by one who was himself condemned, was all folly and inconsistency to men blinded with self-conceit and wedded to their own prejudices and the boasted discoveries of their reason and philosophy. 2. The manner of preaching the Gospel was foolishness to them too. None of the men famous for wisdom or eloquence were employed to plant the church or propagate the Gospel; a few fishermen were called out and sent upon this errand. These were commissioned to disciple the nations, the vessels chosen to convey the treasure of saving knowledge to the world. There was nothing in them that at first view looked grand or august enough to come from God; and the proud pretenders to learning and wisdom despised the doctrine for the sake of those who dispensed it. And yet "the foolishness of God is wiser than men," ver. 15. Those methods of Divine conduct that rain men are apt to censure as unwise and weak have more true, solid, and successful wisdom in them than all the learning and wisdom that is among men. "You see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called," ver. 26, &c. You see the state of Christianity; not many men of learning, or authority, or honourable extraction are called. There is a great deal of meanness and weakness in the outward appearance of our religion. For, 1st. Few of distinguished character in any of these respects were chosen for the work of the ministry. God did not choose philosophers, or orators, or statesmen, or men of wealth, and power, and interest in the world, to publish the Gospel of grace and peace. Not the wise men after the flesh, though men would be apt to think a reputation for wisdom and learning might have contributed much to the success of the Gospel; not the mighty and noble, however men might be apt to imagine that secular pomp and power would make way for its reception in the world; but God seeth not as man seeth. He hath chosen the foolish things of the world, the weak things of the world, the base and despicable things of the world, [that is,] men of mean birth, of low rank, of no liberal education, to be the preachers of the Gospel and planters of the church. "His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways." He is a better judge than we what instruments and measures will best serve the purposes of his glory. 2nd. Few of distinguished rank and character were called to be Christians, [yet a few such persons were called.] As the preachers were poor and mean, so generally were the converts; few of the wise, and mighty, and noble, embraced the doctrine of the cross. The first Christians, both among the Jews and Greeks, were weak, and foolish, and base, [in the eyes of the world,] men of mean furniture as to their mental improvements, and very mean rank and condition as to their outward estate; and yet what glorious discoveries are there of Divine wisdom in the whole scheme of the Gospel and in this particular circumstance of its success!

Fourthly. We have an account how admirably all is fitted, 1. To beat down the pride and vanity of men. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise," men of no learning to confound the most learned; "The weak things of the world to confound the mighty," men of mean rank and circumstances to confound and prevail against all the power and authority of earthly kings. "And base things, and things that are despised," things which men have in the lowest esteem or in the utmost contempt, to pour contempt and disgrace on all they value and have in veneration. "And things which are not, to bring to nought," to abolish, "things that are." The conversion of the Gentiles, (of whom the Jews had the most contemptuous and vilifying thoughts,) to open a way to the abolishing that constitution of which they were so fond, and upon which they valued themselves so much, as for the sake of it to despise the rest of the world. It is common for the Jews to speak of the Gentiles under this character, as things that are not. Thus, in the apocryphal book of Esther, she is brought in praying that God would not give his sceptre to them which are not, Est. iv. 11; and Esdra, in one of the apocryphal books under his name, speaks to God "of the heathen, as those which are reputed as nothing," 2 Esd. vi. 56, 57. And the apostle Paul seems to have this common language of the Jews in his view, when he calls Abraham "the father of us all, before him whom he believed, God, who calleth those things that be not as though they were," Rom. iv. 17. The Gospel is fitted to bring down both the pride of Jews and Greeks, to shame the boasted science and learning of the Greeks, and take down that constitution on which the Jews valued themselves, and despised all the world besides. "That no flesh should glory in his presence," ver. 29; that there might be no pretence for boasting. Divine wisdom alone had the contrivance of the method of redemption; Divine grace alone revealed it, and made it known. It lay in both respects out of human reach; and the doctrine and discovery prevailed, in spite of all the opposition it met with from human art or authority. So effectually did God veil the glory and disgrace the pride of man in all. The gospel dispensation is a contrivance to humble man. But, 2. It is admirably fitted to glorify God. There is a great deal of power and glory in the substance and life of Christianity. Though the ministers were poor and unlearned, and the converts generally of the meanest rank, yet the hand of the Lord went along with the preachers, and was mighty in the hearts of the hearers. And Jesus Christ was made both to ministers and Christians what was truly great and honourable. All we have, we have from God as the fountain, and in and through Christ as the channel of conveyance. He is made of God to us, "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption," ver. 30, all we need or can desire. We are foolishness, ignorant and blind in the things of God, with all our boasted knowledge; and he is made wisdom to us. We are guilty, obnoxious to justice; and he is made righteousness, our great atonement and sacrifice. We are depraved and corrupt; and he is made sanctification, the spring of our spiritual life; from him, the head, it is communicated to all the members of his mystical body by his Holy Spirit. We are in bonds, and he is made redemption to us, our Saviour and deliverer. Observe, That where Christ is made righteousness to any soul he is also made sanctification. He never discharges from the guilt of sin, without delivering from the power of it. And he is made righteousness and sanctification, that he may in the end be made complete redemption, and free the soul from the very being of sin, and loose the body from the bonds of the grave. And what is designed in all is, that all flesh may glory in the Lord, ver. 31. Observe, That is the will of God that all our glorying should be in the Lord; and, our salvation being only through Christ, it is thereby effectually provided it should be so. Man is humbled, and God glorified and exalted by the whole scheme.

Paul's former letter (the lost one) came, in which the Corinthians asked for instruction on three points—1, respecting meat offered to idols; 2, celibacy and matrimony; 3, the exercise of spiritual gifts in the assemblies of the church.

i. 17. "Wisdom of words:" rather, "in wisdom of speech"—i.e., speculations of philosophy.

i. 18. "For the doctrine of the cross is to the perishing, those who are on their way to ruin, folly; but to us who are being saved it

The apostle proceeds with his argument in this chapter, and I. Remembers the Corinthians of the plain manner wherein he delivered the Gospel to them, ver. 1—5. But yet, II. Shews them that he had communicated to them a treasure of the truest and highest wisdom; such as exceeded all the attainments of learned men; such as could never have entered into the heart of man if it had not been revealed; nor can be received and improved to salvation but by the light and influence of that Spirit who revealed it, ver. 6—16.

ND I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. 2 For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. 3 And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. 4 And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: 5 That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

In this passage the apostle pursues his design, and reminds the Corinthians how he acted when he first preached the Gospel amongst them.

First. As to the matter or subject, he tells us, ver. 2 "He determined to know nothing among them but Jesus Christ, and him crucified;" to make a show of no other knowledge but this, to preach nothing, to discover the knowledge of nothing, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Note, Christ, in his person and offices, is the sum and substance of the Gospel, and ought to be the great subject of a gospel minister's preaching. His business is to display the banner of the cross, and invite people under it. Any one that heard Paul preach found him to harp so continually on this string, that he would say he knew nothing but Christ, and him crucified. Whatsoever other knowledge he had, this was the only knowledge he discovered, and shewed himself concerned to propagate among his hearers.

Secondly. The manner wherein he preached Christ is here also observable. 1. Negatively. "He came not among them with excellency of speech or wisdom," ver. 1; His "speech and preaching were not with enticing words of man's wisdom," ver. 4. He did not affect to appear a fine orator, or a deep philosopher nor insinuate into their mind by a flourish of words, or a pompous show of deep reason, and extraordinary science and skill. He did not set himself to captivate the ear by fine turns and eloquent expressions, nor to please and entertain the fancy with lofty flights or sublime notions. Neither his speech nor the wisdom he taught savoured of human skill; he learnt both in another school. Divine wisdom needed not to be set off with such human ornaments. 2. Positively. He came among them, "declaring the testimony of God," ver. 1. He published a Divine revelation, and gave in sufficient vouchers for the authority of it, both by its consonancy to ancient predictions and by present miraculous operations, and there he left the matter. Ornaments of speech, and philosophical skill and argument, could add no weight to what came recommended by such authority. He was also "among them in weakness, and fear, and in much trembling," and yet his "speech and preaching was in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," ver. 4, 5. His enemies in the church of Corinth speak very contemptuously of him; "His bodily presence, say they, is weak, and his speech contemptible," 2 Cor. x. 10. Possibly he had a little body, and a low voice, but though he had not so good an elocution as some, it is plain he was no mean speaker. The men of Lystra looked on him to be the heathen god Mercury, come down to them in the form of a man, because he was the chief speaker, Acts xiv. 12. Nor did he want courage or resolution to go through his work; he was in nothing terrified by his adversaries. Yet he was no boaster; he did not proudly vaunt himself, like his opposers; he acted in his office with much modesty, concern, and care. He carried it with great humility amongst them; not as one grown vain with the honour and authority conferred on him, but as one concerned to approve himself faithful, and fearful of himself, lest he should mismanage in his trust. Observe, None know the fear and trembling of faithful ministers, who are jealous over souls with a godly jealousy. And a deep sense of their own weakness is the occasion of this fear and trembling. They know how insufficient they are, and are therefore fearful for themselves. But though Paul managed with this modesty and concern, yet he spake with authority, "in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power." He preached the truths of Christ in their native dress, with plainness of speech. He laid down the doctrine as the Spirit delivered it, and left the Spirit, by his external operation in signs and miracles, and his internal influences on the hearts of men, to demonstrate the truth of it, and procure its reception.

Thirdly. Here is the end mentioned for which he preached Christ crucified in this manner, namely, "That their faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God," ver. 5. That they might not be drawn by human motives, or overcome by mere human arguments, lest it should be said that either rhetoric or logic had made them Christians. But when nothing but Christ crucified was plainly preached the success must be entirely attributed to a Divine power accompanying the word. Their faith must be founded, not on human wisdom, but Divine evidence and operation. The Gospel was so preached, that God might appear and be glorified in all.

6 Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought: 7 But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before is the power ('the perfection of God's power, the power itself in its noblest manifestation') of God."

i. 21. "Foolishness of preaching:" rather, "the folly of the thing preached"—i.e., the folly of the cross.

i. 22. "Sign:" rather, "signs." (See Matt. xii. 38, xvi. 1; Luke xi. 16; John ii. 18, vi. 30). Alford says, "The sign required was not a mere miracle, but some token from Heaven substantiating the word preached."

the world unto our glory: 8 Which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. 9 But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. 10 But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. 11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. 12 Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. 13 Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual. 14 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. 15 But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. 16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ.

In this part of the chapter the apostle shews them, that though he had not come to them with the excellency of human wisdom, with any of the boasted knowledge and literature of the Jews or Greeks, yet he had communicated to them a treasure of the truest and the highest wisdom; "We speak wisdom among them who are perfect," ver. 6; among them who are well instructed in Christianity, and come to some maturity in the things of God. They that receive the doctrine as Divine, and, having been illuminated by the Holy Spirit, have looked well into it, discover true wisdom in it. They take in not only the plain history of Christ, and him crucified, but discern the deep and admirable designs of the Divine wisdom therein. Though what we preach be foolishness to the world, it is wisdom to them; they are made wise by it, and can discern wisdom in it. Note, Those who are wise themselves are the only proper judges of what is wisdom; "not indeed the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, but the wisdom of God in a mystery," ver. 6, 7. Not worldly wisdom, but Divine; not such as the men of this world could have discovered, nor such as worldly men, under the conduct of pride, and passion, and appetite, and worldly interest, and destitute of the Spirit of God, can receive. Note, How different is the judgment of God from that of the world! "He seeth not as man seeth." The wisdom he teacheth is of a quite different kind from what passeth under that notion in the world. It is not the wisdom of politicians, nor philosophers, nor rabbies, (see ver. 9); not such as they teach, nor such as they relish, "but the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom of God; what he had a long time kept to himself, and concealed from the world; and the depth of which, now it is revealed, none but himself can fathom." "It is the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, though now made manifest to the saints," Col. i. 26; hid in a manner entirely from the heathen world, and made mysterious (in part) to the Jews, by being wrapt up in dark types, and distant prophecies, but revealed and made known to us by the Spirit of God. Note, The privilege of those who enjoy the gospel revelation; to them types are unveiled, mysteries made plain, prophecies interpreted, and the secret counsels of God published and laid open. The wisdom of God in a mystery is now made manifest to the saints. Now concerning this wisdom observe,

First. The rise and original of it. "It was ordained of God, before the world, to our glory," ver. 7; it was ordained of God. He had determined long ago to reveal and make it known, from many ages past, from the beginning, nay, from eternity; and that to our glory, the glory of us, either us apostles, or us Christians. It was great honour put upon the apostles to be intrusted with the revelation of this wisdom; it was a great and honourable privilege for Christians to have this glorious wisdom discovered to them; and the wisdom of God discovered in the Gospel, the Divine wisdom taught by the Gospel, prepares for our everlasting glory and happiness in the world to come. The counsels of God concerning our redemption are dated from eternity, and designed for the glory and happiness of the saints. And what deep wisdom was in these counsels! Note, The wisdom of God is both employed and displayed for the honour of his saints; employed from eternity, and displayed in time, to make them glorious both here and hereafter, in time and to eternity. What honour doth he put on his saints.

Secondly. The ignorance of the great men of the world about it; "Which none of the princes of this world knew," ver. 8, the principal men in authority and power, or in wisdom and learning. The Roman governor, and the guides and rulers of the Jewish church and nation, seem to be the persons here chiefly meant. These were the princes of this world, or this age, "who, had they known" this true and heavenly wisdom, "would not have crucified the Lord of glory." This Pilate and the Jewish rulers literally did when our Redeemer was crucified upon the sentence of the one and the clamorous demands of the other. Observe, Jesus Christ is the Lord of glory, a title much too great for any creature to bear; and therefore was he hated, because he was not known. Had his crucifiers known him, known who and what he was, they would have withheld their impious hands, and not have taken and slain him. This he pleaded with his Father for their pardon; "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," Lu. xxiii. 34. Note, There are many things which people would not do, if they knew the wisdom of God in the great work of redemption. They act as they do because they are blind or heedless; they know not the truth, or will not attend to it, [and for this ignorance are they justly condemned.]

Thirdly. It is such wisdom as could not have been discovered without a revelation, according to what the prophet Isaiah saith; Isa. lxiv. 4, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him;" for him that waiteth for him, that waiteth for his mercy; as the Seventy. [The apostle does not here quote literally; he gives the general sense of the passage.] It was a testimony of love to God in Jewish believers to live in expectation of the accomplishment of evangelical promises. Waiting upon God is an evidence of love to him; "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him," Isa. xxv. 9. Observe, There are "things which God hath prepared for them that love him," and wait for him. There are such things prepared in a future life for them; things which sense cannot discover, no present information can convey to our ears, nor can yet enter our hearts. "Life and immortality are brought to light through the Gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10; but the apostle speaks here of the subject matter of the Divine revelation under the Gospel; these are such as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard. Observe, The great truths of the Gospel are things lying out of the sphere of [mere] human discovery; "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard them, nor have they entered into the heart of man;" [they were utterly unknown to fallen man.] Were they objects of sense, could they be discovered by an eye of reason, and communicated by the ear to the mind, as matters of common human knowledge may, there had been no need of a revelation. But lying out of the sphere of nature, we cannot discover them but by the light of revelation; and therefore we must take them as they lie in the Scriptures, and as God has been pleased to reveal them.

Fourthly. We here see by whom this wisdom is discovered to us; "God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit," ver. 10. The Scripture is given by inspiration of God; "Holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" 2 Pet. i. 21; and the apostles spake by inspiration of the same Spirit as he taught them, and gave them utterance. Here is a proof of the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures. Paul wrote what he taught, and what he taught was revealed of God by his Spirit; "That Spirit that searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God, and knows the things of God, as the spirit of a man that is in him knows the things of a man," ver. 11. A double argument is drawn from these words in proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost. 1. Omniscience is attributed to him; "He searcheth all things, even the deep things of God." He has exact knowledge of all things, and enters into the very depths of God, penetrates into his most secret counsels. Now, who can have such a thorough knowledge of God but God? 2. This allusion seems to imply, that the Holy Spirit is as much in God as a man's mind is in himself. Now the mind of the man is plainly essential to him; he cannot be without his mind, nor can God be without his Spirit. He is as much and as intimately one with God, as the man's mind is with the man. The man knows his own mind, because his mind is one with himself. The Spirit of God knows the things of God, because he is one with God. And as no man can come at the knowledge of what is in another man's mind till he communicates and reveals it, so neither can we know the secret counsels and purposes of God till they are made known to us by his Holy Spirit. We cannot know them at all till he has proposed them objectively, as it is called, in the external revelation; we cannot know or believe them to salvation till he enlightens the faculty, opens the eye of the mind, and gives us such a knowledge and [saving] faith of them. And it was by his Spirit that the apostles had received the wisdom of God in a mystery, which they spake. "Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things freely given to us of God," ver. 12; not the spirit which is in the wise men of the world, ver. 6, nor in the rulers of the world, ver. 9, "but the Spirit which is of God," or proceedeth from God. We have what we deliver in the name of God by inspiration from him; and it is by his gracious illumination and influence that we know the things freely given to us of God unto salvation, that is, the great privileges of the Gospel, which are the free gift of God, distributions of mere and rich grace. Though these things are given us, and the revelation of this gift be made to us, we cannot know them to any saving purpose till we have the Spirit. The apostles had the revelation of these things from the Spirit of God, and the saving impression of them from the same Spirit. [And all God's people are taught these truths of the Spirit, and have from the Spirit the same saving impressions.]

Fifthly. We see here in what a manner this wisdom was taught or communicated; "Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth," ver. 13. They had received the wisdom they taught, not from the wise men of the world, not from their own inquiry or invention, but from the Spirit of God. Nor did they put a human dress on it, but plainly declared the doctrine of Christ in terms also taught them by the Holy Spirit. He not only gave them the knowledge of these things, but gave them utterance. Observe, The truths of God need no garnishing by human skill or eloquence, but look best in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth. The Spirit of God knows much better how to speak of the things of God than the best critics, orators, or philosophers. "Comparing spiritual things with spiritual;" that is, one part of revelation with another; the revelation of the Gospel with that of the Jews; the discoveries of the New Testament with the types and prophecies of the Old. The comparing matters of revelation with matters of science, things supernatural with things natural and common, is going by a wrong measure. Spiritual things, when brought together, will help to illustrate one another: but if the principles of human art and science are to be made a test of revelation we shall certainly judge amiss concerning it, and the things contained in it. Or, "adapting spiritual things to spiritual." Speaking of spiritual matters, matters of revelation, and the spiritual life, in language that is proper and plain. [The sense of the passage seems to be interpreting things spiritual by things spiritual.] The language of the Spirit of God is the most proper to convey his meaning.

Sixthly. We have an account how this wisdom is received.

1. "The natural man receiveth not the things of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned," ver. 14. The natural man, the animal man. Either the man under the power of corruption, and never yet illuminated by the Spirit of God, such as St. Jude calls sensual, "not having the Spirit," ver. 19. Men unsanctified receive not the things of God. The understanding, through the corruption of nature by the fall, and through the confirmation of this disorder by customary sin, is utterly unapt to receive the rays of Divine light; it is prejudiced against them. The truths of God are foolishness to such a mind. The man looks on them as trifling and impertinent things, not worth minding. "The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not," Jno. i. 5. Not that the natural faculty of discerning is lost, but evil inclinations and wicked principles render the man unwilling [nay, unable] to enter into the mind of God, in the

i. 23. "Stumbling-block;" an occasion of offence.

i. 24. "The power and wisdom of God;" and therefore affording a real sign and wisdom. (Compare next verse.)

ii. 3. Compare Acts xviii. 1-18 for the difficulties Paul had to encounter during his visit, and compare 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16, written during this visit.

ii. 4, 5. "Demonstration of the Spirit and of power;" i.e., demonstration springing from the Spirit and power of God. "That your faith may be grounded on, owe its origin and stability to, the power of God" (Alford).

ii. 6. "The 'perfect' is St. Paul's expression for those who had attained the maturity of Christian wisdom. Such men could understand that his teaching was in truth the highest philosophy." Others take "the wisdom" to mean the higher truths of Christianity.

ii. 7. "We speak as dealing with a mystery;" i.e., not something to be kept hidden, but what heretofore was so, but is now revealed.

spiritual matters of his kingdom, and yield to their force and power. It is the quickening beams of the Spirit of truth and holiness that must help [or rather fit] the mind to discern their excellency, and to so thorough a conviction of their truth as heartily to receive and embrace them. Thus the natural man, the man destitute of the Spirit of God, cannot know them, "because they are spiritually discerned." Or, the natural man; that is, "the wise men of the world," ch. i. 19, 20; the "wise man after the flesh," or "according to the flesh," ver. 26; one who hath "the wisdom of the world, man's wisdom," ch. ii. 4, 6; a man, as some of the ancients, that would learn all truth by his own ratiocinations, receive nothing by faith, nor own any need of supernatural assistance. This was very much the character of the pretenders to philosophy, and the Grecian learning and wisdom at that day. Such a man receives not the things of the Spirit of God; revelation is not with him a principle of science; he looks upon it as delirium and dotage, the extravagant thought of some deluded dreamer. It is no way to wisdom among the famous masters of the world; and for that reason he can have no knowledge [savingly] of things revealed, "because they are only spiritually discerned," or made known by the revelation of the Spirit, which is a principle of science or knowledge which he will not admit.

2. "But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged," or discerned, "of no man," ver. 15. Either he who is sanctified and made spiritually minded, Rom. viii. 6, judgeth all things, or discerneth all things; he is capable of judging [rightly] about matters of human wisdom, and has also a relish and savour of Divine truths. He sees Divine wisdom, and experiences Divine power in Gospel revelations and mysteries, which the carnal and unsanctified mind looks upon as weakness and folly; as things destitute of all power, and not worthy any regard. It is the sanctified mind that must discern the real beauties of holiness; but by the refinement of its faculties they do not lose their power of discerning and judging about common and natural things. The spiritual man may judge of all things, natural and supernatural, human and Divine, the deductions of reason, and the discoveries of revelation. But he himself is judged, or discerned, of no man. God's saints are his hidden ones, Ps. lxxxiii. 3; "Their life is hid with Christ in God," Col. iii. 3. The carnal man knows no more of a spiritual man than he doth of other spiritual things. He is a stranger to the principles, and pleasures, and actings of the Divine life. The spiritual man doth not lie open to his observation. Or, "he that is spiritual;" that is, has had Divine revelations made to him, or received them as such, and founds his faith and religion upon them. He can judge both of common things, and things Divine; he can discern what is and what is not the doctrine of the Gospel, and of salvation; and whether a man preaches the truths of God or not. He doth not lose the power of reasoning, nor renounce the principles of it, by founding his faith and religion on revelation. But "he himself is judged of no man;" can be judged, so as to be confuted, by no man; nor can any man who is not spiritual, not under a Divine afflatus himself, (see ch. xiv. 37), or not founding his faith on a Divine revelation, discern or judge whether what he speaks be true or Divine, or not. In short, he who founds all his knowledge upon principles of science, and the mere light of reason, can never be a judge of the truth or falsehood of what is received by revelation. "For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him?" ver. 16; that is, the spiritual man. Who can enter so far into the mind of God as to instruct him who hath the Spirit of God, is under his inspiration? He only is the person to whom God immediately communicates the knowledge of his will. And who can inform or instruct him in the mind of God who is so immediately under the conduct of his own Spirit? Very few [or rather none] have known any thing of the mind of God by a natural power. "But," adds the apostle, "we have the mind of Christ;" and the mind of Christ is the mind of God; he is God, and the principal messenger and prophet of God. And the apostles were empowered by his Spirit to make known his mind to us. And in the Holy Scriptures, the mind of Christ, and the mind of God in Christ, is fully revealed to us. Observe, It is the great privilege of Christians that they have the mind of Christ revealed to them by his Spirit.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Blames the Corinthians for their carnality and divisions, ver. 1-4. II. He instructs them how what was amiss among them might be rectified, by remembering, 1. That their ministers were no more than ministers, ver. 5. 2. That they were unanimous, and carried on the same design, ver. 5-10. 3. That they built on one and the same foundation, ver. 11-16. III. He exhorts them to give due honour to their bodies, by keeping them pure, ver. 16, 17; and to humility and self-diffidence, ver. 18-21. IV. And exhorts them from glorying in particular ministers, because of the equal interest they had in all, ver. 22, 23.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. 2 I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. 3 For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? 4 For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos: are ye not carnal?

Here, First, St. Paul blames the Corinthians for their weakness and non-proficiency. They who are sanctified are so only in part: there is still room for growth and increase, both in grace and knowledge, 2 Pet. iii. 18. Those who through Divine grace are renewed to a spiritual life may yet in many things be defective. The apostle tells them he could not speak to them as unto spiritual men, but as unto carnal men, as to babes in Christ, ver. 1. They were so far from forming their maxims and measures [entirely] upon the foot of Divine revelation, and entering into the spirit of the Gospel, that it was but too evident they were much under the command of carnal and corrupt affections. They were still very babes in Christ. They had received some of the first principles of Christianity, but were grown up to no maturity of understanding in them, or of faith and holiness. And yet it is plain from several passages in this epistle that the Corinthians were very proud of their wisdom and knowledge. Note, That it is but too common for persons of very moderate [spiritual] knowledge and understanding to have a great measure of self-conceit. The apostle assigns their little proficiency in the knowledge of Christianity as a reason why he had communicated no more of the deep things of it to them. They could not bear such food; they needed to be fed with milk, not with meat, ver. 2. Note, It is the duty of a faithful minister of Christ to consult the capacities of his hearers, and teach them as they can bear. And yet it is natural for babes to grow up to men; and babes in Christ should [prayerfully] endeavour to grow in stature, and become men in Christ. It is expected that their advances in knowledge should be in proportion to their means and opportunities, and their time of professing religion; that they may be able to bear discourses of the mysteries of our religion, and not always rest in plain things. It was a reproach to the Corinthians that they had so long sat under the ministry of St. Paul and had made no more improvement in Christian knowledge. Note, Christians are utterly to blame who do not endeavour to grow in grace and knowledge.

Secondly, He blames them for their carnality, and gives their contention and discord about their ministers as evidence of it. "For ye are yet carnal; for whereas there are among you envyings, and strifes, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?" ver. 2. They had mutual emulations, and quarrels, and factions among them upon the account of their ministers; while one said, "I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos," ver. 4. These were proofs of their being carnal; and fleshly interests and affections too much swayed them. Note, Contentions and quarrels about religion are sad evidences of remaining carnality. True religion makes men peaceable, and not contentious. Factious spirits act upon human principles, not upon principles of true religion; they are guided by their own pride and passions, and not by rules of Christianity; "Do ye not walk as men?" Note, It is to be lamented that many who should walk as Christians, that is, above the common rate of men, do indeed walk as men, live and act too much like other men. [It is necessary however to distinguish between such carnal contentions and contentions for the faith once delivered to the saints. A spurious charity has often been a snare of the devil.]

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man? 6 I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. 7 So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase. 8 Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. 9 For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. 10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

Here the apostle instructs them how to cure this humour, and rectify what was amiss among them upon this head.

First, By remembering that the ministers about whom they contended were but ministers [or servants]; "Who then is Paul, or who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" ver. 5. But ministers; no more than instruments used by the God of all grace. Some of the factious people in Corinth seem to have made more of them, as if they were lords of their faith, authors of their religion. Note, We should take care not to deify ministers, or put them into the place of God. Apostles were not the authors of our faith and religion, though they were authorized and qualified to reveal and propagate it. They acted in this office "as God gave to every man."

Observe, All the gifts and powers that even apostles discovered and exerted in the work of the ministry were from God. They were intended to manifest their mission and doctrine to be Divine. It was perfectly wrong upon their account to transfer that regard to the apostles which was solely to be paid to the Divine authority by which they acted, and to God from whom they had their authority. "Paul had planted, and Apollos had watered," ver. 6. Both were useful, one for one purpose, the other for a different. Note, God makes use of a variety of instruments, and fits them to their several use and intention. Paul was fitted for planting work, and Apollos for watering work; but "God gave the increase." Note, The success of the ministry must be derived from the Divine blessing. "Neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase," ver. 7. Even apostolical ministers are nothing of themselves, can do nothing with efficacy and success unless God give the increase. Note, The best qualified and most faithful ministers have a just sense of their own insufficiency, and are very desirous that God should have all the glory of their success. Paul and Apollos are nothing at all in their own account, but God is all in all.

Secondly, By representing to them the unanimity of Christ's ministers; "He that planteth, and he that watereth, are one," ver. 8. Employed by one master, [guided by one Spirit,] intrusted with the same revelation, busied in one work, and engaged in one design; in harmony with one another, however they may be set in opposition to each other by factious party-makers. They have their different gifts from one and the same Spirit for the very same purposes; and they heartily carry on the same design. Planters and waterers are but fellow-labourers in the same work.

Note, All the faithful ministers of Christ are one in the great business and intentions of their ministry. They may have difference of sentiment in lesser things; they may have their debates and contests; but they heartily concur in the great design of honouring God and saving souls, by promoting true Christianity in the world. And all such may expect a glorious recompence of their fidelity, and in proportion to it. "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour." Their business is one, but some may mind it more than others; their end and design is one, but some may pursue it more

ii. 9, 10. Some connect thus: "But (opposition to verse 8) the things that eye . . . to us God revealed." Others connect verse 7 thus: "We speak God's wisdom, which none of the princes knew . . . yea, which no eye hath . . . but God hath revealed," &c. The frequent application of these words to heaven is clearly untenable. The quotation seems based upon Isa. lxi. 4, and perhaps lv. 17.

ii. 13. "Interpreting spiritual things to the spiritual, leading to the introduction of the natural and spiritual immediately after."

ii. 14. "He now prepares the way for showing them that he could not give out the depths of this spiritual wisdom to them, because they were not fitted for it, being carnal (chap. iii. 1-4). "The natural man:" it is the adjective corresponding to the Greek noun for "soul," and means the man whose governing principle is the animal soul as distinguished from the spirit, the higher part, and the sphere of the operations of God's Holy Spirit.

ii. 16. "The judgment of the spiritual man on the part of him closely than others. Their Master also is one, and yet this good and gracious Master may make a difference in the rewards he gives, according to the different service they do. "Every one's own work shall have its own reward." They that work hardest shall have best; they that are most faithful shall have the greatest reward; and glorious work it is, in which all faithful ministers are employed. "They are labourers with God," συνεργοί, co-workers, "fellow-labourers," ver. 9, not indeed in the same order and degree, but in subordination to him, as instruments in his hand. They are engaged in his business; they are working together with God, in promoting the purposes of his glory, and the salvation of precious souls; and he who knows their work will take care they do not labour in vain. Men may neglect and vilify one minister, whilst they cry up another, and have no reason for either; they may condemn when they should commend, and applaud what they should neglect and avoid; but the judgment of God is according to truth. He never rewards but upon just reason, and he ever rewards in proportion to the diligence and faithfulness of his servants. Note, Faithful ministers, when they are ill used by men, should encourage themselves in God. And it is to God, the chief agent and director of the great work of the Gospel, to whom they that labour with him should endeavour to approve themselves; they are always under his eye, employed in his husbandry and building; and therefore to be sure he will carefully look over them. "Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building;" and therefore are neither of Paul nor of Apollos; neither belong to one nor other, but to God; they only plant and water you, but it is the Divine blessing on his own husbandry that alone can make it yield fruit. Ye are not our husbandry but God's; we work under him, and with him, and for him; it is all for God that we have been doing amongst you. You are God's husbandry and building. He had spoken to the former metaphor before, and now he goes on to the other of a building. "According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon." Paul here calls himself a wise master-builder; a character doubly reflecting honour on him. It was honourable to be a master builder in the edifice of God, but it added to his character to be a wise one. Persons may be in an office for which they are not qualified, or not so thoroughly qualified as this expression implies Paul was. But, though he gives himself such a character, it is not to gratify his own pride, but to magnify Divine grace. He was a wise master-builder, but the grace of God made him such. Note, It is no crime in a Christian, but much to his commendation, to take notice of the good that is in him, to the praise of Divine grace. Spiritual pride is abominable; it is making use of the greatest favours of God to feed our own vanity, and make idols of ourselves; but to take notice of the favours of God, to promote our gratitude to him, and to speak of them to his honour, be they of what sort they will, is but a proper expression of the [love] duty and regard we owe him. Note, Ministers should not be proud of their gifts and graces; but the better qualified they are for their work, and the more success they have in it, the more thankful should they be to God for his distinguishing goodness. "I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon." As before he had said, "I have planted, Apollos watered." It was Paul laid the foundation of a church amongst them. He had begotten them through the Gospel, ch. iv. 19. Whatever instructors they had besides, they had not many fathers. He would derogate from none that had done service amongst them, nor would he be robbed of his own honour and respect. Note, Faithful ministers may and ought to have a concern for their own reputation. Their usefulness depends much upon it. "But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon." This is a proper caution; there may be very indifferent building on a good foundation. It is easy to err here, and great care should be used, not only to lay a sure and right foundation, but to erect a regular building upon it. Nothing must be laid upon it but what the foundation will bear, and what is of a piece with it. Gold and dirt must not be mingled together. Note, Ministers of Christ should take great care that they do not build their own fancies or false reasonings on the foundation of Divine revelations. What they preach should be the plain doctrine of their Master, or what is perfectly agreeable with it.

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. 12 Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; 13 Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. 14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. 15 If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

Here the apostle informs us what foundation he had laid at the bottom of all his labours among them, even Jesus Christ, the chief corner-stone, Eph. ii. 20. Upon this foundation all the faithful ministers of Christ build; upon this rock all Christians found their hopes. They that build their hopes of heaven on any other foundation build upon the sand. "Other foundation can no man lay, besides what is laid, even Jesus Christ." Note, The doctrine of our Saviour, [his incarnation, divinity, vicarious atonement—perfect and meritorious righteousness—in short, his prophetic and priestly offices,] and his mediation, [and his mediatorial royalty,] is the principal doctrine of Christianity. It lies at the bottom, and is the foundation of all the rest. Leave out this, and you lay waste all our comforts, and leave no foundation for our hopes, as sinners. It is in Christ only that God is reconciling a sinful world to himself, 2 Cor. v. 19. But of those that hold the foundation, and embrace the general doctrine of Christ's being the Mediator between God and man, there are two sorts:

First, Some build upon this foundation gold, silver, and precious stones, ver. 12; namely, those who receive and propagate the pure truths of the Gospel; that hold nothing but the truth as it is in Jesus, and preach nothing else. This is building well upon a good foundation, making all of a piece; when ministers not only depend upon Christ as the great prophet of the church, and take him for their guide and infallible teacher, but receive and spread the doctrines he taught in their purity, without any corrupt mixtures, without adding or diminishing.

Secondly, Others build wood, hay, and stubble on this foundation, that is, though they adhere to the foundation, they depart from the mind of Christ in many particulars; substitute their own fancies and inventions [such as forms, ceremonies, and human commandments taught as doctrines] in the room of his doctrines and institutions, and build upon the good foundation what will not abide the test, when the day of trial comes, and the fire must make it manifest; as wood, hay, and stubble, will not bear the trial by fire, but must be consumed in it. There is a time coming when a discovery will be made of what men have built on this foundation. "Every man's work shall be made manifest;" shall be laid open to view, to his own and that of others. Some may in the simplicity of their hearts build wood and stubble on the good foundation, and know not all the while what they have been doing; but in the day of the Lord their own conduct shall appear to them in its proper light. Every man's work shall be made manifest to himself, and made manifest to others, both those that have been misled by him and those that have escaped his errors. Now we may be mistaken in ourselves and others, but there is a day coming that will cure all our mistakes, and shew us ourselves, and shew us our actions in the true light, without covering or disguise. "For the day shall declare it," namely, every man's work, "because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is," ver. 13. The day shall declare and make it manifest, the last day, the great day of trial: see ch. iv. 5. Though some understand it of the time when the Jewish nation was destroyed, and their constitution thereby abolished, when the superstructure Judaizing teachers would have raised on the Christian foundation was manifested to be no better than hay and stubble, that would not bear the trial. The expression carries in it a plain allusion to the refiner's art, in which the fire separates and distinguishes the dross from the gold and silver; as it also will silver, and gold, and precious stones, that will endure the fire, from wood, and hay, and stubble, that will be consumed in it. Note, There is a day coming that will as nicely distinguish one man from another, and one man's work from another's, as the fire distinguishes gold from dross, or metal that will bear the fire from other materials that will be consumed in it. In that day,

1. Some men's works will abide the trial, will be found standard. It will appear that they not only held the foundation, but that they built regularly and well upon it; that they laid on proper materials, and in due form and order. The foundation and the superstructure were all of a piece. The foundation truths, and those that had a manifest connexion with them, were taught together. It may not be so easy to discern this connexion now, nor know what works will abide the trial then; but that day will make a full discovery. And such a builder shall not, cannot fail of a reward. He will have praise and honour in that day, and eternal recompence after it. Note, Fidelity in the ministers of Christ will meet with full and ample rewards in a future life. They who spread true and pure religion in all the branches of it, and whose work will abide in the great day, shall receive a reward. And, Lord, how great, how much exceeding their [poor] deserts!

2. There are others whose works shall be burned, ver. 15; whose corrupt opinions and doctrines, or vain inventions and usages in the worship of God, shall be discovered, disowned, and rejected in that day; shall be first manifested to be corrupt, and then disapproved of God, and rejected. Note, The great day will pluck off all disguises, and make things appear as they are. "He whose work shall be burnt will suffer loss." If he has built upon the right foundation wood, and hay, and stubble, he will suffer loss. His weakness and corruption will be the lessening of his glory, though he may in the general have been an honest and an upright Christian. This part of his work will be lost, turning no way to his advantage, though "himself may be saved." Observe, Those who hold the foundation of Christianity, though they build hay, wood, and stubble upon it, may be saved. This may help to enlarge our charity. We should not reprobate men for their weakness, [provided they give evidence otherwise of being in Christ,] for nothing will damn men but wickedness, [that is, his not being in Christ.] "He shall be saved, yet so as by fire," saved out of the fire. Himself shall be snatched out of that flame which will consume his work. It intimates that it will be difficult for those that [in any degree] corrupt and deprave Christianity to be saved. God will have no mercy on their works, though he may pluck them as brands out of the burning. On this passage of Scripture the papists found their doctrine of purgatory, which is certainly hay and stubble; a doctrine never originally fetched from Scripture, but invented in barbarous ages to feed the avarice and ambition of the clergy, at their cost who would rather part with their money than their lusts for the salvation of their souls. It can have no countenance from this text, 1st. Because this is plainly meant of a figurative fire, not of a real one; for what real fire can consume religious rites or doctrines? 2nd. Because this fire is to try men's works of what sort they are; but purgatory fire is not for trial, not to bring men's actions to the test, but to punish for them. They are supposed to be venial sins not satisfied for in this life, for which satisfaction must be made by suffering the fire of purgatory. 3rd. Because this fire is to try every man's works, those of Paul and Apollos as well as those of others. Now, no papists will have the front to say, apostles must have passed through purgatory fires.

16 Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? 17 If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Here the apostle resumes his argument and exhortation, founding it on his former allusion, "Ye are God's building," ver. 9; and here, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile, that is, corrupt and destroy, 'the temple of God, him shall God destroy,' (the same word is in the original in both clauses,) 'for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.'" It looks from other parts of the epistle, where the apostle argues to the very same purpose, (see ch. vi. 13–20), as if the false teachers among the Corinthians were not only loose livers, but taught licentious doctrines, and what was particularly fitted to the taste in this lewd city on the head of fornication. Such doctrine was not to be reckoned among hay and stubble, that would be consumed whilst the person who laid them on the foundation escaped the burning; for it tended to corrupt, to pollute, and destroy the church, which was a building erected for God, and consecrated to him, and therefore should be kept pure and holy. Those who spread principles of this sort would provoke God to destroy them.

Note, Those who spread loose principles, that have a direct tendency to pollute the church of God, and render it unholly and unclean, are likely to bring destruction on themselves. It may be understood also as an argument against their discord and factious strifes; division being the way to destruction. But what I have been mentioning seems to be the proper meaning of the passage: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" It may be understood of the church of Corinth collectively, or of every single believer amongst them. Christian churches are temples of God. He dwells amongst them by his Holy Spirit. "They are built together who is not spiritual would require such a knowledge of the mind of the Lord as would qualify a person to instruct the Lord himself; since the persons who are to be judged are such as have the mind of Christ, inasmuch as his spirit dwelling in them and directing their thought, fashions them to his mind, and identifies their thinking with his thinking."

iii. 1. See chap. ii. 6–14; Heb. v. 14. "Carnal:" rather, "men of flesh." Paul is referring to his ministry at Corinth, when he was compelled to confine himself to elementary teaching. He turns to their present condition at the end of verse 2, and what he blames is that they are still fleshly, and not capable of food for men.

iii. 5. "Apollos:" a Jew from Alexandria, mighty in the Scriptures, but instructed according to the imperfect views of the disciples of John the Baptist, and more perfectly taught by Aquila and Priscilla. (See Acts xviii. 25.) Afterwards he became a preacher in Corinth. There seems to have been perfect harmony between him for an habitation of God through the Spirit," Eph. ii. 22. Every Christian is a living temple of the living God. God dwelt in the Jewish temple, took possession of it and resided in it, by that glorious cloud that was the token of his presence with that people. So Christ by his Spirit dwells in all true believers. The temple was devoted and consecrated to God, and set apart from every common to a holy use, to the immediate service of God. So all Christians are separate from common uses, and set apart for God and his service. They are sacred to him. A very good argument thus against all fleshly lusts, and all doctrines that give countenance to them. If we are the temples of God we must do nothing that shall alienate ourselves from him, or corrupt and pollute ourselves, and thereby unfit ourselves for his use; and we must hearken to no doctrine nor doctor that would seduce us to any such practices. Note, Christians are holy by profession, and should be pure and clean, both in heart and conversation. We should heartily abhor, and carefully avoid, what will defile God's temple, and prostitute what ought to be sacred to him.

18 Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. 19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. 20 And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

Here he prescribes humility, and a modest opinion of themselves for a remedy of the irregularities in the church of Corinth, the divisions and contentions among them. "Let no man deceive himself," ver. 18; that is, Do not be led away from the truth and simplicity of the Gospel by pretenders to science and eloquence, by a show of deep learning, or a flourish of words, by rabbies, orators, or philosophers. Note, We are in great danger of deceiving ourselves when we have too high an opinion of human wisdom and arts. Plain and pure Christianity will be likely to be despised by those who can suit their doctrines to the corrupt taste of their hearers, and set them off with fine language, or support them with a show of deep and strong reasoning. But he who seems to be wise must become a fool, that he may be wise. He must be sensible of his own ignorance, and lament it; he must distrust his own understanding, and not lean on it. To have a high opinion of our own wisdom is but to flatter ourselves; and self-flattery is the very next step to self-deceit. The way to true wisdom is to sink our opinion of our own to a due level, and be willing to be taught of God. He must become a fool [in his own estimation] who would be truly and thoroughly wise. The person who resigns his own understanding, that he may follow the instruction of God, is in the way to true and everlasting wisdom, [which no man does until he is born again.] "The meek will he guide in judgment, the meek will he teach his way," Ps. xxv. 9. He that has a low opinion of his own knowledge and powers will submit to better information; such a person may be informed and improved by revelation; but the proud man, conceited of his own wisdom and understanding, will undertake to correct even Divine wisdom itself, and prefer his own shallow reasonings to the revelations of infallible truth and wisdom. Note, We must abase ourselves before God if we would either be truly wise or good. "For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God," ver. 19. The wisdom which worldly men esteem, policy, philosophy, oratory, is foolishness with God. It is so in a way of comparison with his wisdom. "He chargeth his angels with folly," Job iv. 18; and much more the wisest among the children of men. "His understanding is infinite," Ps. cxlvii. 5. There can be no more comparison between his wisdom and ours than between his power and being and ours. There is no common measure by which to compare finite and infinite. And much more is the wisdom of man foolishness with God, when in competition with his. How justly doth he despise, how easily can he baffle and confound it. "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness," as it is written, Job v. 13; he catches them in their own nets, and entangles them in their own snares; he turns their most studied, and plausible, and promising schemes against themselves, and ruins them in their own contrivance. Nay, "He knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain," ver. 20; that they are vanity, Ps. xciv. 11. Note, That God has a perfect knowledge of the thoughts of men, the deepest thoughts of the wisest men, their most secret counsels and purposes. Nothing is hidden from him, but all things are naked and bare before him, Heb. iv. 13; and he knows them to be vanity. The thoughts of the wisest men in the world have a great mixture of vanity, of weakness and folly in them; and before God their very wisest and best thoughts are very vanity, compared, I mean, with his thoughts of things. And should not all this teach us modesty, diffidence in ourselves, and a deference to the wisdom of God; make us thankful for his revelations, and willing to be taught of God, and not be led away by specious pretences to human wisdom and skill from the simplicity of Christ, or a regard to his heavenly doctrine? Note, Who would be wise indeed must learn of God, and not set his own wisdom up in competition with God's.

21 Therefore let no man glory in men. For all things are your's; 22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are your's; 23 And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

Here the apostle founds an exhortation against overvaluing their teachers on what he had just said, and for that they had an equal interest in all their ministers. "Therefore let no man glory in men," ver. 21; forget that their ministers are men, or pay that deference to them as is due only to God; set them at the head of parties, have them in immoderate esteem and admiration, and servilely and implicitly follow their conduct or submit to their dictates; and especially in contradiction to God, and the truths taught by his Holy Spirit. Mankind are very apt to make the mercies of God cross their intentions. The ministry is a very useful and very gracious institution; and faithful ministers are a great blessing [and gift from God] to any people; and yet the folly and weakness of people may do much mischief by what is in itself a blessing. They may fall into factions, side with particular ministers, and set them at their head, glory in their leaders, and be carried by them they know not whither. The only way to avoid this mischief is to have a modest [and humble] opinion of ourselves, a due sense of the common weakness of human understanding, and an entire deference to the wisdom of God speaking in his word. Ministers are not to be set up in competition with one another. All faithful ministers are serving one

Lord and pursuing one purpose. They were appointed of Christ for the common benefit of the church. "Paul, and Apollos, and Cephas, are all yours." One is not to be set up against another, but all are to be valued and used for your own spiritual benefit. Upon this occasion also he gives in an inventory of the church's possessions, the spiritual riches of a true believer: "All is yours." Ministers of all ranks, ordinary and extraordinary; nay, the world itself is yours. Not that saints are proprietors of the world, but it stands for their sake; they have as much of it as Infinite Wisdom sees to be fit for them, and they have all they have with the Divine blessing. Life is yours, that you may have season and opportunity to prepare for the life of heaven; and death is yours, that you may go to the possession of it. It is the kind messenger that will fetch you to your Father's house. Things present are yours for your support on the road. Things to come are yours, to enrich and regale you for ever at your journey's end. Note, That if we belong to Christ, and are true to him, all good belongs to us and is sure to us. All is ours, time and eternity, earth and heaven, life and death. We shall want no good thing, Ps. lxxxiv. 11. But it must be remembered at the same time that we are Christ's, the subjects of his kingdom, his property. He is Lord over us, [he received us from his Father, he purchased us with his blood,] and we must own his dominion, and cheerfully submit to his command, and yield ourselves to his pleasure, if we would have all things minister to our advantage. All things are ours upon no other foot than our being Christ's. Out of him we are without just title or claim to any thing that is good. Note, They that would be safe for time, and happy to eternity, must be Christ's. "And Christ is God's." He is the Christ of God, anointed of God, and commissioned by him [from all eternity] to bear the office of Mediator, and to act therein for the purposes of his glory. Note, All things are the believer's, that Christ might have honour in his great undertaking, and God in all might have the glory. God in Christ reconciling a sinful world [his people] to himself, and shedding abroad the riches of his grace on a reconciled world, is the sum and substance of the Gospel.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Directs them how to account of him and his fellow-ministers, and therein tacitly, at least, reproves them for their unworthy carriage towards him, ver. 1—6. II. He cautions them against pride and self-elation, and hints at the many temptations they had to conceive too highly of themselves, and despise him, and other apostles, because of the great diversity in their circumstances and condition, ver. 7—14. III. He challenges their regard to him as their father in Christ, ver. 15—17. IV. He tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, and of his own purpose to come to them shortly, however some among them had pleased themselves, and grown vain upon the quite contrary expectation, ver. 18—21.

LET a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. 2 Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. 3 But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own self. 4 For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord. 5 Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God. 6 And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another.

Here, First. The apostle challenges the respect due to him, on account of his character and office, in which many among them had at least very much failed; "Let a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God," ver. 1; though possibly others might have valued him too highly by setting him up as the head of a party, and professing to be his disciples. Note, In our opinion of ministers, as well as all other things, we should be careful to avoid extremes. Apostles themselves were, 1. Not to be overvalued, for they were ministers, not masters; stewards, not lords. They were servants of Christ, and no more, though they were servants of the highest rank, that had the care of the household, that were to provide food for the rest, and appoint and direct their work. Note, It is a very great abuse of their power, and highly criminal in common ministers, to lord it over their fellow-servants, and challenge authority over their faith or practice; for even apostles were but servants of Christ, employed in his work, and sent on his errand, and dispensers of the mysteries of God, or those truths which had been hidden from the world in ages and generations past. They had no authority to propagate their own fancies, but to spread Christian faith [truth]. 2. Apostles were not to be undervalued; for, though they were ministers, they were ministers of Christ. The character and dignity of their Master puts an honour on them. Though they are but stewards, they are not stewards of the common things of the world, but of Divine mysteries. They had a great trust, and for that reason had an honourable office. They were stewards of God's household, and St. Paul; but "there may have been difference enough in the outward character and expression of the two to attract the lover of eloquence and philosophy rather to Apollos, somewhat perhaps to the disparagement of Paul."

iii. 10, 11. St. Paul showed his skill in laying a foundation. (Compare Luke vi. 49.) Whoever came after him must build on the same foundation, for there was but one—Jesus Christ. The consideration for those following him was how and with what materials they built thereon; and so he goes on in the next verses to speak of the different ways of building upon it.

iii. 12—14. St. Paul is here speaking of the work of different ministers who are engaged in building parts of one and the same building; the gold, silver, &c., referring to the matter of their teaching. And he declares that each man's work shall be made evident, for the day of the Lord shall make it manifest; "the fire of judgment in which Christ will appear, and by which all works will be tried."

high stewards in his kingdom of grace. They did not set up for masters, but they deserved respect and esteem in this honourable service. Especially.

Secondly. When they did their duty in it, and approved themselves faithful. "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful," ver. 2; trustworthily. The stewards in Christ's family must appoint what he hath appointed; they must not set their fellow-servants to work for themselves; they must not require any thing from them without their Master's warrant; they must not feed them with the chaff of their own inventions, instead of the wholesome food of Christian doctrine and truth; they must teach what he hath commanded, and not the doctrines and commandments of men. They must be true to the interests of their Lord, and consult his honour. Note. The ministers of Christ should make it their hearty and continual endeavour [in dependence on God's grace] to approve themselves trustworthily; and when they have the testimony of a good conscience, and the approbation of their Master, they must slight the opinions and censures of their fellow-servants; "But with me," saith the apostle, "it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment," ver. 3. Indeed, reputation and esteem amongst men is a good step towards usefulness in the ministry; and Paul's whole argument upon this head shews he had a just concern for his own reputation; but he that would make it his chief endeavour to please men would hardly approve himself a servant of Christ, Gal. i. 10. He that would be faithful to Christ must despise the censures of men for his sake. He must look upon it as a very little thing, if his Lord approves him, what judgment men form of him. They may think very meanly or very hardly of him whilst he is doing his duty; but it is not by their judgment he must stand or fall; and happy is it for faithful ministers that they have a more just and candid judge than their fellow-servants; one who knows and pities their imperfections, though he has none of his own. It is better to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of men, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. The best of men are too apt to judge rashly, and hardly, and unjustly; but His judgment is always according to truth. It is a comfort men are not to be our final judges. Nay, we are not thus to judge ourselves; "Yea, I judge not myself; for though I know nothing by myself," cannot charge myself with unfaithfulness, [generally speaking,] "yet am I not hereby justified," this will not clear me of the charge; "but he that judgeth me is the Lord." It is his judgment that must determine me; by his sentence I must abide. Such I am as he shall find and judge me to be. Note. It is not judging well of ourselves, justifying ourselves, that will prove us safe and happy. Nothing will do this, but the acceptance and approbation of our sovereign Judge [and Master]. "Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but he whom the Lord commendeth," 2 Cor. x. 18.

Thirdly. The apostle takes occasion from hence to caution the Corinthians against censoriousness, forward and severe judging of others; "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come," ver. 5. It is judging out of season, and judging at an adventure. He is not to be understood of judging by persons in authority, within the verge of their office; nor of private judging concerning facts that are notorious; but of judging [rashly] persons' future state, or the secret springs and principles of their actions, [when they may not have been unchristian,] or about facts doubtful in themselves. To judge in these cases, and give decisive sentence, is to assume the seat of God, and challenge his prerogative. Note. How bold a sinner is the forward and severe censurer! How ill-timed and arrogant are his censures! but there is One who will judge the censurer and those he censures without prejudice, passion, or partiality; and there is a time coming when men cannot fail of judging right concerning themselves and others by following his judgment. This should make them now cautious of judging others, and careful in judging themselves. There is a time coming, when "the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the heart;" deeds of darkness that are now done in secret, and all the secret inclinations, purposes and intentions of the hidden man of the heart. Note. There is a day coming that will lighten the darkness, and lay open the face of the deep, will fetch men's secret sins into open day, and discover the secrets of their hearts. "The day shall declare it." The Judge will bring these things to light. The Lord Jesus Christ will manifest the counsels of the heart, of all hearts. Note. The Lord Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the counsels of the heart, else he could not make them manifest. This is a Divine prerogative, Jer. xvii. 10; and yet it is what our Saviour challenges to himself in a very peculiar manner, Rev. ii. 23: "All the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts, and will give to every one of you according to your works." Note. We should be very careful how we censure others, [more especially those who seem to be in Christ,] when we have to do with a Judge from whom we cannot conceal ourselves. Others do not lie open to our notice, but we all lie open to his; and when he comes to judge "every man shall have praise of God." "Every man," that is, every one qualified for it, [through grace,] every one who has done well. Though none of God's servants can deserve any thing from him, though there be much that is blamable [and sinful] even in their best services, yet shall their fidelity be commended and crowned by him; and should they be condemned, reproached or vilified by their fellow-servants, he will roll away all such unjust censures and reproaches, and shew them in their own amiable light. Note. Christians may well be patient under unjust censures, when they know such a day as this is coming, especially when they have their consciences testifying to their integrity. But how fearful should they be of loading any with reproaches now, whom their common Judge shall hereafter commend, [as good and faithful servants.]

Fourthly. The apostle here lets us into the reason why he had used his own name and Apollos' in this discourse of his; he had done it in a figure, and he had done it for their sakes. He chose rather to mention his own name, and the name of a faithful fellow-labourer, than the names of any heads of factions amongst them, that thereby he might avoid what would provoke, and so procure his advice the greater regard. Note. Ministers should use prudence in their advices and admonitions, but especially in their reproofs, lest they lose their end. The advice the apostle would by this means inculcate was, "that they might learn not to think of men above what is written, nor be puffed up for one against another," ver. 6; not above what he had been writing, [or what is written in Scripture.] Apostles were not to be esteemed other than planters or waterers in God's husbandry, than master builders in his building, than stewards of his mysteries, and servants of Christ; and common ministers cannot bear these characters in the same sense that apostles did. Note. We must be very careful not to transfer the honour and authority of the master to his servant. We must "call no man master on earth; one is our Master, even Christ," Mat. xxiii. 8, 10. We must not think of them above what is written. Note. The word of God is the best rule by which to judge concerning men; and again, judging rightly concerning men, and not judging more highly of them than is fit, is one way to prevent quarrels and contentions in the churches. Pride commonly lies at the bottom of these quarrels. Self-conceit [or spiritual pride] contributes very much to our immoderate esteem of our teachers, as well as ourselves. Our commendation of our own taste and judgment commonly goes along with our unreasonable applause, and always with a factious adherence to one teacher in opposition to others, that may be equally faithful and well qualified; but to think modestly of ourselves, and not above what is written of our teachers, is the most effectual means to prevent quarrels and contests, sittings and parties in the church. We shall not be puffed up for one against another if we remember that they are all the instruments employed by God in his husbandry and building, and endowed by him with their various talents and qualifications.

7 For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? 8 Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. 9 For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. 10 We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised. 11 Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwellingplace; 12 And labour, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it: 13 Being defamed, we intreat: we are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day.

Here the apostle improves the foregoing hint to a caution against pride and self-conceit, and sets forth the temptations the Corinthians had to despise him, from the difference of their circumstances.

First. He cautions against pride and self-conceit, by this consideration, that all the distinction made among them was owing to God; "Who maketh thee to differ?" ver. 7; "and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" Here the apostle turns his discourse to the ministers who set themselves at the head of these factions, and did but too much encourage and abet the people in those feuds. What had they to glory in when all their peculiar gifts were from God? They had received them, and could not glory in them as their own without wronging God; at the same time as they reflected on them to feed their vanity they should have considered them as so many debts and obligations to Divine bounty and grace. But it may be taken as a general maxim. We have no reason to be proud of our attainments, enjoyments, or performances; all that we have, or are, or do that is good, is owing to the [sovereign] free and rich grace of God. Boasting is for ever excluded. There is nothing we have we can properly call our own; all is received from God. It is foolish in us therefore, and injurious to him, to brag of it; they who receive all should be proud of nothing, Ps. cxv. 1. Beggars and dependants may glory in their supports; but to glory in themselves is to be proud at once of meanness, impotence, and want. Note. That due attention to our obligations to Divine grace would cure us of arrogance and self-conceit.

Secondly. He presses the duty of humility upon them by a very smart irony, or at least reproves them for their pride and self-conceit. "Ye are full, ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us." You have not only a sufficiency, but an affluence of spiritual gifts; nay, you can make them the matter of your glory without us, that is, in mine absence, and without having any need of me. There is a very elegant gradation from sufficiency to wealth, and from thence to royalty, to intimate how much the Corinthians were elated by the [presumed] abundance of their wisdom and spiritual gifts, which was a humour that prevailed among them, whilst the apostle was away from them, and made them forget what an interest he had in all. Note. How apt pride is to overrate benefits, and overlook the benefactor; to swell upon its possessions, and forget from whom they come; nay, it is apt to behold them in a magnifying glass. "You have reigned as kings," saith the apostle, that is, in your own conceit; "and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you." I wish

iii. 14. "If any man's work stand the fire, being of inconsumable materials, he shall be rewarded for his faithful and effectual work as a teacher" (Alford).

iii. 15. "If any man's work consist of such materials as the fire will destroy, he shall be mulcted, but he himself shall be saved (having held and built on the true foundation, Jesus Christ) so as through fire—i.e., as a builder whose building was consumed would escape with personal safety, but with the loss of his work" (Alford).

iv. 1. "Steward:" literally, "manager of a house." See 1 Tim. iii. 15, where the Church is called the house of God. These stewards are to distribute the hidden treasures of God, the riches of his grace. "It may be doubted whether, in the New Testament sense of mysteries, the sacraments can in any way be reckoned as such, for mystery is a (usually Divine) proceeding once hidden, but now revealed, or now hidden and to be revealed, under neither of which categories can the sacraments be classed" (Alford).

you had as much of the true glory of a Christian church upon you as you arrogate to yourselves. I should come in then for a share of the honour; I should reign with you. I should not be overlooked by you as now I am, but valued and regarded as a minister of Christ, and a very useful [and honoured] instrument amongst you. Note, Those do not commonly know themselves best who think best of themselves, who have the highest opinion of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Note, Pride is a great [and fatal] prejudice to our improvement [in things spiritual]. He is stopped from growing wiser or better who thinks himself at the height; not only full, but rich, nay a king.

Thirdly, He comes to set forth his own, and the circumstances of the other apostles, and compares them with theirs. 1. To set forth the case of the apostles. "For I think it hath pleased God to set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men." Paul and his fellow-apostles were exposed to great hardships. Never were any men in this world so hunted and worried. They carried their lives in their hands. "God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death," ver. 9. An allusion is made to some of the bloody spectacles in the Roman amphitheatres, where men were exposed to fight with wild beasts, or to cut one another to pieces to make diversion for the populace; where the victor did not escape with his life, though he should destroy his adversary, but was only reserved for another combat, and must be devoured or cut in pieces at last. So that such wretched criminals (for they were ordinarily condemned persons that were thus exposed) might very properly be called ἐπιδεικνύμενοι, persons devoted or appointed to death. They are said to be set forth at last, because the meridian gladiators, those who combated one another in the after part of the day, were most exposed, being obliged to fight naked. So that, as Seneca says, Epistle 7th, This was perfect butchery; and those exposed to beasts in the morning were treated mercifully in comparison of these. The general meaning is, that the apostles were thus exposed to continual danger of death, and that of the worst kinds, in the faithful discharge of their office. God hath set them forth, brought them into view, as the Roman emperors brought their combatants into the arena, the place of show, though not for the same purposes. They did it to please the populace, and humour their own vanity, and sometimes a much worse principle. The apostles were shewn to manifest the power of Divine grace, to confirm the truth of their mission and doctrine, and propagate religion [the Gospel of Christ] in the world. These were ends worthy of God; noble views, fit to animate them to the combat; but they had like difficulties to encounter, and were in a manner as much exposed, as these miserable Roman criminals. Note, The office of an apostle was, as an honourable, so a hard and hazardous one. "For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and men," ver. 9. A show; we are brought into the theatre, brought out to the public view of the world. Angels and men are witnesses to our persecutions, sufferings, patience, and magnanimity. They all see that we suffer for our fidelity to Christ, and how we suffer; how great and imminent our dangers, and how bravely we encounter them; how sharp our sufferings, and how patiently we endure them by the power of Divine grace, and our Christian principles. Ours is hard work, but honourable; it is hazardous, but glorious. God will have honour from us; religion will be credited by us. The world cannot but see and wonder at our undaunted resolution, our invincible patience and constancy; and how contentedly they could be exposed both to sufferings and scorn for the honour of their Master! Note, The faithful ministers and disciples of Christ should contentedly undergo any thing for his sake and honour [who hath redeemed them with his blood]. 2. He compares his own case with that of the Corinthians; "We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but ye are despised," ver. 11. "We are fools for Christ's sake." Such in common account, and we are well content to be so accounted. We can pass for fools in the world, and be despised as such, so the wisdom of God and the honour of the Gospel be by this means secured and displayed. Note, Faithful ministers can bear being despised, so that the wisdom of God and the power of his grace be thereby displayed. "But ye are wise in Christ." You have the fame [or claim it] of being wise and learned Christians, and you do not a little value yourselves upon it. We are under disgrace for delivering the plain truths of the Gospel, and in as plain a manner. You are in reputation for your eloquence and human wisdom, which amongst many make you pass for wise men in Christ. "We are weak, but ye are strong." We are suffering for Christ's sake, (so being weak plainly signifies, 2 Cor. xii. 10,) when you are in easy and flourishing circumstances. [See exposition of 2 Cor. xii. 10, where a preferable sense is given.] Note, All Christians are not alike exposed. Some suffer greater hardship than others, who are yet engaged in the same warfare. The standard-bearers in an army are most struck at. So ministers in a time of persecution are commonly the first and greatest sufferers. Or else, We pass upon the world for persons of but mean endowments, very striplings in Christianity; but you look upon yourselves, and are looked upon by others, as men, as those of a much more advanced growth and confirmed strength. Note, They are not always the greatest proficients in Christianity who think thus of themselves, or pass for such upon others. It is but too easy and common for self-love to commit such a mistake. Corinthians may think themselves, and be esteemed by others, as wiser and stronger men in Christ than apostles themselves; but, oh, how gross is the mistake!

"We are weak." We are timid and feeble, but you are daring, bold, and fearless. This is irony. The very reverse was probably true. Paul was bold, daring, fearless in declaring the truth, whatever opposition it might encounter; and probably many of them were timid and time-serving, and endeavouring to avoid persecution, and to accommodate themselves to the prejudices and opinions of the world. "Ye are honourable." Deserving of honour, and obtaining it. Still irony. You are to be esteemed as worthy of praise. "We are despised;" ἀτιμίαι. Not only actually contemned, but worthy to be so. This was irony also. And the design was to shew them how foolish was their self-confidence and self-flattery, and their attempt to exalt themselves.—A. B.]

Fourthly, He enters into some particulars of their sufferings. "Even to this present hour," that is, after all the service we have been doing among you and other churches, "we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and labour, working with our own hands," ver. 11, 12; nay, "they were made as the filth of the world, and of offscouring of all things," ver. 13. They were forced to labour with their own hands to get subsistence, and had so much, and so much greater business to mind that they could not attend enough to this, to get a comfortable livelihood, but were exposed to hunger, thirst, and nakedness; many times wanted both meat, and drink, and clothes. They were driven about the world without having any fixed abode, any stated habitation. Poor circumstances indeed, for the prime ministers of our Saviour's kingdom, to have no house nor home, and to be destitute of food and raiment! but yet no poorer than his, "who had not where to lay his head," Lu. ix. 58. But, oh glorious charity and devotion, that would carry them through all these hardships! How ardently did they love God, how vehemently did they thirst for the salvation of souls! Theirs was volumi-nary, it was pleasing poverty; they thought they had a rich amends for all the outward good things they wanted, if they might but serve Christ, and save [win] souls; nay, though they "were made the filth of the world, and the offscouring of all things." They were treated as men not fit to live, περικαθήματα. It is reasonably thought by the critics, that an allusion is here made to a common custom of many heathen nations, to offer men in sacrifice in a time of pestilence, or other like grievous calamity. These were ordinarily the vilest of men, persons of the lowest rank and worst character. Thus, in the first ages, Christians were counted the source of all public calamities, and were sacrificed to the people's rage, if not to appease their angry deities; and apostles could not meet with better usage. They suffered in their persons and characters as the very worst and vilest men, as the most proper to make such a sacrifice. Or else as the very dirt of the world, that was to be swept away. Nay, as "the offscouring of all things," the dross, the filings of all things. They were the common sewer into which all the reproaches of the world were to be poured. To be the offscouring of any thing is bad; but what is it to be the offscouring of all things? How much did the apostles resemble their Master, "and fill up that which was behind of his afflictions, for his body's sake, which is the church?" Col. i. 24; they suffered for him, and they suffered after his example. Thus poor and despised was he in his life and ministry; and every one who would be faithful in Christ Jesus must prepare for the same poverty and contempt. Note, They may be very dear to God, and honourable in his esteem, [heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ,] whom men may think unworthy to live, and use and scorn as the very dirt and refuse of the world. "God seeth not as man seeth," 1 Sam. xvi. 1.

Fifthly, We have here the apostles' behaviour under all, and the return they made for this maltreatment. "Being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we intreat," ver. 12, 13. They returned blessings for reproaches, and intreaties and kind exhortations for the rudest slanders and defamations; and under the sharpest persecutions carried it with patience. Note, The [true] disciples of Christ, and especially his ministers, should [prayerfully] hold fast their integrity, and keep a good conscience, whatever opposition or hardships they meet with from the world. Whatever they suffer from men, they must follow the example, and fulfil the will and precepts of their Lord. They must be content with him, and for him, to be despised and abused.

14 I write not these things to shaine you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. 15 For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel. 16 Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me.

Here Paul challenges their regard to him as their father. He tells them, First, That what he had written was not for their reproach, but admonition; not with the gall of an enemy, but the bowels of a father; ver. 14, "I write not to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you." Note, In reproving for sin, we should have a tender regard to the reputation, as well as the reformation of the sinner. We should aim to distinguish between them and their sins, and take care not to discover any spite against them ourselves, nor expose them to contempt and reproach in the world. Reproofs that expose commonly do but exasperate, when those that kindly and affectionately warn are likely [by God's blessing] to reform. When the affections of a father mingle with the admonitions of a minister, it is to be hoped they may at once melt and mend; but to lash like an enemy or executioner will provoke and render obstinate. To expose to too open shame is but the way to render shameless.

Secondly, He shews them upon what foundation he claimed paternal relation to them, and calls them his sons. They might have other pedagogues, [pedagogues, the word used by the apostle, were those who conducted boys to the public schools, and superintended their conduct,] instructors, but he was their father; "for in Christ Jesus he had begotten them by the Gospel," ver. 15. They were made Christians by his ministry. He had laid the foundation of a church among them. Others could only build upon it. Whatever other teachers they had, he [and he only] was their spiritual father. He first brought them off from pagan idolatry to the faith of the Gospel, and the worship of the true and living God. He was the instrument of their new birth, and therefore claimed the relation of a father to them, and felt the bowels of a father towards them. Note, There commonly is, and always ought to be, an endeared affection between faithful ministers and those they beget in Christ Jesus through the Gospel. They should love like parents and children.

Thirdly, We have here the special advice he urges on them. "Wherefore I beseech you be followers of me," ver. 16. This he elsewhere explains and limits; ch. xi. 1, "Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ." Follow me as far as I follow Christ. Come up as close as you can to my example in those instances wherein I endeavour to copy after his pattern. Be my disciples as far as I manifest myself to be a faithful minister and disciple of Christ, and no farther. "I would not have you be my disciples, but his. But I hope I have approved myself a faithful steward of the mysteries of Christ, and a faithful servant of my master Christ; so far follow me, and tread in my steps." Note, Ministers should so live as that their people may take pattern from them, and live after their copy. They should guide them by their lives as well as their lips; go before them in the way to heaven, and not content themselves with pointing it out. Note, That, as ministers are to set a pattern, others must take it. They should follow them as far as they are satisfied they follow Christ in faith and practice.

17 For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church. 18 Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you. 19 But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will, and will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power. 20 For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in

PORT OF CORINTH.—VER. 18.

Here he tells them,

First. Of his having sent Timothy to them, "to bring them into remembrance of his ways in Christ, as he taught every where in every church," ver. 17; to mind them of his ways in Christ; to refresh their memory as to his preaching and practice, what he taught, and how he lived among them. Note, They who have had never so good teaching are apt to forget, and need to have their memories refreshed. The same truth taught over again, if it give no new light, may make new and quicker impression. He also lets them know that his teaching was the same every where and in every church. He had not one doctrine for one place and people, and another for a different one. He kept close to his instructions; what he received of the Lord that he delivered, ch. xi. 23. This was the gospel revelation, which was the equal concern of all men, and did not vary from itself. He therefore taught the same things in every church, and lived after the same manner in all times and places. Note, The truth of Christ is one and invariable. What one apostle taught every one taught. What one apostle taught at one time, and in one place, he taught at all times, and in all places. Christians may mistake and differ in their apprehensions, but Christ and Christian truth are "the same yesterday, to day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8. To render their regard to Timothy the greater, he gives them his character. He was his beloved son, a spiritual child of his as well as themselves. Note, Spiritual brotherhood should engage affection as well as what is common and natural. The children of one father should have one heart. But he adds, he was faithful in the Lord. Trustworthy, as one that feared the Lord. He will be faithful in that particular office he has now received of the Lord, the particular errand on which he comes; not only from me, but from Christ. He knows what I have taught, and what my conversation has been in all places, and you may depend upon it he will make a faithful report. Note, It is a great commendation of any minister, that he is faithful in the Lord, faithful to his soul, to his light, to his trust from God; and must go a great way in procuring regard to his message with them that fear God.

Secondly. He rebukes the vanity of those who imagined he would not come to them, by letting them know this was his purpose, though he had sent Timothy. "I will come to you shortly," though some of you are so vain as to think I will not. But he adds, "if the Lord will." It seems, as to the common events of life, apostles knew no more than other men, nor were they in these points under inspiration. For had the apostle certainly known the mind of God in this matter, he had not expressed himself with this uncertainty. But he sets a good example to us in it. Note, All our purposes must be formed with a dependence on providence, and a reserve for the overruling purposes of God. "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that," Jas. iv. 15.

Thirdly. He lets them know what would follow upon his coming to them. "I will know, not the speech of them that are puffed up, but the power," ver. 19. He would bring the great pretenders among them to a trial, know what they were; not by their rhetoric or philosophy, but the authority and efficacy of what they taught, whether they could confirm it by miraculous operations, and whether it were accompanied with Divine influences and saving effects on the minds of men. "For," adds he, "the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." It is not set up, nor propagated, nor established in the hearts of men, by plausible reasonings or florid discourses, but by the external power of the Holy Spirit in miraculous operations at first, and the powerful influence of Divine truth [equally the operation of the Holy Spirit] on the minds and manners of men. Note, It is a good way in the general to judge of a preacher's doctrine, to see whether the effects of it upon men's hearts be truly Divine. That is most likely to come from God which in its own nature is most fit, and in event is found to produce most likeness to God; to spread piety and virtue, to change men's hearts, and mend their manners.

Fourthly. He puts it to their choice, how he should come amongst them, whether "with a rod, or in love, and the spirit of meekness," ver. 21; that is, according as they were they would find him. If they continued perverse among themselves and with him, it would be necessary to come with a rod; that is, to exert his apostolical power in chastising them, by making some examples, and inflicting some diseases and corporal punishments, or by other censures for their faults. Note, Stubborn offenders must be used with severity. In families, in Christian communities, paternal pity and tenderness, Christian love and compassion, will sometimes force to use the rod. But this is far from being desirable, if it may be prevented. And therefore the apostle adds, that it was in their own option whether he should come with a rod, or in a quite different disposition and manner; "or in love, and the spirit of meekness." As much as if he had said, "Take warning, cease your unchristian feuds, rectify the abuses among you, and return to your duty, and you shall find me as gentle and benign as you can wish. It will be a force upon inclination to proceed with severity. I had rather come and display the tenderness of a father among you, than assert his authority. Do but your duty, and you have no reason to avoid my presence." Note, It is a happy temper in a minister to have the spirit of love and meekness predominant, and yet maintain his just authority.

their first spiritual fathers. He then drops the irony, and solemnly declares his wish that they had really made such progress, for this would redound to the honour of himself and those who laboured with him, for they would be his "crown of rejoicing."

iv. 9. "For:" assigning the reason for desiring that his reign with the Corinthians had come. "Last:" lowest and vilest.

iv. 10. Alford says, "Again the bitterest irony: 'How different our lot from yours! How are you to be envied, we to be pitied, on

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Blames them for their indulgence in the case of the incestuous person, and orders him to be excommunicated and delivered to Satan, ver. 1-7. II. He exhorts them to Christian purity, by purging out the old leaven, ver. 7, 8. And, III. Directs them to shun even the common conversation of Christians who were guilty of any notorious and flagitious wickedness, ver. 9-13.

It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife.

2 And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you. 3 For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, 4 In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, 5 To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. 6 Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

Here the apostle states the case, and,

First. Lets them know what was the common or general report concerning them, that one of their community was guilty of fornication, ver. 1. It was told in all places, to their dishonour, and the reproach of Christians. It was the more reproachful because it could not be repelled. Note, The heinous sins of professed Christians are quickly noted and noised abroad. We should walk circumspectly, for many eyes are upon us, and many mouths will be opened against us, if we fall into any scandalous practice. But this was not a common instance of fornication, but such as was "not so much as named among the Gentiles, that a man should have his father's wife." Either marry her whilst his father was alive, or keep her as his concubine, either when he was dead, or whilst he was alive. In either of these cases his criminal conversation with her might be called fornication; but had his father been dead, and he after his decease married to her, it had been incest still, but neither fornication nor adultery in the strictest sense. But to marry her, or keep her as a concubine, whilst his father was alive, though he had repudiated her, or she had deserted him, whether she were his own mother or not, was incestuous fornication. Seculus incredible, as Cicero calls it, et prater unum in omni vita inaudium.—Orat. pro Cluent.; when a woman had caused her daughter to be put away, and was married to her husband. 'Incredible wickedness!' says the orator, 'such I never heard of in all my life besides.' Not that there were no such instances of incestuous commerce or marriages among the heathens; but whenever they happened they gave a shock to every man of virtue and probity amongst them. They could not think of them without horror, nor mention them without dislike and detestation. Yet such a horrible wickedness was committed by one in the church of Corinth, and, as is probable, a leader of one of the factions amongst them; a principal man. Note, The best churches are in this state of imperfection, liable to very great corruptions. Is it any wonder, when so horrible a practice was tolerated in an apostolical church, a church planted by the great apostle of the Gentiles?

Secondly. He greatly blames them for their own conduct hereupon. They were "puffed up," ver. 2. They gloried, 1. Perhaps on account of this very scandalous person. [This interpretation appears to be erroneous. The apostle charges the Corinthians with arrogating to themselves superior wisdom and purity, while they ought to have been deeply humbled by the perpetration among them of this sin.] He might be a man of great eloquence, of deep science, and for this reason very greatly esteemed, and followed, and cried up by many amongst them. They were proud they had such a leader. Instead of mourning for his fall, and their own reproach upon his account, and renouncing him and removing him from the society, they continued to applaud him, and pride themselves in him. Note, Pride and self-esteem many times lie at the bottom of our immoderate esteem of others. And this makes us blind to their faults as to our own. It is true humility that will bring a man to a sight and acknowledgment of his errors. The proud man either wholly overlooks or artfully disguises his faults, or endeavours to transform his blemishes into beauties. Those of the Corinthians that were admirers of the incestuous person's gifts could overlook or extenuate his horrid practices. Or else, 2. It may intimate to us that some of the opposite party were puffed up. They were proud of their own standing, and trampled over him that fell. Note, It is a very wicked thing to glory over the miscarriages and sins of others. We should lay them to heart, and mourn for them, not be puffed up with them. Probably this was one effect of the divisions among them. The opposite party made their advantage of this scandalous lapse, and were glad of the opportunity. Note, It is a sad consequence of divisions among Christians, that it makes them apt to rejoice in iniquity. Others' sins should be our sorrow. Nay, churches should mourn for the scandalous behaviour of particular members, and, if they are incorrigible, should remove them. He that had done this wicked deed should have been taken away from among them.

Thirdly. We have the apostle's direction to them how they should now proceed with this scandalous sinner. He would have him excommunicated and delivered to Satan; ver. 3-5, "As absent in body, yet present in spirit, he had judged already as if he were present." That is, he had by revelation, and the account of Christ. Our connection with him does nothing but reduce us to be fools, whereas ye have entered into full participation of him, and grown up to be wise, subtle Christians."

iv. 15. "I call you sons, for I alone am your father." Others may have been tutors, having the care and education of the children, but he alone the rights and affection of a father.

iv. 19, 20. "Power:" might in the spirit, as distinguished from mere empty, high-sounding speech.

miraculous gift of discerning vouchsafed him by the Spirit, as perfect a knowledge of the case, and had hereupon come to the following determination, not without special authority from the Holy Spirit. He says this to let them know that, though he was at a distance, he did not pass an unrighteous sentence, nor judge without having as full cognizance of the case as if he had been on the spot. Note, Those who would appear righteous judges to the world will take care to inform them they do not pass sentence without full proof and evidence. The apostle adds, "Him who hath so done this deed." The fact was not only heinously evil in itself, and horrible to the heathens, but there were some particular circumstances that greatly aggravated the offence. He had so committed the evil as to heighten the guilt by the manner of doing it. Perhaps he was a minister, a teacher, or a principal man amongst them. By this means the church and their profession were more reproached. Note, In dealing with scandalous sinners, not only are they to be charged with the fact, but the aggravating circumstances of it. He had judged that he should be delivered to Satan, ver. 5, and this was to be done in the name of Christ, and with the power of Christ, and in a full assembly, where the apostle would be also present in spirit, or by his spiritual gift of discerning at a distance. Some think that this is to be understood of a mere ordinary excommunication, and that delivering him to Satan for the destruction of the flesh is only meant of disowning him, and casting him out of the church, that by this means he might be brought to repentance, and his flesh might be mortified. Christ and Satan divide the world: and they that live in sin, when they profess relation to Christ, belong to another master, and by excommunication should be delivered up to him; and this in the name of Christ. Note, Church censures are Christ's ordinances, and should be dispensed in his name. It was to be done also when they were gathered together in full assembly. The more public, the more solemn; and the more solemn, the more likely to have good effect on the offender. Note, Church censures on notorious and incorrigible sinners should be passed with great solemnity. They who sin in this manner are to be rebuked before all, that all may fear, 1 Tim. v. 20. Others think the apostle is not to be understood of mere excommunication, but of a miraculous power or authority they had of delivering a scandalous sinner into the power of Satan, to have bodily diseases inflicted, to be tormented by him with bodily pains, which is their meaning of the destruction of the flesh. In this sense the destruction of the flesh has been a happy occasion of the salvation of the spirit. It is probable this was a mixed case. It was an extraordinary instance: and the church was to proceed against him by just censure; and the apostle, when they did so, put forth an act of extraordinary power, and gave him up to Satan; not for his destruction, but deliverance, at least for the destruction of the flesh, that the soul might be saved. Note, That the great end of church censures is the good of those who fall under them; their spiritual and eternal good. It is that their "spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus," ver. 5. Yet it is not merely a regard to their benefit that is to be had in proceeding against them. For,

Fourthly, He hints the danger of contagion from this example. "Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?" The bad example of a man in rank and reputation is very mischievous; spreads the contagion far and wide. It did so probably in this very church and case: see 2 Cor. xii. 21. They could not be ignorant of this. The experience of the whole world was for it; one scabbed sheep infects a whole flock. A little leaven will quickly spread the ferment through a great lump. Note, Concern for their purity and preservation should engage Christian churches to remove gross and scandalous sinners.

7 Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us: 8 Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

Here the apostle exhorts them to purity, by purging out the old leaven. In which observe,

First, The advice itself; addressed either, 1. To the church in general; and so purging out the old leaven that they might be a new lump, refers to the putting away from themselves that wicked person, ver. 13. Note, Christian churches should be pure and holy, and not bear such corrupt and scandalous members. They are to be unleavened, and should endure no such heterogeneous mixture to sour and corrupt them. Or, 2. To each particular member of the church. And so it implies, that they should purge themselves from all impurity of heart and life, especially from this kind of wickedness, to which the Corinthians were addicted to a proverb. See the argument at the beginning. This old leaven was in a particular manner to be purged out, that they might become a new lump. Note, Christians should be careful to keep themselves clean, as well as purge polluted members out of their society; and they should especially avoid the sins to which themselves were once most addicted, and the reigning vices of the places and people where they live. They were also to purge themselves from "malice and wickedness," all ill will and mischievous subtlety. This is leaven that sours the mind to a great degree. It is not improbable this was intended as a check to some who gloried in the scandalous behaviour of the offender, both out of pride and pique. Note, Christians should be particularly careful to keep free from malice and mischief. Love is the very essence and life of Christian religion. It is the fairest image of God, "for God is love," 1 Jno. iv. 16; and therefore it is no wonder if it be the greatest beauty and ornament of a Christian. But malice is murder in its principles. He that "hateth his brother is a murderer," 1 Jno. iii. 15; bears the image, and proclaims himself the offspring of him who was "a murderer from the beginning," Jno. viii. 44. How hateful should every thing be to a Christian that looks like malice and mischief!

Secondly, The reason with which this advice is enforced. "For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us," ver. 7. This is the great doctrine of the Gospel. The Jews, after they had killed the passover, kept the feast of unleavened bread. So must we, not for seven days only, but all our days. We should lie with our Saviour to sin; "be planted into the likeness of his death," by mortifying sin, and into "the likeness of his resurrection," by rising again to "newness of life," and that internal and external. We must have new hearts, and lead new lives. Note, The whole life of a Christian must be a feast of unleavened bread. His common conversation and his religious performances must be holy. He must "purge out the old leaven," and keep the feast with "the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." He must be without guilt [that is, without cherished sin] in his carriage towards God and man. And the more there is of sincerity in our own profession the less shall we censure that of others. Note on the whole, That the [atoning] sacrifice of our Redeemer is the strongest argument with a gracious heart for purity and sincerity. How sincere a regard did he shew to our welfare in dying for us! and how terrible a proof was his death of the detestable nature of sin, and God's displeasure against it! Heinous evil, that could not be expiated but with the blood of the Son of God! And shall a Christian love the murderer of his Lord? God forbid.

9 I wrote unto you in an epistle not to company with fornicators: 10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world. 11 But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat. 12 For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within? 13 But them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

Here the apostle advises them to shun the company and converse of scandalous professors. In which consider,

First, The advice itself. "I wrote to you in a letter not to company with fornicators," ver. 9. Some think this was an epistle written to them before, which is lost, [though containing nothing but what is to be found in this epistle.] Yet we have lost nothing by it, the Christian revelation being entire in those books of Scripture which are come down to us, which are all that were intended by God for the general use of Christians, or he could and would in his providence have preserved more of the writings of inspired men. Some think it is to be understood of this very epistle, that he had written this advice before he had full information of their whole case, but thought it needful now to be more particular; and therefore, on this occasion, he tells them, that if any man called a brother, any one professing Christianity, and being a member of a Christian church, were "a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer," &c., that they should not keep company with him, not so much as eat with such an one. They were to avoid all familiarity with him. They were to have no commerce with him; but, that they might shame him and bring him to repentance, must disclaim and shun him. Note, That Christians are to avoid the familiar conversation of fellow Christians that are notoriously wicked, and under just censure for their flagitious practices. Such disgrace the Christian name. They may call themselves brethren in Christ, but they are not Christian brethren. They are only fit companions for their brethren in iniquity, and to such company they should be left, till they mend their ways and doings.

Secondly, He limits this advice. He does not forbid Christians the like commerce with scandalously wicked heathens. He does not forbid them eating or conversing with the fornicators of this world, &c. They know no better. They profess no better. The gods they serve, and the worship they render to many of them, countenance such wickedness. [In the epistle to the Romans, the apostle sets forth their sinfulness.] And you must "needs go out of the world" if you will have no conversation with such men. Your Gentile neighbours are generally vicious and profane, and it is impossible, as long as you are in the world, and have any worldly business to do, but you must fall into their company; this cannot be wholly avoided. Note, Christians may and ought to testify more respect [or rather, sufferance] to loose worldlings than to loose Christians. This seems a paradox. Why should we shun the company of a profane or loose Christian rather than that of a profane or loose heathen?

Thirdly, The reason of this limitation is here assigned. It is impossible the one should be avoided. Christians must have gone out of the world to avoid the company of loose heathens; but this was impossible as long as they had business in the world. Whilst they are minding their duty, and doing their proper business, God can and will preserve them from contagion. Besides, they carry an antidote against the infection of their bad example, and are naturally upon the guard; they are apt to have a horror at their wicked practices. But the dread of sin wears off by familiar converse with wicked Christians. Our own safety and preservation [as well as a zeal for the purity of the church] is a reason of this difference. But, besides, heathens were such as Christians had nothing to do to judge and censure, and avoid upon a censure passed. For they "are without," ver. 12. Must be left to God's judgment, ver. 13. But as to members of the church, they are within, are professedly bound by the laws and rules of Christianity, and not only liable to the judgment of God, but to the censures of those who are set over them, and the fellow members of the same body, when they transgress those rules. Every Christian is bound to judge them unfit for communion and familiar converse. They are to be punished by having this mark of disgrace put upon them, that they may be shamed, and if possible reclaimed thereby. And the more, because the sins of such much more dishonour God than the sins of the openly wicked and profane can do. The church therefore is obliged to clear herself from all confederacy with them, or connivance at them, and to bear testimony against their wicked practices. Note, Though the church has nothing to do with those without, it must endeavour to keep clear of the guilt and reproach of those within.

Fourthly, He applies the argument to the case before him. "Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person," ver. 13. Cast him out of your fellowship, and avoid his conversation.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Reproves them for going to law with one another about small matters, and bringing the cause before the heathen judges, ver. 1-3. II. He takes occasion hence to warn them against many gross sins to which they had been formerly addicted, ver. 9-12. III. And having cautioned them against the abuse of their liberty, he vehemently deborts them from fornication by various arguments, ver. 12-20.

v. 1. "This, practically speaking, forms the crisis of the whole epistle. It is as it were the burst of the storm, the mutterings of which, as Chrysostom observes, had already been heard in the earlier chapters, and of which the echoes are still discernible not only in this epistle but also in the second epistle, the first half of which is nothing less than an endeavour to allay the excitement and confusion created by this severe remonstrance" (Stanley). "Commonly:" generally. "It is reported that there is fornication generally among you." Others take it with "reported," and render it "universally;" i.e., "there is nothing heard of except this." Alford: "actually;" "fornication is actually borne as a character among you." Omit "named." "Father's wife:" i.e., stepmother. For the father, see 2 Cor. vii. 12. Paul does not mean to say that this crime never occurred in history. Cases of this sort are indeed recorded, but they are always spoken of as rare exceptions, that excited the utmost public horror."

ARE any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? 2 Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? 3 Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life? 4 If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church. 5 I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? 6 But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. 7 Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? 8 Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren.

ROMAN JUDGE.

Here the apostle reproves them for going to law with one another, before heathen judges, for little matters, and therein blames all venacious lawsuits. In the chapter before, he had directed them to punish heinous sins among themselves by church censures; here he directs them to determine controversies with one another by church counsel and advice. Concerning which, observe,

First. The fault he blames them for. It was going to law. Not but that "the law is good, if a man use it lawfully." But, 1. Brother went to law with brother, ver. 6. One member of the church with another. The near relation would not preserve peace and good understanding. The bonds of fraternal love were broken through. And "a brother offended," as Solomon saith, "is harder to be won than a strong city; their contentions are like the bars of a castle," Pr. xviii. 19. Note, Christians should not contend with one another, for they are brethren. This duly attended to would prevent lawsuits, and put an end to quarrels and litigations. 2. They brought the matter before the heathen magistrates. They went to law "before the unjust, not before the saints," ver. 1; brought the controversy before unbelievers, ver. 6; and did not compose it among themselves, Christians and saints, at least in profession. This tended much to the reproach of Christianity; it published at once their folly and unpeaceableness, whereas they pretended to be the children of wisdom, and the followers of the Lamb, the meek and lowly Jesus, the Prince of peace. And therefore, saith the apostle, "Dare any of you, having a" controversy with "another, go to law," plead him, bring the matter to a hearing before the unjust? Note, Christians should not dare to do anything that tends to the [well-founded] reproach of their Christian name and profession. 3. Here is at least an intimation that they went to law for trivial matters, things of little value. For the apostle blames them that they did not take wrong rather than go to law, ver. 7, which must be understood of matters not very important. In matters of great damage to ourselves or families, we may use lawful means to right ourselves. We are not bound to sit down and suffer the injury tamely, without stirring for our own relief; but in matters of small consequence better put up with the wrong. Christians should be of a forgiving temper; and it is more for their ease and honour to suffer small injuries and inconveniences than seem to be contentious.

Secondly. He lays before them the aggravations of their fault. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" ver. 2; "shall judge angels," ver. 3; and are they unworthy to judge the smallest matters, the things of this life? It was a dishonour to their Christian character, a forgetting their real dignity as saints, for them to carry little matters about the things of life before heathen magistrates. When they were to judge the world, nay, to judge angels, it is unaccountable that they could not determine little controversies among one another. By judging the world and angels, some think is to be understood, their being assessors to Christ in the great judgment day; it being said of our Saviour's disciples, that they should at that day "sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," Mat. xix. 28; and elsewhere we read of our Lord's coming "with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment on all," &c., Jude 14, 15; "he will come to judgment with all his saints," 1 Thes. iii. 13. They themselves are indeed to be judged, see Mat. xxv. 31-41; but they may first be acquitted, and then advanced to the bench to approve and applaud the righteous judgment of Christ both on men and angels. And in no other sense can they be judges. They are not partners in their Lord's commission, but they have the honour to sit by, and see his proceedings against the wicked world, and approve it. Others understand this judging of the world to be meant, when the empire should become Christian. But it does not appear that the Corinthians had knowledge of the empire's becoming Christian; and if they had, in what sense could Christian emperors be said to judge angels? Others understand it of their condemning the world by their faith and practice, and casting out evil angels by miraculous power, which was not confined to the first ages or to the apostles. The first sense seems to be most natural; and at the same time gives the utmost force to the argument. Shall Christians have the honour to sit with the sovereign Judge at the last, whilst he passeth judgment on sinful men and evil angels, and are they not worthy to judge of the trifles about which you contend before heathen magistrates? Cannot they make up your mutual differences? Why must you bring them before heathen judges? When you are to judge them, is it fit to appeal to their judicature? Must you, about the affairs of this life, set them to judge who are of no esteem in the church? So some read, and perhaps most properly, ver. 4, heathen magistrates, ἡσυχαστῶν; the "things that are not," ch. i. 28. Must they be called in to judge in your controversies of whom you ought to entertain so low an opinion? Is not this shameful? ver. 5. Some who read it as our translators make it an ironical speech. If you have such controversies depending, set them to judge who are of least esteem among yourselves. The meanness of your own members are able sure to determine these disputes. Refer the matters in variance to any rather than go to law about them before heathen judges. They are trifles not worth contending about, and may easily be decided if you have first conquered your own spirits, and brought them into a true Christian temper. Bear and forbear, and the men of meanest skill among you may end your quarrels. "I speak it to your shame," ver. 5. Note, It is a shame that little quarrels should grow to such a head among Christians, that they cannot be determined by arbitration of the brethren.

Thirdly. He puts them on a method to remedy this fault, and this twofold. 1. By referring it to some to make it up. "Is it so that there is not a wise man amongst you?" No one "able to judge between his brethren?" ver. 5. You who value yourselves so much upon your wisdom and knowledge, who are so puffed up upon your extraordinary gifts and endowments, is there none among you fit for this office? none that has wisdom enough to judge in these differences? Must brethren quarrel, and the heathen magistrate judge, in a church so famous as yours for knowledge and wisdom? It is a reproach to you, that quarrels should run so high, and none of your wise men interpose to prevent it. Note, Christians should never engage in lawsuits till all other remedies are tried in vain. Prudent Christians should prevent, if possible, their disputes, [and terminate them when they arise by Christian and affectionate advice,] and not courts of judicature decide them, especially in matters of no great importance. 2. By suffering wrong, rather than taking this method to right themselves. It is utterly a fault among you to go to law in this matter. It is a fault of one side always to go to law, except in a case where the title is indeed dubious, and there is a friendly agreement of both parties to refer it to the judgment of those learned in the law to decide it. And this is referring it rather than contending about it, which is the thing the apostle here seems chiefly to condemn. Should you not rather take wrong, rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Note, A Christian should rather suffer a little injury than tease himself, and provoke others, by a litigious contest. The peace of his own mind, and the calm of his neighbourhood, is more worth than victory in such a contest, or reclaiming his own right, especially when the quarrel must be decided by those who are enemies to religion. But the apostle tells them, they were so far from bearing injuries, that they actually did wrong, and defrauded, and that their brethren. Note, It is utterly a fault to wrong and defraud any, but it is an aggravation of this fault to defraud our Christian brethren; the ties of mutual love ought to be stronger between them than between others. And "love worketh no ill to his neighbour," Rom. xiii. 10. Those who love the brotherhood can never, under the influence of this principle, hurt or injure them.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, 10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. 11 And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.

v. 2. "Taken away:" i.e., by excommunication.

v. 5. "A more solemn mode of stating the fact of excommunication, as expressed by our Lord in Matt. xviii. 17; one designed to exhibit more vividly the sad condition of him who has been cast out from the kingdom of God, and so consigned into the hands of his great enemy, uncheered by the light and comforts of the Saviour."

v. 8. "The feast:" figurative for that consecrated life which should follow upon our union with Christ in his death.

v. 9. Alluding to a former short epistle, not preserved, in which the Corinthians imagined that he forbade all intercourse with "those outside." Thus verse 11 should be rendered, "Now—i.e., the case being such that you must consort with fornicators among the heathen, I wrote (in the former letter) that," &c.

vi. 1. "Paul does not here condemn those who from necessity have a cause before unbelieving judges, as when a person is summoned to court, but those who of their own accord bring their brethren into

Here he takes occasion to warn them against many heinous evils to which they had been formerly addicted.

1. He puts it to them as a plain truth, of which they could not be ignorant, that such sinners should not inherit the kingdom of God. The meanest among them must know thus much, that "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God," ver. 9, shall not be owned as true members of his church on earth, nor admitted as glorious members of the church in heaven. All unrighteousness is sin, and all reigning sin, nay, every actual sin committed deliberately, and not repented of, shuts out of the kingdom of heaven. He instances in several sorts of sins,—against the first and second commandments, as idolaters; against the seventh, as adulterers, fornicators, effeminate, and sodomites; against the eighth, as thieves and extortioners, that by force or fraud wrong their neighbours; against the ninth, as revilers; and against the tenth, as covetous and drunkards, as those who are in a fair way to break all the rest. Those who knew anything of [gospel] religion, must know heaven could never be intended for these. The scum of the earth are no way fit to fill the heavenly mansions. They who do the devil's work can never receive God's wages, at least, so other than death, the just wages of sin, Rom. vi. 23.

Secondly, Yet he warns them against deceiving themselves. "Be not deceived." Those who cannot but know the forementioned truth are but too apt not to attend to it. Men are very much inclined to flatter themselves that God is such a one as themselves, and that they may live in sin and yet die in Christ; may live the life of the devil's children, and yet go to heaven with the children of God. But this is all a gross cheat. Note, It is very much the concern of mankind that they do not cheat themselves in the matters of their souls. We cannot hope to sow to the flesh and yet reap everlasting life.

Thirdly, He puts them in mind what a change the Gospel and grace of God had made in them. "Such were some of you," ver. 11; such notorious sinners as he had been reckoning up. The Greek word is ταῦτα, 'such things' were some of you, very monsters rather than men. Note, Some that are eminently good after their conversion have been as remarkably wicked before. Quantum mutatus ab illo.—"How glorious a change does grace make!" It changes the vilest of men into saints and the children of God. "Such were some of you, but" you are not what you were, "ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." Note, The wickedness of men before conversion is no bar to their regeneration and reconciliation to God. The blood of Christ and the washing of regeneration can purge away all guilt and defilement. Here is a rhetorical change of the natural order; "Ye are sanctified, ye are justified." Sanctification is mentioned before justification; and yet the name of Christ, by which we are justified, is placed before the Spirit of God, by whom we are sanctified. Our justification is owing [solely] to the merit of Christ, our sanctification to the operation of the Spirit, but both go together. Note, None are cleansed from the guilt of sin and reconciled to God through Christ, but those who are also sanctified by his Spirit. All who are made righteous in the sight of God are made holy by the grace of God.

12 All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any. 13 Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body. 14 And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power. 15 Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. 16 What? know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body? for two, saith he, shall be one flesh. 17 But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit. 18 Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body. 19 What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? 20 For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

The 12th and former part of the 13th verse seem to relate to the early dispute among Christians about the distinction of meats, and yet to be prefatory to the caution that follows against fornication. The connexion seems plain enough, if we attend to the famous determination of the apostles, Acts xv., where the prohibition of certain food was joined with that of fornication. Now some among the Corinthians seem to have imagined that they were as much at liberty in the point of fornication as of meats, especially because it was not a sin condemned by the laws of their country. They were ready to say even in the case of fornication, "All things are lawful for me." This pernicious conceit St. Paul here sets himself to oppose; tells them that many things lawful in themselves were not expedient at certain times and under particular circumstances; and Christians should not barely consider what was in itself lawful to be done, but what was fit for them to do, considering their profession, character, relations, and hopes, and that they should be very careful that, by carrying this maxim too far, they were not brought into bondage either to a crafty deceiver or a carnal inclination. "All things are lawful for me," saith he, "but I will not be brought into the power of any" ver. 12. Even in lawful things he would not be subject to the impositions of an usurped authority; so far was he from apprehending, that in the things of God it was lawful for any power on earth to impose his own sentiments. Note, There is a liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, in which we must stand fast; but sure he would never carry his liberty so far as to put himself into the power of any bodily appetite. Though all meats were supposed lawful he would not become a glutton or a drunkard. And much less would he abuse the maxim of lawful liberty to countenance the sin of fornication, which, though it might be allowed by the Corinthian laws, was a trespass upon the laws of nature, [law of God,] and utterly unbecoming a Christian. He would not abuse this maxim about eating and drinking, to encourage any intemperance or indulge a carnal appetite. "Though meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats," ver. 13; though the belly was made to receive food, and food was originally ordained to fill the belly, yet if it be not convenient for me,—and much more, if it be inconvenient and likely to enslave me, if I am in any danger of being subjected to my belly and appetite,—I will abstain. "But God shall destroy both it and them," at least as to their mutual relation. There is a time coming when the human body will need no further recruits of food. Some of the ancients suppose that it is to be understood of abolishing the belly as well as the food; and that though the same body be raised at the great day, yet not with all the same members, some being utterly unnecessary in a future state, as the belly, for instance, when the man is never to hunger, nor thirst, nor eat, nor drink more. But, whether this be true or no, there is a time coming when the need and use of food shall be abolished. Note, The expectation we have of being without bodily appetites in a future life is a very good argument against being under their power in the present life. This seems to me the sense of the apostle's argument, and that this passage is plainly to be connected with his caution against fornication, though some make it a part of the former argument against litigious lawsuits, especially before heathen magistrates, and the enemies to true religion. These suppose that the apostle argues that, though it may be lawful to claim our rights, yet it is not always expedient, and it is utterly unfit for Christians to put themselves into the power of infidel judges, lawyers, and solicitors, on these accounts. But this connexion seems not so natural. The transition to his arguments against fornication, as I have laid it, seems very natural. "But the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body," ver. 13. Meats and the belly are for one another. Not so fornication and the body.

First, "The body is not for fornication, but for the Lord." This is the first argument he uses against this sin, for which the heathen inhabitants of this city were infamous, and the converts to Christianity retained too favourable an opinion of it. It is making things to cross their intention and use. "The body is not for fornication," it was never formed for any such use or purpose, "but for the Lord," for the service and honour of God. It is to be an instrument of righteousness to holiness, Rom. vi. 19, and therefore is never to be made an instrument of uncleanness. It is to be a member of Christ, and therefore must not be made the member of a harlot, ver. 15, "And the Lord for the body," that is, as some think, Christ is to be Lord of the body, to have property in it, and dominion over it, having assumed a body and been made to partake of our nature, that he might be head of his church and head over all things, Heb. ii. 5, 18. Note, We must take care that we do not use what belongs to Christ as if it were our own, and much less to his dishonour.

Secondly, Some understand this last passage, "the Lord for the body," that is, for its resurrection and glorification, according to what follows, ver. 14, which is a second argument against this sin, namely, the honour intended to be put on our bodies. "God hath both raised up our Lord, and will raise us up by his power," ver. 14, by the power of him "who shall change our vile body, and make it like to his glorious body, by that power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself," Phil. iii. 20. It is an honour done to the body that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead, and it will be an honour to our bodies that they will be raised. Let us not abuse these bodies by sin, and make them vile, which, if they be kept pure, shall, notwithstanding their present vileness, be made like to Christ's glorious body. Note, The hopes [assurance] of a resurrection to glory should restrain Christians from dishonouring their bodies by fleshly lusts.

Thirdly, A third argument is the honour already put on them. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?" ver. 15. If the soul be united to Christ by faith, the whole man is become a member of his mystical body; the body is in union with Christ as well as the soul. How honourable is this to the Christian; his very flesh is a part of the mystical body of Christ. Note, It is good to know in what honourable relations we stand, that we may endeavour to become them. But now, saith the apostle, "shall I take the members of Christ, and make them members of an harlot? God forbid." Or, take away the members of Christ? Were not this gross abuse, and the most notorious injury? Is it not dishonouring Christ and dishonouring ourselves to the very last degree? What, make Christ's members the members of a harlot, prostitute them to so vile a use! The thought is to be abhorred. God forbid. "Know ye not, that he who is joined to an harlot is one body," namely, with her's? "For two," saith he, "shall be one flesh." But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit," ver. 16, 17. Nothing can stand in greater opposition to the honourable relations and alliances of a Christian man than this sin. He is joined to the Lord in union with Christ, and made partaker, by faith, of his Spirit. One spirit lives, and breathes, and moves in the head and members. Christ and his faithful disciples are one, 1 Jno. xvii. 21, 22. "But he that is joined to an harlot is one body, for two shall be one flesh," namely, by carnal conjunction, which was ordained of God only to be in a married state. Now, shall one in so close union with Christ as to be one spirit with him, yet be so united to an harlot as to become one flesh with her? Is not this a vile attempt to make an union between Christ and harlots? And can a greater indignity be offered to him or ourselves? Can any thing be more inconsistent with our profession or relation? Note, The sin of fornication is a great injury in a Christian to his Head and Lord, and a great reproach and blot on his profession. It is no wonder, therefore, the apostle should say, "Flee fornication," ver. 18; avoid it, keep out of the reach of temptations to it, of provoking objects; direct the eyes and mind to other things and thoughts. Alia vitia pugando, sola libido fugiendo vincitur.—"Other vices may be conquered in fight, this only by flight," say many of the fathers.

Fourthly, A fourth argument is, that it is a sin against our own bodies. "Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body," ver. 18. Every sin, that is, every other sin, every external act of sin besides, is without the body; it is not so much an abuse of the body as of somewhat else, as wine by the drunkard, food by the glutton, &c. Nor doth it give the power of the body to another person; nor doth it so much tend to the reproach of the body, and to render it vile. This sin is in a peculiar manner styled uncleanness, pollution, because no sin has so much external turpitude in it, especially in a Christian. He sinneth against his own body; he defiles it, he degrades it, makes it one with the body of that vile creature with whom he sinneth; he casts vile reproach on what his Redeemer has dignified to the last degree, by taking it into union with himself. Note, We should not make our present vile bodies more vile by sinning against them.

this situation and harass them, as it were, through means of unbelievers, while it is in their power to employ another remedy" (Calvin). "And besides the scandal of such a proceeding, as exposing their internal differences to the eyes of the heathen, there were certain formularies to be gone through in the heathen law courts, such as adjuration by heathen deities, which would involve them in idolatrous practices" (Wordsworth).

vi. 2. Compare Matt. xii. 41; but see also (especially) Matt. xix.

28; Dan. vii. 22. St. Paul seems to mean here an active participation by the saints in the judicial work of Christ.

vi. 4. "If ye have judgments concerning civil cases ye set up as judges those who are of no account in the church (i.e., the heathen magistrates, by bringing cases before them);" or, "If such causes arise among you, set those to judge them who are of no account among you; do not go out of your own number to others to have them judged: the meanest among you is capable of doing it."

Fifthly. The fifth argument against this sin is, that the bodies of Christians are "the temples of the Holy Ghost, which is in them, and which they have of God," ver. 19. He that is joined to Christ is one spirit; he is yielded up to him, and is consecrated thereby, and set apart for his use, and is hereupon possessed, and occupied, and inhabited by his Holy Spirit. This is the proper notion of a temple: a place where God dwells, and sacred to his use, by his own claim and his creatures' surrender. Such temples real Christians are of the Holy Ghost. Must he not, therefore, be God? But the inference is plain, that hence we are not our own; we are yielded up to God, and possessed by and for God, nay, and this in virtue of a purchase made of us; "Ye are bought with a price." In short, our bodies were made for God; they were purchased for him. If we are Christians indeed, they are yielded to him, and he inhabits and occupies them by his Spirit; so that our bodies are not our own, but his. And shall we desecrate his temple, defile it, prostitute it, and offer it up to the use and service of a harlot? Horrid sacrifice! This is robbing God in the worst sense. Note, The temple of the Holy Ghost must be kept holy. Our bodies must be kept as his whose they are, and fit for his use and residence.

Sixthly. The apostle argues from the obligation we are under to "glorify God both with our body and spirit which are his," ver. 20. He made both, he bought both, and therefore both belonged to him, and should be used and employed for him, and therefore should not be defiled, alienated from him, and prostituted by us. No, they must be kept as vessels fitted for our Master's use. We must look upon our whole selves as holy to the Lord, and must use our bodies as what belongs to him and is sacred to his use and service. We are to honour him with our bodies and spirits, which are his; and therefore sure must abstain from fornication, and not only from the outward act, but from the adultery of the heart, as our Lord calls it, Mat. v. 28. Body and spirit are to be kept clean, that God may be honoured by both; but God is dishonoured when either is defiled by so heastly a sin. Therefore flee fornication, nay, and every sin. Use your bodies for the glory and service of their Lord and Master. Note, We are not proprietors of ourselves, nor have power over ourselves, and therefore should not use ourselves according to our own pleasure, but according to his will, and for his glory, whose we are, and whom we should serve, Acts xxvii. 23.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter the apostle answers some cases proposed to him by the Corinthians about marriage. He, I. Shews them that marriage was appointed as a remedy against fornication; and therefore persons had better marry than burn. ver. 1—10. II. He gives direction to those who were married to continue together, though they might have an unbelieving relative, unless the unbeliever would part, in which case a Christian would not be in bondage, ver. 10—16. III. He shews them that becoming Christians does not change their external state; and therefore advises every one to continue in the general in that state in which he was called, ver. 17—25. IV. He advises them by reason of the present distress to keep themselves unmarried. Hints the shortness of time, and how they should improve it so as to grow dead and indifferent to the comforts of the world; and shews them how worldly cares hinder their devotions, and distract them in the service of God, ver. 25—36. V. He directs them in the disposal of their virgins, ver. 36—39. VI. And closes the chapter with advice to widows how to dispose of themselves in that state, ver. 39, 40.

OW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me: It is good for a man not to touch a woman. 2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband. 3 Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence:

and likewise also the wife unto the husband. 4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife. 5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. 6 But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment. 7 For I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that. 8 I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I. 9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

The apostle comes now, as a faithful and skilful casuist, to answer some cases of conscience which the Corinthians had proposed to him. Those were things whereof they wrote to him, ver. 1. As the lips of ministers should keep knowledge, so the people should ask the law at their mouths. The apostle was as ready to resolve as they were to propose their doubts. In the former chapter he warns them to avoid fornication; here he gives some directions about marriage, the remedy God had appointed for it. He tells them in general,

First. That it was good, in that juncture of time at least, to abstain from marriage altogether; "It is good for a man not to touch a woman," not to take her to wife. By good here not understanding what is so conformable to the mind and will of God as if to do otherwise were sin,—an extreme into which many of the ancients have run in favour of celibacy and virginity. Should the apostle be understood in this sense he would contradict much of the rest of his discourse. But it is good, that is, either abstracting from circumstances there are many things in which the state of celibacy hath the advantage above the marriage state; or else at this juncture, by reason of the distresses of the Christian church, it would be a convenience for Christians to keep themselves single, provided they have the gift of continency, and at the same time can keep themselves chaste. The expression also may carry in it an intimation that Christians must avoid all occasions of this sin, and flee all fleshly lusts, and incentives to them; must neither look on nor touch a woman, so as to provoke lustful inclinations. Yet, Secondly. He informs them that marriage, and the comforts and satisfactions of that state, are by Divine wisdom prescribed for preventing fornication, ver. 2. Propter, fornications, all sorts of lawless lust. To avoid these, "Let every man," saith he, "have his own wife, and every woman her own husband," that is, marry and confine themselves to their own mates. And when they are married, let each render the other due benevolence, ver. 3. that is, consider the disposition and exigency of each other, and render conjugal duty, which is owing to each other. For as the apostle argues, ver. 4, in the married state, neither person has power over their own body, but has delivered it into the power of the other; the wife her's into the power of the husband, the husband his into the power of the wife. Note, That polygamy, or the marriage of more persons than one, as well as adultery, must be a breach of marriage covenants and violation of the partner's rights; and therefore they should not defraud one another of the use of their bodies, nor any other of the comforts of the conjugal state, appointed of God for keeping "the vessel in sanctification and honour," and preventing the lusts of uncleanness. "Except it be with" mutual "consent," ver. 5, and "for a time" only, whilst they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves "to fasting and prayer." Note, Seasons of deep humiliation require abstinence from lawful pleasures. But this separation between husband and wife must not be for a continuance, lest they expose themselves to Satan's temptations, by reason of their incontinence or inability to contain. Note, Persons expose themselves to great danger by attempting to perform what is above their strength, and at the same time not bound upon them by any law of God. If they abstain from lawful enjoyments they may be ensnared into unlawful ones. The remedies God hath provided against sinful inclinations are certainly best.

Thirdly. The apostle limits what he had said about every man's having his own wife, &c.; ver. 2, "I speak this by permission, not of command." He did not lay it as an injunction upon every man to marry without exception; any man might marry; no law of God prohibited the thing. But, on the other hand, no law bound a man to marry, so that he sinned if he did not; I mean, unless his circumstances required it for the preventing the lusts of uncleanness. It was a thing in which men by the laws of God were in a great measure left at liberty; and, therefore, Paul did not bind every man to marry, though every man had an allowance. No; he could wish all men were as himself, ver. 7; that is, single, and capable of living continently in that state. There were several conveniences in it, which at that season, if not at others, made it more eligible in itself. Note, It is a mark of true goodness [godliness] to wish all men as happy as ourselves; but it did not answer the intentions of Divine providence as well for all men to have as much command of this appetite as Paul had. It was a gift vouchsafed to such persons as Infinite Wisdom thought proper; "Every one hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." Natural constitutions vary, and, where there may not be much difference in the constitution, different degrees of grace are vouchsafed, which may give some a greater victory over natural inclination than others. Note, The gifts of God both in nature and grace are variously distributed; some have them after this manner, and some after that. Paul could wish all men were as himself, but "all men cannot receive such a saying, save they to whom it is given," Mat. xix. 11.

Fourthly. He sums up his sense on this head; ver. 9, 10, "I say therefore to the unmarried and widows," to those in a state of virginity or widowhood, "It is good for them if they abide even as I." There are many conveniences, and especially at this juncture, in a single state, to render it preferable to a married one. It is convenient therefore, that the unmarried abide as I, which plainly implies that Paul was at that time unmarried. "But if they cannot contain, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn." This is God's remedy for lust. The fire may be quenched by the means he has appointed; and marriage, with all its inconveniences, is much better than to burn with impure and lustful desires. "Marriage is honourable in all;" but it is a duty to them who cannot contain, nor conquer those inclinations. [The passion here referred to is often compared to a fire: see Virg. Æn. iv. 68. It is better to marry, even with all the inconveniences attending the marriage life in a time of distress and persecution in the church, (ver. 26,) than to be the prey of raging, consuming, and exciting passions.—A. B.]

10 And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband: 11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband: and let not the husband put away his wife. 12 But to the rest speak I, not the Lord: If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. 13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. 14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy. 15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not the body created for fornication, nor can this transitoriness be predicated of it: the body is for the Lord, and the Lord (in his mediatorial work) for the body; and God raised up the Lord and will raise up us (our bodies). So that the body is not perishable, and he that fornicates sins against his own body."

vii. 1. Alford says that this chapter was written under the strong impression of the near approach of the end of this state of affairs, and as advising them under circumstances in which persecution and

vi. 12—20. "All things are lawful:" words probably used by Paul referring to things indifferent, but perverted by some in Corinth, who argued that the existence of bodily appetites proved the lawfulness of their gratification. Alford says, "The argument is, meats are expressly created for the belly, and the belly for them, by its organisation being fitted to assimilate them; and both these are of a transitory nature. In the change to the more perfect state, God will do away with both. Therefore meats are indifferent. But neither is under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace. 16 For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

In this paragraph the apostle gives them direction in a case which must be very frequent in that age of the world, especially among the Jewish converts, I mean whether they were to live with heathen relatives in a married state. Moses' law permitted divorce; and there was a famous instance in the Jewish state, when the people were obliged to put away their idolatrous wives, Ezr. x. 3. This might move a scruple in many minds, whether converts to Christianity were not bound to put away, or desert their mates, continuing infidels. Concerning this matter, the apostle here gives direction. And,

First. In general he tells them that marriage by Christ's command is for life: and, therefore, those who are married must not think of separation. The wife must not "depart from the husband," ver. 10; nor "the husband put away his wife," ver. 11. This "I command," saith the apostle, "yet not I, but the Lord;" not that he commanded any thing of his own head, or upon his own authority. Whatever he commanded was the Lord's command; dictated by his Spirit, and enjoined by his authority. But his meaning is, that the Lord himself with his own mouth had forbidden such separations, Mat. v. 32; xix. 9; Mar. x. 11; Lu. xvi. 18. Note, Man and wife cannot separate at pleasure, or dissolve when they will their matrimonial bonds and relation. They must not separate for any other cause than what Christ allows. And, therefore, the apostle advises that if any woman had been separated, either by a voluntary act of her own, or by an act of her husband, she should continue unmarried, and seek reconciliation with her husband, that they might cohabit again. Note, Husbands and wives should not quarrel at all, or should be quickly reconciled. They are bound to each other for life. The Divine law allows of no separation. They cannot throw off the burthen; and, therefore, should set their shoulders to it, and endeavour to make it as light to each other as they can.

Secondly. He brings the general advice home to the case of such as had an unbelieving mate, ver. 12. "But to the rest speak I, not the Lord;" that is, the Lord had not so expressly spoken to this case, as to the former of divorce. It doth not mean that the apostle spoke without authority from the Lord, or decided this case by his own wisdom, without the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. He closes this subject with a declaration to the contrary, ver. 40, "I think also, that I have the Spirit of God." But having thus prefaced his advice, we may attend, 1. To the advice itself; which is, that if an unbelieving husband or wife were pleased to dwell with a Christian relative the other should not separate. The husband should not put away an unbelieving wife, nor the wife leave an unbelieving husband, ver. 12, 13. The Christian calling did not dissolve the marriage covenant, but bind it the faster by bringing it back to the original institution, limiting it to two persons, and binding them together for life. The believer is not by faith in Christ loosed from matrimonial bonds to an unbeliever, but is at once bound and made apt to be a better relative; but though a believing wife or husband should not separate from an unbelieving mate, yet, if the unbelieving relative desert the believer, and no means can reconcile to a cohabitation, in such a case a brother or sister is not in bondage, ver. 15; not tied up to the unreasonable humour, and bound servilely to follow, or cleave to the malicious deserter, or not bound to live unmarried after all proper means for reconciliation have been tried, at least, if the deserter contracts another marriage, or be guilty of adultery, which was a very easy supposition, because a very common instance among the heathen inhabitants of Corinth. In such a case the deserted person must be free to marry again, and it is granted on all hands; and some think, that such a malicious desertion is as much a dissolution of the marriage covenant as death itself. For how is it possible that the two shall be one flesh, when the one is maliciously bent to part from, or put away the other? Indeed, the deserter seems still bound by the matrimonial contract; and therefore the apostle saith, ver. 11, that "if she depart" from her husband, upon account of his infidelity, "let her remain unmarried." But the deserted party seems to be left more at liberty, (I mean, supposing all the proper means have been used to reclaim the deserter, and other circumstances make it necessary,) to marry another person. It does not seem reasonable they should still be bound, when it is rendered impossible to perform conjugal duties, or enjoy conjugal comforts, through the mere fault of their mate. In such a case marriage would be a state of servitude indeed. [It is not improbable that the apostle meant merely that the party deserted was freed from many obligations to the other, not, that the marriage was dissolved.] But, whatever liberty be indulged Christians in such a case as this, they are not allowed for the mere infidelity of an husband or wife to separate; but, if the unbeliever be willing, they should continue in the relation, and cohabit as those who are thus related. This is the apostle's general direction. 2. We have here the reasons of this advice. 1st. Because the relation or state is sanctified by the holiness of either party; "For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife by the husband," ver. 14; or, "hath been sanctified." The relation itself, and the conjugal use of each other, are sanctified to the believer; "to the pure all things are pure," Tit. i. 15. Marriage is a Divine institution, it is a compact for life by God's appointment. Should converse and congress with unbelievers in that relation defile the believer, or render him or her offensive to God, the ends of marriage would have been defeated, and the comforts of it in a manner destroyed, in the circumstances in which Christians then were. But the apostle tells them that, though they were yoked with unbelievers, yet, if themselves were holy, marriage was to them a holy state, and marriage comforts even with an unbelieving relative were sanctified enjoyments. It was no more displeasing to God for them to continue to live as they did before with their unbelieving or heathen relation, than if they had become converts together. If one of the relatives were become holy, nothing of the duties or lawful comforts of the married state could defile them, and render them displeasing to God, though the other were a heathen. He is sanctified for the wife's sake; she is sanctified for the husband's sake; both are one flesh. He is to be reputed clean who is one flesh with her who is holy, and vice versa: "Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy," ver. 14; that is, they would be heathen, out of the pale of the church and covenant of God. They would not be of the holy seed, as the Jews are called, Isa. vi. 13; but common and unclean, in the same sense as heathens in general were styled in the apostle's vision, Acts x. 28. This way of speaking is according to the dialect of the Jews; among whom a child begot by parents yet heathens was said to be begotten out of holiness; and a child begotten by parents made proselytes is said to be begotten intra sanctitatem,—"within the holy inclosure." Thus Christians are called commonly saints, such they are by profession, separated to be a peculiar people of God, and as such distinguished from the world; and, therefore, the children born to Christians, though married to unbelievers, are not to be reckoned as part of the world, but of the church; a holy, not a common and unclean, seed. Continue, therefore, to live even with unbelieving relatives; for if you are holy the relation is so, the state is so, you may make a holy use even of an unbelieving relative in conjugal duties, and your seed will be holy too. What a comfort is this, where both relatives are believers? 2nd. Another reason is, that God hath called Christians to peace, ver. 15. The Christian religion obliges us to carry it peaceably in all relations, natural and civil. We are bound as much as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men, Rom. xii. 18; and, therefore, surely, to promote the peace and comfort of our nearest relatives, those with whom we are one flesh, nay, though they should be infidels. Note, It should be the labour and study of those who are married to make each other as easy and happy as possible. 3rd. A third reason is, that it is possible for the believing relative to be an instrument of the other's salvation; ver. 16, "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?" Note, It is the plain duty of those in so near a relation to endeavour the salvation of their souls to whom they are related. Do not separate. There is other duty now called for; the conjugal relation calls for the most close and endeared affection, it is a contract for life. And should a Christian desert a mate, when an opportunity offers to give the most glorious proof of love? Stay, and labour heartily [and with prayer] the conversion of thy relative; endeavour to save a soul. Who knows but this may be the event? It is not impossible; and, though there be no great probability, saving a soul is so good and glorious a service, that the bare possibility should put one on exerting one's self. Note, Mere possibility of success should be a sufficient motive with us to use our diligent endeavours for saving the souls of our relations. "What know I but I may save his soul?" should move me to attempt it.

17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches. 18 Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised. 19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God. 20 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. 21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it: but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. 22 For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant. 23 Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men. 24 Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God.

Here the apostle takes occasion to advise them to continue in the state and condition in which Christianity found them, and they became converts to it. And here,

First. He lays down this rule in general; as God hath distributed to every one. Note, Our states and circumstances in this world are distributions of Divine providence. This fixes the bounds of men's habitations, and orders their steps. God setteth up and pulleth down; and again, "as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk." Whatever his circumstances or condition were when he was converted to Christianity, let him abide therein, and suit his conversation to it: the rules of Christianity reach every condition, and in every state a man may live so as to be a credit to it. Note, It is the duty of every Christian to suit his behaviour to his condition, and the rules of religion; to be content with his lot, and carry himself in his rank and place as becomes a Christian. The apostle adds, that this was a general rule, to be observed at all times, and in all places; "So ordain I in all churches."

Secondly. He instances in particular cases, as, 1. That of circumcision. "Is any man called being circumcised? let him not be uncircumcised. Is any man called being uncircumcised? let him not become circumcised." It matters not, whether a man be a Jew or Gentile, within the covenant of peculiarity made with Abraham, or without it. He who is converted being a Jew has no need to give himself uneasiness upon that head, and wish himself uncircumcised. Nor is he who is converted from Gentilism under an obligation to be circumcised; nor should he be concerned because he wants that mark of distinction which did heretofore belong to the people of God. For, as the apostle goes on, "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commands of God," ver. 19: in point of acceptance with God, it is neither here nor there whether men be circumcised or not. Note, It is practical religion, sincere obedience to the commands of God, [as the evidence of real faith,] on which the Gospel lays stress. External observances without internal piety are as nothing. Therefore, "let every man abide in the same calling," that is, state, "wherein he was called," ver. 20. 2. That of servitude and freedom. It was common in that age of the world for many to be in a state of slavery, bought and sold for money, and so the property of those who purchased them. Now, saith the apostle, "Art thou called being a servant? care not for it;" he not over-solicitous about it. It is neither inconsistent with thy duty, profession, nor hopes, as a Christian; "yet, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather," ver. 21. There are many conveniences in a state of freedom above that of servitude; a man has more power over himself, and more command of his time, and is not under the control of another lord; and, therefore, liberty is the more eligible state. But men's outward condition does not let nor further their acceptance with God. "For he that is called, being a servant, is the Lord's freed man," אפדהו, "as he that is called, being free, is the Lord's servant." Though he be not discharged from his Master's service, he is freed from the dominion and vassalage of sin; though he be not enslaved to Christ, yet he is bound to yield himself up wholly to his pleasure and service; and yet that service is perfect freedom. Note, Our comfort and happiness depend on what we are to Christ, not what we are in the world. The goodness of our outward condition doth not discharge us from the duties of Christianity, nor the badness of it debar us from Christian privileges. He who is a slave may yet be a Christian freeman; he who is a freeman may yet be Christ's servant. He is bought with a price, and should not therefore be the servant of man; not that he must quit the service of his master, or not take all proper measures to please him, this were to family division for the Gospel's sake might at any time break up the relations of life. "Good:" as opposed to bad. Paul is not asserting the superiority of the unmarried state, but "starts with a broad and surely very credible proposition. 'There is,' he would say, 'nothing wrong, as the Jews argued, but rather something very proper, nay, very honourable, in having nothing to do with women carnally,' as there certainly was in Paul's case, and in that of many others who for wise reasons have given themselves up to a life of chaste celibacy."

vii. 6. "I say this by way of allowance, not by way of command;" i.e., he gives the recommendation in verse 5 as an allowance, not command.

vii. 8. "Even as I:" i.e., unmarried. It seems impossible to decide whether Paul had ever been married. These words would be equally applicable whether he had never been married or was at this time a widower. Alford holds that he never was married; Conybeare and Howson and others that he was a widower.

contradict the whole scope of the apostle's discourse. But he must not be so the servant of men but that Christ's will must be obeyed, and regarded more than his master's; he hath paid a much dearer purchase for him, and hath a much fuller property in him. He is to be served and obeyed without limitation or reserve. Note, The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master besides himself, should serve no man any farther than is consistent with their duty to him; "No man can serve two masters." Though some understand this passage of persons being bought out of slavery by the bounty and charity of fellow Christians, and read the passage thus, Have you been redeemed out of slavery with a price? do not again become enslaved, just as before he had advised that, if in slavery they had any prospect of being made free, they should choose it rather. This meaning the words will bear, but the other seems the more natural: see ch. vi. 20.

Thirdly, He sums up his advice; "Let every man wherein he is called therein abide with God," ver. 24. This is to be understood of the state wherein a man is converted to Christianity; no man should make his faith or religion an argument to break through any natural or civil obligations. He should quietly and comfortably abide in the condition in which he is, and this he may well do when he may abide therein with God. Note, The special presence and favour of God is not limited to any outward condition or performance; he may enjoy it who is circumcised, and so may he who is uncircumcised. He that is bound may have it as well as he who is free. In this respect, "there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free," Col. iii. 11. The favour of God is not bound.

25 Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. 26 I suppose therefore that this is good for the present distress, I say, that it is good for a man so to be. 27 Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. 28 But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you. 29 But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none; 30 And they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; 31 And they that use this world, as not abusing it: for the fashion of this world passeth away. 32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: 33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. 34 There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit: but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. 35 And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

The apostle resumes his discourse, and gives directions to virgins how to act. Concerning which we may take notice.

First, Of the manner wherein he introduces them; "Now concerning virgins I have no commandment of the Lord," ver. 25. I have no express and universal law delivered by the Lord himself concerning celibacy; but I give my judgment as one who hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, namely, in his apostleship. He acted faithfully, and therefore his direction was to be regarded as a rule of Christ; for he gave judgment as one who was a faithful apostle of Christ. Though Christ had before delivered no universal law about that matter, he now gives direction by an inspired apostle, one who had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. Note, Faithfulness in the ministry is owing to the grace and mercy of Christ. It is what Paul was ready to acknowledge upon all occasions; "I laboured more abundantly than they all, yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me," ch. xv. 10. And it is a great mercy they obtain from God who prove faithful in the ministry of his word, either ordinary or extraordinary.

Secondly, The determination he gives, which, considering the present distress, was, that a state of celibacy was preferable. "It is good for a man so to be," that is, to be single. "I suppose," saith the apostle, or, it is my opinion. It is worded with modesty, but delivered notwithstanding with apostolical authority. It is not the mere opinion of a private man, but the very determination of the Spirit of God in an apostle, though it be thus spoken; and it was thus delivered to give it the more weight. Those that were prejudiced against the apostle might have rejected this advice had it been given with a mere authoritative air. Note, Ministers do not lose their authority by prudent condescensions. They must become all things to all men, that they may do them the more good. "This is good," saith he, "for the present distress." Christians, at the first planting their religion, were grievously persecuted. Their enemies were very bitter against them, and treated them very cruelly. They were continually liable to be tossed and hurried by persecution. This being the then state of things, he did not think it so advisable for Christians that were single to change conditions. The married state would bring more care and cumber along with it, ver. 33, 34, and would therefore make persecution more terrible, and render them less able to bear it. Note, Christians, in regulating their conduct, should not barely consider what is lawful in itself, but what may be expedient for them.

Thirdly, Notwithstanding he thus determines, he is very careful to satisfy them, that he does not condemn marriage in the gross, or declare it unlawful. And therefore, though he says, "If thou art loosed from a wife," in a single state, whether bachelor or widower, virgin or widow, "do not seek a wife," do not hastily change conditions; yet he adds, "If thou art bound to a wife, do not seek to be loosed;" it is thy duty to continue in the married relation, and do the duties of it. And though such, if they were called to suffer persecution, would find peculiar difficulties in it, yet, to avoid these difficulties, they must not cast off, or break through, the bonds of duty; duty must be done, and God trusted with events. But to neglect duty is the way to put ourselves out of Divine protection. He adds, therefore, "If thou marry, thou hast not sinned; or if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned; but such shall have trouble in the flesh." Marrying is not in itself a sin, but marrying at that time was likely to bring inconvenience upon them, and add to the calamities of the times; and therefore he thought it advisable and expedient that such as could contain should refrain from it; but adds, that he would not lay celibacy on them as a yoke, or by seeming to urge it too far draw them into any snare; and therefore says, "But I spare you." Note, How opposite in this the Papist casuists are to the apostle Paul. They forbid many to marry, and entangle them with vows of celibacy, whether they can bear the yoke or no.

Fourthly, He takes this occasion to give general rules to all Christians, to carry themselves with a holy indifferency towards the world, and every thing in it. 1. As to relations; "They that had wives" must be "as though they had none," that is, they must not set their hearts too much on the comforts of the relation; they must be as though they had none. They know not how soon they shall have none. This advice must be carried into every other relation. Those who have children should be as though they had none. They who were their comfort now may prove their greatest cross; and soon may the flower of all comforts be cut down. 2. As to afflictions; they that weep "must be" as though they wept not, that is, we must not be dejected too much with any of our afflictions, nor indulge ourselves in the sorrow of the world, but keep up a holy joy in God, in the midst of all our troubles, so that even in sorrow the heart may be joyful, and the end of our grief may be gladness; "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy will come in the morning;" and, if we can but get to heaven at last, "all tears shall be wiped from our eyes;" and the prospect of it now should make us moderate our sorrows, and refrain our tears. 3. As to worldly enjoyments; "They that rejoice" should be "as though they rejoiced not," that is, they should not take too great complacency in any of their comforts; they must be moderate in their mirth, and sit loose to the enjoyments they most value. Here is not their rest, nor are these things their portion; and therefore their hearts should not be set on them, nor should they place their solace or satisfaction in them. 4. As to worldly traffic and employment; "They that buy" must be "as though they possessed not;" those that prosper in trade, increase in wealth, and purchase estates, should hold their possessions as though they held them not. It is but setting their hearts on that which is not (Pr. xiii. 5) to do otherwise. Buying and possessing should not too much engage our minds; they hinder many people altogether from minding the better part. Purchasing land and trying oxen kept the guests invited from the wedding supper, Lu. xiv. 18, 19; and, when they do not altogether hinder men from minding their chief business, they do very much divert them from a close pursuit. They are most likely to run so as to obtain the prize who ease their minds of all foreign cares and cumberance. 5. As to all worldly concerns; "They that use this world as not abusing it," ver. 31. The world may be used, but must not be abused. It is abused when it is not used to those purposes for which it is given, to honour God, and do good to men; when, instead of being oil to the wheels of our obedience, it is a dead fuel to lust; when, instead of being a servant, it is made our master, our idol, and hath that room in our affections which should be reserved for God. And there is great danger of abusing it in all these respects, if our hearts are too much set upon it. We must keep the world as much as may be out of our hearts, that we may not abuse it when we have it in our hands.

The apostle enforces these advices with two reasons. 1st, "The time is short," ver. 29. We have but little time to continue in this world; but a short season for possessing and enjoying worldly things; καρὸς συνταλαιμῶνος. It is contracted, reduced to a narrow compass; it will soon be gone; it is just ready to be wrapt up in eternity, swallowed up of eternity; therefore do not set your hearts on worldly enjoyments, do not be overwhelmed with worldly cares and troubles. Possess what you must shortly leave without suffering yourselves to be possessed by it. Why should your hearts be much set on what you must quickly resign? 2nd, "The fashion of this world passeth away," ver. 31; σχῆμα, the habit, figure, appearance of the world passeth away. It is daily changing countenance; it is in a continual flux. It is not so much a world as the appearance of one. All is show; nothing solid in it; and yet it is transient show too, and will be quickly gone; [it passes like a pagant.] How proper and powerful an argument is this to enforce the former advice! How irrational is it to be affected with the images, the fading and transient images, of a dream! Surely man walketh in a vain show," Ps. xxxix. 9—in an image, amidst the faint and vanishing appearances of things. And should he be deeply affected, or grievously afflicted, with such a scene?

Fifthly, He presses his general advice, by warning them against the embarrassment of worldly cares; "But I would have you without carefulness," ver. 3. Indeed, to be careless is a fault; a wise concern about worldly interests is a duty; but to be careful, full of care, to have an anxious and perplexing care about them, is a sin. All that care which disquiets the mind, and distracts it in the worship of God, [and diverts it from his love,] is evil; for God must be attended upon without distraction, ver. 35. The whole mind should be engaged when God is worshipped. The work ceases whilst it diverts to any thing else, or is hurried and drawn hither and thither by foreign affairs and concerns. They who are engaged in Divine worship should attend to this very thing,—should make it their whole business. But how is this possible, when the mind is swallowed up of the cares of this life? Note, It is the wisdom of a Christian so to order his outward affairs, and choose such a condition in life, as to be without distracting cares, that he may attend upon the Lord with a mind at leisure, and disengaged. This is the general maxim by which the apostle would have Christians govern themselves; in the application of it Christian prudence must direct. That condition of life is best for every man which is best for his

vii. 10. "Not I, but the Lord:" see Matt. v. 32, xix. 4; Mark x. 12. "He was merely repeating what had already been enjoined by Christ himself," and so "not the Lord," in verse 12, would, according to Alford, mean that Christ had not given any direct command.

vii. 12. "The rest:" the other classes about which the Corinthians had asked—i.e., those involved in mixed marriages with unbelievers.

vii. 15. "The unbeliever may separate, but the main principle remains to the Christian that he is called to peace, and therefore a peaceful disposition must always prevail, in order not to give cause on his or her side for separation. The possibility, however, cannot and must not be denied that the mind of the heathen party may also change after separation. It cannot, from this very possibility, be the apostle's meaning that the Christian party is at liberty to marry again when the heathen has left him or her; the Christian is only relieved from the obligation of living with a heathen, and this and keeps him most clear of the cares and snares of the world. By this maxim the apostle solves the case put to him by the Corinthians, Whether it were advisable to marry? To this he says, That by reason of the present distress,—and it may be in general, to be sure at that time, when Christians were married to infidels, and perhaps under a necessity to do so if they married at all,—I say, in these circumstances to continue unmarried would be the way to free themselves from many cares and encumbrances, and allow them more vacation for the service of God. Ordinarily, the less care we have about the world, the more freedom we have for the service of God. Now, the married state at that time (if not at all times) did bring most worldly care along with it; “He that is married careth for the things of the world, that he may please his wife,” ver. 33. “And she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband. But the unmarried man and woman mind the things of the Lord, that they may please the Lord, and be holy both in body and spirit,” ver. 32, 33. Not but the married person may be holy both in body and spirit too. Celibacy is not in itself a state of greater purity and sanctity than marriage; but the unmarried would be able to make religion more their business at that juncture, because they would have less distraction from worldly cares. Marriage is that condition of life that brings care along with it, though at some times it brings more than others. It is the constant care of those in that relation to please each other, though this is more difficult to do at some seasons, and in some cases, than in others. At that season therefore the apostle advises that those who were single should abstain from marriage, if they were under no necessity to change conditions. And, where the same reason is plain at other times, the rule is as plain, and as fit to be observed; and the very same rule must determine persons for marriage, where there is the same reason, that is, if in the unmarried state persons are likely to be more distracted in the service of God than if they were married, which is a case supposable in many respects. This is the general rule which every one’s discretion must apply to his own particular case; and by it should he endeavour to determine whether it be for marriage or against. That condition of life should be chosen by the Christian in which it is most likely he shall have the best helps and the least hindrances in the service of God, and the affairs of his own salvation.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not: let them marry. 37 Nevertheless he that standeth stedfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well. 38 So then he that giveth her in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better.

GIVING IN MARRIAGE.

In this passage the apostle is commonly supposed to give advice about the disposal of children in marriage, upon the footing of his former determination; in which view the general meaning is plain. It was in that age, and those parts of the world, and especially among the Jews, reckoned a disgrace for a woman to remain unmarried past a certain number of years. It gave a suspicion of somewhat that was not for her reputation. Now, says the apostle, if any man think she behaves unhandsonly towards his daughter, and that it is not for her credit to remain unmarried when she is at full age, and that upon this footing it is needful to dispose of her in marriage, he may use his pleasure. It is no sin in him to dispose of her to a suitable mate. But if a man has determined in himself to keep her a virgin, and stands to this determination, and is under no necessity to dispose of her in marriage, but is at liberty, with her consent, to pursue his purpose, he doth well in keeping her a virgin. In short, “he that giveth her in marriage doeth well” but he that keeps her single, if she can be easy and innocent in such a state, does what is better; that is, more convenient for her in the present state of things, if not at all times and seasons. Note, 1. That children should be at the disposal of their parents, and not dispose of themselves in marriage. Yet, 2. That parents should consult their children’s inclinations both to marriage in general and to the person in particular, and not reckon they have uncontrollable power to do with them, and dictate to them, as they please. 3. It is our duty not only to consider what is lawful, but, in many cases at least, what is fit to be done, before we do it.

alone is intended by the words ‘is not bound’” (Olshausen). “The cases here spoken of are not so much regular divorces as accidental separations” (Stanley).

vii. 21. “Use it.” What? Two very different renderings have been given: 1. “Use it,” i.e., the opportunity of being free; 2. “Use it,” i.e., the slavery—“remain in slavery though the offer of freedom is made.” It is hard to decide which is the right rendering. Many of the ablest commentators adopt the latter.

But I think the apostle is here continuing his former discourse, and advising unmarried persons, who are at their own disposal, what to do; the man a virgin being meant of his virginity. Τηρει την ελευθεριαν παρθενου, seems to be rather meant of preserving his own virginity than keeping his daughter a virgin, though it be altogether uncommon to use the word in this sense. Several other reasons may be seen in Locke and Whithy, by those who will consult them. And it was a common matter of reproach, both among Jews and civilised heathens, for a man to continue single beyond such a term of years; though all did not agree in limiting the single life to the same term. The general meaning of the apostle is the same, that it was no sin to marry, if a man thought there was a necessity upon him to avoid popular reproach, much less to avoid the hurrying fervours of lust. But he that was in his own power stood firm in his purpose, and found himself under no necessity to marry, would at that season, and in the circumstances of Christians at that time, at least, make a choice every way most for his own convenience, ease, and advantage, as to his spiritual concerns. And it is highly expedient, if not a duty, for Christians to be guided by such a consideration. [The first of these interpretations is now generally received; the second appears to be inconsistent with the statement in ver. 34, and that in ver. 38.]

39 The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord. 40 But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment: and I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

The whole is here closed up with an advice to widows. As long as the husband liveth the wife is bound by the law; confined to one husband, and bound to continue and cohabit with him. Note, The marriage contract is for life; death only can annul the bond. But, the husband being dead, she is at liberty to marry whom she will. There is no limitation by God’s law to be married only for such a number of times. It is certain second marriages are not unlawful, from this passage; for then the widow could not be at liberty to marry whom she pleased, nor to marry a second time at all; but the apostle asserts she has such a liberty when her husband is dead, only with a limitation that she marry in the Lord. In our choice of relations and change of conditions we should always have an eye to God. Note, Marriages are then only like to have God’s blessing when they are made in the Lord; when persons are guided by the fear of God, and the laws of God, and act in dependence on the providence of God, in the change and choice of a mate; when they can look up to God and sincerely seek his direction, and humbly hope for his blessing upon their conduct. “But she is happier,” saith the apostle, “if she so abide,” that is, continue a widow, “in my judgment: and I think I have the Spirit of God,” ver. 40. At this juncture at least, if not ordinarily, it will be much more for the peace and quiet of such, and give them less hindrance in the service of God, to continue unmarried; and this he tells them was by inspiration of the Spirit. Whatever your false apostles may think of me, I think, and have reason to know, that I have the Spirit of God. Note, Change of condition in marriage is so important a matter, that it ought not to be made but upon due deliberation; after careful consideration of circumstances, and upon very probable grounds at least, that it will be a change to advantage in our spiritual concerns.

CHAPTER VIII.

The apostle in this chapter answers another case proposed to him by some of the Corinthians, about eating those things that had been sacrificed to idols. I. He hints at the occasion of this case, and gives a caution against too high esteem of their knowledge, ver. 1—3. II. He asserts the vanity of idols, and the unity of Godhead, and the sole mediation of Christ between God and man, ver. 4—6. III. He tells them that, upon supposition that it were lawful in itself to eat of things offered to idols, for that they themselves are nothing, yet regard must be had to the weakness of Christian brethren, and nothing done that would lay a stumblingblock before them, and occasion their sin and destruction, ver. 7—13.

OW as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth. 2 And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. 3 But if any man love God, the same is known of him.

The apostle comes here to the case of things that had been offered to idols, concerning which some of them sought satisfaction; a case that was frequent in that age of Christianity, when the church of Christ was among the heathen, and the Israel of God must live among the Canaanites. For the understanding of it the better, it must be observed, that it was a custom among the heathens to make feasts on their sacrifices; and not only to eat themselves, but invite their friends to partake with them. These were usually kept in the temple where the sacrifice was offered: see ver. 10; and if any thing were left when the feast ended, it was usual to carry away a portion to their friends; what remained after all belonging to the priests, who sometimes sold it in the markets: see ch. x. 25. Nay, feasts, as Athenaeus informs us, were always accounted among the heathen sacred and religious things, so that they were wont to sacrifice before all their feasts; and it was accounted a very profane thing amongst them, ἀβύρα ἐπιβίειν, to eat at their private tables any meat whereof they had not first sacrificed on such occasions.

In this circumstance of things, while Christians lived among idolaters, had many relations and friends that were such, with whom they must keep

vii. 26. “The present distress:” according to some, the famine under Claudius; according to others, the oppressions and persecutions of the Christians; the fearful crisis and bitter conflicts just preceding the coming of Christ, which was anticipated as near.

vii. 29. Alford translates, “the time that remains is short;” literally, “the time is shortened henceforth”—i.e., the interval between now and the coming of the Lord has arrived at an extremely contracted period.

quaintance, and maintain good neighbourhood, and therefore have occasion to eat at their tables, what should they do, if any thing that had been sacrificed should be set before them? What if they should be invited to feast with them in their temples? It seems as if some of the Corinthians were got into an opinion that even this might be done, because they knew an idol was "nothing in the world," ver. 4. The apostle seems to answer more directly to the case, ch. x., and here to argue, upon supposition of their being right in this thought, against their abuse of their liberty, to the prejudice of others; but plainly condemns such liberty in ch. x. The apostle introduces his discourse with some remarks about knowledge, that seem to carry in them a censure of such pretences to knowledge as I have mentioned; "We know," saith the apostle, "that we all have knowledge," ver. 1: as if he had said, "You are not the only knowing persons who take such liberty; we, who abstain, know as much as you of the vanity of idols, and that they are nothing; but we know too, that the liberty you take is very culpable, and that even lawful liberty must be used with charity, and not to the prejudice of weaker brethren." "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth," ver. 1. Note, 1. The preference of charity to conceited knowledge. That is best which is fitted to do the greatest good. Knowledge, or at least a high conceit of it, is very apt to swell the mind,—to fill it with wind, and so puff it up. This tends to no good to ourselves, but in many instances is much to the hurt of others. But true love and tender regard to our brethren will put us upon consulting their interest, and acting as may be for their edification. Observe, 2. That there is no more common evidence of ignorance than a conceit of knowledge. "If any man think that he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know." He that knows most best understands his own ignorance, and the imperfection of human knowledge. He who imagines himself a knowing man, and is vain and conceited on this imagination, has reason to suspect that he knows nothing aright,—nothing as he ought to know it. Note, It is one thing to know truth and another to know it as we ought, so as duly to improve our knowledge. Much may be known, when nothing is known to any good purpose; where neither ourselves nor others are the better for our knowledge. And they who think they know any thing, and grow vain hereupon, are of all men most likely to make no good use of their knowledge; neither themselves nor others are likely to be benefited by it. "But," adds the apostle, "if any man love God, the same is known of God." If any man love God, and is thereby influenced to love his neighbour, the same is known of God; that is, as some understand, is made by him to know, is taught of God. Note, They that love God are most likely to be taught of God, and be made by him to know as they ought. Some understand, [and this is the preferable sense,] 'shall be approved of God; he will accept him, and have pleasure in him. Note, The charitable person is most likely to have God's favour; [not for his charity, but, he loves God because God first loved him, and gave him his only begotten Son for him.] They who love God, and for his sake love their brethren, and seek their welfare, are likely to be beloved of God; and how much better is it to be approved of God than to have a vain opinion of ourselves.

4 As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one. 5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) 6 But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him.

In this passage he shews the vanity of idols. "As to the eating of things that have been sacrificed to idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world;" or, there is no idol in the world; or, an idol can do nothing in the world; for the form of expression in the original is elliptical. The meaning in the general is, that heathen idols have no divinity in them; and therefore, in the Old Testament, are commonly called lies and vanities, or lying vanities. They are mere imaginary gods, and many [all] of them no better than imaginary beings; and have no power to pollute the creatures of God, and thereby render them unfit to be eaten by a child or servant of God. "Every creature of God is good if it be received with thanksgiving," 1 Tim. iv. 4; and it is not in the power of the vanities of the heathens to change its nature. "And there is no other God but one." Heathen idols are not gods, nor to be owned and respected as gods, for there is no other God but one. Note, The unity of the godhead is a fundamental principle in Christianity, and in all right religion. The gods of the heathens must be nothing in the world, must have no divinity in them, nothing of real godhead belonging to them; for "there is no other God but one." Others may be called gods; there be that are called gods in heaven and earth, gods many and lords many." But they are there falsely thus called. The heathens had many such, some in heaven and some on earth; celestial deities, that were of highest rank and repute amongst them; and terrestrial ones, men made into gods, that were to mediate for men with the former, and were deputed by them to preside over earthly affairs. These are called Baalim commonly in the Scripture. They had gods of higher and lower degree; nay, many in each order, "gods many and lords many" but all titular deities and mediators; so called, but not such in truth. All their divinity and mediation were imaginary. For, 1. "To us there is but one God," saith the apostle, "the Father, of whom are all things, and we in" or for "him." We Christians are better informed; we well know there is but one God, the fountain of being, the author of all things, maker, preserver, and governor of the whole world, "of whom, and for whom, are all things;" not one God to govern one part of mankind, or one rank and order of men, and another to govern another. One God made all, and therefore has power over all. All things are of him, and we and all things else are for him. Called the Father here, not in contradistinction to the other persons of the sacred Trinity, and to exclude them from the Godhead, but in contradistinction to all creatures that were made by God, and whose formation is attributed to each of these three in other places of Scripture, and not appropriated to the Father alone. God the Father, as fons et fundamentum Trinitatis,—"as the first person in the Godhead, and the original of the other two," stands here for the Deity, which yet comprehends all three; the name God being sometimes in Scripture ascribed to the Father, κατ' ἐξουσίαν, or 'by way of eminency,' because he is fons et principium Deitatis, as Calvin observes, "the fountain of the Deity in the other two," they having it by communication from him. So that there is but one God, the Father, and yet the Son is God too, but is not another God; the Father with his Son and Spirit being the one God, but not without them, or so as to exclude them from the Godhead. 2. There is to us but one Lord, one Mediator between God and men, namely Jesus Christ. Not many mediators, as the heathen imagined, but one only, by whom all things were created, and do consist, and to whom all our hope and happiness are owing,—the man Christ Jesus; but a man in personal union with the Divine Word, or God the Son. This very man hath God made both Lord and Christ, Acts ii. 26. Jesus Christ, in his human nature and mediatorial state, has a delegated power; a name given him, though above every name, "that at his name every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that he is Lord." And thus he is the only Lord and only Mediator that Christians acknowledge, the only person who comes between God and sinners, administers the world's affairs under God, and mediates for men with God. All the lords of this sort among heathens are mere imaginary ones. Note, It is the great privilege of us Christians that we know the true God and true Mediator between God and men; "The true God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent," Jno. xvii. 3.

7 Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled. 8 But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse. 9 But take heed lest by any means this liberty of your's become a stumblingblock to them that are weak. 10 For if any man see thee which hath knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; 11 And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? 12 But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. 13 Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

The apostle having granted, and indeed confirmed the opinion of some among the Corinthians, that idols were nothing, proceeds now to shew them that their inference from this assumption was not just, namely, that therefore they might go into the idol temple and eat of the sacrifices, and feast there with their heathen neighbours. He does not indeed here so much insist upon the unlawfulness of the thing in itself as the mischief such freedom might do to weaker Christians, persons that had not the same measure of knowledge with these pretenders. And here he, as to be able to eat of these portions without scruple. So St. Paul inculcates charity on the part of the stronger toward the weaker. Alford says, "The case supposed is the only one which can occur when love is absent and conceit present; a man can then only think he knows—no real knowledge being accessible without humility and love. Such a man 'knows not yet as he ought to know,' has had no real practice in the art of knowing. But those who become acquainted with God by love are the especial objects of the Divine knowledge, vii. 36. "Virgin:" i.e., his virgin daughter. "Uncomely:" by withholding his consent to her marriage. "Let them marry:" i.e., his daughter and her lover.

viii. 1. Portions of the animals offered in sacrifice were eaten in private houses or sold in the markets, and hence the Christians were constantly meeting them. They were a source of greater scruple to some than to others. "All had knowledge:" i.e., knew that an idol was really nothing; but some had not so firm a grasp over this knowledge first. Informs them every Christian man at that time was not so fully convinced and persuaded that an idol was nothing. "Howbeit there is not in every man this knowledge; for some with conscience of the idol, unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol." "With conscience of the idol;" that is, some confused veneration for it. Though they were converts to Christianity, and professed the true religion, they were not perfectly cured of the old leaven, but retained an unaccountable respect for the idols they had worshipped before. Note, Weak Christians may be ignorant, or have but a confused knowledge of [some of] the great and plainer truths; such were those of the one God and one Mediator. And yet some of those who were turned from heathenism to Christianity among the Corinthians seem to have retained a veneration for their idols, utterly irreconcilable with those great principles; so as, when an opportunity offered to eat things offered to idols, they did not abstain to testify their abhorrence of idolatry, nor eat with a professed contempt of the idol by declaring they looked upon it to be nothing; and so their conscience, being weak, was denied; that is, they contracted guilt. They ate out of respect to the idol with an imagination that it had something Divine in it, and so committed idolatry; whereas the design of the Gospel was to turn men from dumb idols to the living God. They were weak in their understanding, not thoroughly apprized to the vanity of idols; and, whilst they ate what was sacrificed to them out of veneration for them, contracted the guilt of idolatry, and so greatly polluted themselves. This seems to be the sense of the place, [and the sense now generally received,] though some understand it of weak Christians defiling themselves by eating what was offered to an idol with an apprehension that thereby it became unclean, and made them so in a moral sense who should eat it; every one not having a knowledge that the idol was nothing, and therefore that it could not render what was offered to it in this sense unclean. Note, We should be careful to do nothing that may occasion weak Christians to defile their consciences.

Secondly. He tells them that mere eating and drinking had nothing in them virtuous or criminal, nothing that could make them better or worse, pleasing or displeasing to God. "Meat commendeth us not to God; for neither if we eat are we the better, nor if we eat not are we the worse," ver. 8. It looks as if some of the Corinthians made a merit of their eating what had been offered to idols, and that in their very temples too, ver. 10, because it plainly shewed they thought the idols nothing. But eating or drinking are in themselves actions indifferent. It matters little what we eat. What goes into the man of this sort neither purifies nor defiles; and flesh offered to idols may in itself be as proper for food as any other, and the bare eating or forbearing to eat has no virtue in it. Note, It is a gross mistake to think that distinction of food will make any distinction between men in God's account. Eating this food and forbearing that hath nothing in it to recommend a person to God.

Thirdly. He cautions them against abusing their liberty, the liberty they thought they had in this matter; for that they mistook this matter, and had no allowance to sit at meat in the idol's temple, seems plain from ch. x. 20, &c. But the apostle argues here, that, even upon supposition they had such power, they must be cautious how they use it: it might be a stumblingblock to the weak, ver. 9; it might occasion their falling into idolatrous actions, perhaps their falling off from Christianity, and revolting again to heathenism. "If a man see thee which hath knowledge," hath superior understanding to his, and hereupon conceiteth thou hast a liberty to sit at meat, or feast in an idol's temple, because an idol, thou sayest, is nothing,—shall not one who is less thoroughly informed in this matter, and thinks an idol something, be emboldened to eat what was offered to the idol, not as common food, but sacrifice, and thereby be guilty of idolatry? Such an occasion of falling they should be careful of laying before their weak brethren, whatever liberty or power themselves had.

The apostle backs this caution with two considerations: 1. The danger that might accrue to weak brethren, even those weak brethren for whom Christ died. We must deny ourselves even in what is lawful rather than occasion their stumbling and endanger their souls; ver. 11. "Through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish for whom Christ died?" Note, Those whom Christ hath redeemed with his most precious blood should be very precious and dear to us. If he had such compassion as to die for them that they might not perish, we should have as much compassion for them as to deny ourselves for their sakes in many instances, and not use our liberty to their hurt, to occasion their stumbling, or hazard their ruin, [or, more properly speaking, great injury to their spiritual interests, since they cannot perish if Christ died for them.] It is very little that man hath of the spirit of the Redeemer that had rather his brother did perish than himself be abridged in any respect of his liberty. He that hath the spirit of Christ in him will love those whom Christ loved so as to die for them, and will study to promote their spiritual and eternal welfare, and shun every thing that shall unnecessarily grieve them, and much more every thing that is likely to occasion their stumbling, or falling into sin. 2. The hurt done to them Christ takes as done to himself. "When ye sin against Christ," ver. 12. Note, Injuries done to Christians are injuries to Christ; especially to babes in Christ, to weak Christians; and most of all the involving them in guilt; wounding their consciences is wounding him. He hath a particular care of the lambs of the flock. "He gathers them with his arm, and carries them in his bosom," Isa. xl. 11. Strong Christians should be very careful to avoid what will offend weak ones, or lay a stumblingblock in their way. Shall we be void of compassion for them to whom Christ has shewn so much? Shall we sin against Christ, who suffered for us? Shall we set ourselves to defeat his gracious designs, and help to ruin those whom he died to save?

Fourthly. He enforces all with his own example; ver. 13. "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh whilst the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." He doth not say he will never eat more. "This were to destroy himself, and to commit a heinous sin to prevent the sin and fall of a brother. Such evil must not be done that good may come of it. But, though it was necessary to eat, it was not necessary to eat flesh. And therefore, rather than occasion sin in a brother, he would abstain from it as long as he lived. He had such a value for the soul of his brother that he would willingly deny himself in a matter of liberty, and forbear any particular food which he might have lawfully eaten, and might like to eat, rather than lay a stumblingblock in a weak brother's way, and occasion him to sin by following his example, without being clear in his mind whether it were lawful or no. Note, We should be very tender of doing any thing that may be an occasion of stumbling to others, though it may be innocent in itself. Liberty is valuable, but the weakness of a brother should induce, and sometimes binds, us to waive it. We must not rigorously claim or use our own rights to the hurt and ruin of a brother's soul, and go to the injury of our Redeemer, who died for him. When it is certainly foreseen that by doing what I may forbear will occasion a fellow-Christian to do what he ought to forbear, I shall offend, scandalize, or lay a stumblingblock in his way; which to do is a sin, however lawful the thing itself be which is done. And, if we must be so careful not to occasion other men's sin, how careful should we be to avoid sin in ourselves? If we must not endanger other men's souls, how much should we be concerned not to destroy our own? [The whole passage, however, has reference to meats offered to idols, and its application is not to be stretched indefinitely.]

their being is pervaded by the Spirit of God, and the wisdom of God is shed abroad in their hearts."

viii. 4. Resumption of verse 1. "We know that there is no idol in the world;" i.e., the persons represented have no existence.

viii. 5. "All that he asserts is that the vast hierarchy of divinities which met their eyes and ears in the common parlance and customs of Greece and Asia, imposing as it might be, had for Christians no practical importance. They had but one supreme source and centre

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter the apostle seems to answer some cavils against himself. I. He asserts his apostolical mission and authority, and gives in his success amongst them as a testimony to it, ver. 1, 2. II. He claims a right to subsist by his ministry, and defends it by several arguments from natural reason and the Mosaic law, and asserts it also to be a constitution of Christ, ver. 3–14. III. He shews that he had willingly waived this privilege and power for their benefit, ver. 15–18. IV. He instances in several other things in which he had denied himself for the sake of other men's spiritual interest and salvation, ver. 19–23. And, V. Concludes this argument, by shewing what animated him to this course, even the prospect of an incorruptible crown, ver. 24–27.

M I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? are not ye my work in the Lord? 2 If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord.

Blessed Paul, in the work of his ministry, not only met with opposition from those without, but discouragements from those within. He was under reproach; false brethren questioned his apostleship, and were very industrious to lessen his character and sink his reputation; particularly here at Corinth,—a place to which he had been instrumental in doing much good, and from which he had deserved well; and yet there were those among them who upon these heads created him great uneasiness. Note, It is no strange or new thing for a minister to meet with very unkind returns for great good-will to a people, and diligent and successful services among them. Some among the Corinthians questioned, if they did not disown, his apostolical character. To their cavils he here answers, and in such a manner as to set forth himself as a remarkable example of that self-denial for the good of others which he had been recommending in the former chapter. And,

First. He asserts his apostolical mission and character. "Am I not an apostle? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" To be a witness of his resurrection was one great branch of the apostolical charge. Now, saith Paul, have not I seen the Lord, though not immediately after his resurrection, yet since his ascent: see ch. iv. 8. "Am I not free?" Have I not the same commission, and charge, and powers, with the other apostles? What respect, or honour, or substance can they challenge, which I am not at liberty to demand as well as they? It was not because he had no right to live of the Gospel that he maintained himself with his own hands, but for other reasons.

Secondly. He offers the success of his ministry among them, and the good he had done to them, as a proof of his apostleship. "Are not ye my work in the Lord?" Through the blessing of Christ on my labours have I not raised a church amongst you? "The seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord." Your conversion by my means is a confirmation from God of my mission. Note, The ministers of Christ should not think it strange to be put upon the proof of their ministry by some who have had experimental evidence of the power of it and the presence of God with it.

Thirdly. He justly upbraids the Corinthians with their disrespect; "Doubtless, if I am not an apostle to others, I am so to you," ver. 2. I have laboured so long, and with so much success among you, that you, above all others, should own and honour my character, and not call it in question. Note, It is no new thing for faithful ministers to meet with the worst treatment where they might expect the best. This church at Corinth had as much reason to believe, and as little reason to question, his apostolical mission, as any. They had as much reason, perhaps more, than any church, to pay him respect. He had been instrumental to bring them to the knowledge and faith of Christ. He laboured long amongst them, near two years, and he laboured to good purpose, God having much people among them: see Acts xviii. 10, 11. It was an aggravated ingratitude for this people to call in question his authority.

3 Mine answer to them that do examine me is this, 4 Have we not power to eat and to drink? 5 Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? 6 Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working? 7 Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? 8 Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also? 9 For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? 10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope. 11 If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great of the universe, on whom they had been taught to look, not as on a mere name, but as a loving Father, and with him one supreme controller of the universe; no dim hero of distant ages, or remote influence of planetary regions, but Jesus Christ, living in their own times, almost within their own knowledge. The heathen dwelt in a world of complicated shadows; Christians dwelt in a world of simple realities" (Stanley).

viii. 7. Meats offered to idols were in themselves indifferent, and thing if we shall reap your carnal things? 12 If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ. 13 Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar? 14 Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

Having asserted his apostolical authority, he proceeds to claim the rights belonging to his office, especially that of being maintained by it. These he,

First, States; ver. 3-6, "Mine answer to them that do examine me," that is, inquire into my authority, or the reasons of my conduct, if I am an apostle, is this: "Have we not power to eat and drink," ver. 4, or a right to a maintenance? "Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?" And not only to be maintained ourselves, but have them maintained also. Though Paul was at that time single, he had a right to take a wife when he pleased, and to lead her about with him, and expect a maintenance for her, as well as himself, from the churches. Perhaps Barnabas had a wife, as the other apostles certainly had, and led them about with them. For that a wife is here to be understood by the sister woman, ἀδελφή γυναῖκα, is plain from hence, that it would have been utterly unfit for the apostles to have carried about women with them unless they were wives. The word implies that they had power over them, and could require their attendance on them; which none could have over any but wives or servants. Now, the apostles, who worked for their bread, do not seem to have been in a capacity to buy or hire servants, to carry with them. Not to observe that it would have raised suspicions to have carried about even women servants, and much more other women to whom they were not married, for which the apostles would never give any occasion. The apostle therefore plainly asserts he had a right to marry as well as other apostles, and claim a maintenance for his wife, nay, and his children too, if he had any, from the churches, without labouring with his own hands to procure it. "Or I only, and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working?" ver. 6. In short, the apostle here claims a maintenance from the churches, both for him and his. This was due from them, and what he might claim.

Secondly, He proceeds by several arguments to prove his claim. 1. From the common practice and expectations of mankind. Those who addict and give themselves up to any way of business in the world expect to live out of it. Soldiers expect to be paid for their service. Husbandmen and shepherds expect to get a livelihood out of their labours. If they plant vineyards, and dress and cultivate them, it is with expectation of fruit. If they feed a flock, it is with the expectation of being fed and clothed by it; ver. 9, "Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charge? Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not the fruit thereof? Who feedeth a flock, and eateth not the milk thereof?" Note, It is very natural and very reasonable for ministers to expect a livelihood out of their labours. 2. He argues it out of the Jewish law. "Say I these things as a man, or saith not the law the same also?" ver. 8. Is this merely a dictate of common reason, and according to common usage only? No, it is also consonant to the old law. God had therein ordered "that the ox should not be muzzled whilst he was treading out the corn," or hindered from eating whilst he was preparing the corn for man's use, and treading it out of the ear. But this law was not chiefly given out of God's regard to oxen, or concern for them, but to teach mankind that all due encouragement should be given to them who are employed by us, or labouring for our good; that the labourers should taste of the fruit of their labours. "They that plough should plough in hope, and they who thresh in hope should be partakers of their hope," ver. 10. The law saith this about oxen for our sakes. Note, They that lay themselves out to do our souls good should not have their mouths muzzled, but have food provided for them. 3. He argues from common equity. "If we have sown to you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" What they had sown was much better than they expected to reap. They had taught them the way to eternal life, and laboured heartily to put them in possession of it. It was no great matter sure, whilst they were giving themselves up to this work, to expect a support of their own temporal life. They had been instruments of conveying to them the greatest spiritual blessings, and had they no claim to as great a share in their carnal things, as was necessary to subsist them? Note, Those who enjoy spiritual benefits by the ministry of the word should not grudge a maintenance to such as are employed in this work. If they have received real benefit, one would think they could not grudge them this. What, get so much good by them, and yet grudge to do so little good to them! Is this grateful or equitable? 4. He argues from the maintenance they afforded others. "If others are partakers of this power over you, are not we rather?" You allow others this maintenance, and confess their claim just, but who hath so just a claim as I from the church of Corinth? Who has given greater evidences of the apostolical mission, who has laboured so much for your good, or done like service amongst you? Note, Ministers should be valued and provided for according to their worth. Nevertheless, saith the apostle, "We have not used this power, but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the Gospel of Christ." We have not insisted on our right, but have rather been in straits, to serve the interests of the Gospel, and promote the salvation of souls. He renounced his right rather than, by claiming it, he would hinder his success. He denied himself for fear of giving offence, yet claims his right, lest his self-denial should prove prejudicial to the ministry. Note, He is likely to plead most effectually for the rights of others who shews a generous disregard to his own. It is plain in this case that justice, and not self-love, is the principle by which he is actuated. 5. He argues from the old Jewish establishment. "Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the temple, and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar?" ver. 13. And if the Jewish priesthood [of all ranks] were maintained out of the holy things that were then offered, shall not Christ's ministers have a maintenance out of their ministry? Is there not as much reason we should be maintained as they? 6. He asserts it to be the institution of Christ. "Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel," ver. 14; should have a right to a maintenance, though not bound to demand it, and insist upon it. It is the people's duty to maintain their minister by Christ's appointment, though it be not a duty bound on every minister to call for or accept it. He may waive his right, as Paul did, without being a sinner; but they transgress an appointment of Christ who deny or withhold it. They who preach the Gospel have a right to live by it, and they who attend on their ministry, and yet take no thought about their subsistence, fail very much in their duty to Christ, and the respect [nay, common justice,] owing to them.

["Hath the Lord ordained."] Hath the Lord appointed, commanded, arranged that it should be so, (ἀπέταξε.) The word here means, that he has made this a law, or has required it. The word "Lord" here doubtless refers to the Lord Jesus, who has sent forth his ministers to labour in the great harvest of the world. Here we may observe, 1. That the command is, that they shall live (ζῶν) of the Gospel. It is not that they should grow rich, or lay up treasures, or speculate in it; but it is, that they should have such a maintenance as to constitute a livelihood. They should be made comfortable, not rich. They should receive so much as to keep their minds from being harassed with cares, and their families from want; not so much as to lead them to forget their dependence on God, or on the people. 2. This is a command of the Lord Jesus; and, if it is a command, it should be obeyed as much as any other law of the Redeemer. And if this is a command, then the minister is entitled to a support; and then also a people are not at liberty to withhold it. Farther, there are as strong reasons why they should support him as there are why they should pay a schoolmaster, a lawyer, a physician, or a day-labourer. The minister usually toils as hard as others; expends as much in preparing for his work; and does as much good. And there is even a higher claim in this case. God has given an express command in this case; he has not in the others. 3. The salary of a minister should not be regarded as a gift merely. He has a claim to it; and God has commanded that it should be paid. It is, moreover, a matter of stipulation and of compact, by which a people agree to compensate him for his services. And yet is there any thing in the shape of debt where there is so much looseness as in regard to this subject? Are men usually as conscientious in this as they are in paying a physician or a merchant? Are not ministers often in distress for that which has been promised them, and which they have a right to expect? And is not their usefulness, and the happiness of the people, and the honour of religion, intimately connected with obeying the rule of the Lord Jesus in this respect?—A. B.]

15 But I have used none of these things: neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void. 16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel! 17 For if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me. 18 What is my reward then? Verily that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel.

Here he tells them he had, notwithstanding, waived his privilege, and lays down his reason for doing it.

First, He tells them he had neglected to claim his right in times passed; "I have used none of these things," ver. 15. Neither ate nor drank himself at their cost, nor led about a wife to be maintained by them, nor forbore working to maintain himself. From others he received a maintenance, but not from them, for some special reasons. Nor did he write this to make his claim now. Though he here asserts his right, yet he does not claim his due, but denies himself for their sakes, and the Gospel.

Secondly, We have the reason assigned of his exercising this self-denial. He would not have his glorying made void. It were better for him to die, than that any man should make his glorying void, ver. 15. This glorying did imply nothing in it of boasting or self-conceit, or catching at applause, but a high degree of satisfaction and comfort. It was a singular pleasure to him to preach the Gospel without making it burdensome; and he was resolved that among them he would not lose this satisfaction. His advantages for promoting the Gospel were his glory, and he valued them above his rights, or his very life. Better were it for him to die, than to have his glorying made void; than to have therefore might be eaten, but there was a limit imposed by charity towards a weaker brother who would eat with "conscious awe of the idol."

viii. 10. "Emboldened:" literally, "built up"—built up not in good, but to the emboldening him to violate his conscience.

ix. 1. St. Paul's not receiving maintenance from the church was misinterpreted by those who sought to disparage his claims as an apostle. They regarded it not as an act of generous self-sacrifice, but a confession that he had not the right to claim such support. In order to show the reality of the sacrifice, it was necessary to assert the rights which were not being acted on by him. He gives two marks of his apostleship: first, the sight of the Lord; second, the practical effect of his teaching. "Free:" i.e., to forbear working with his hands, and claim support from the church to whom he ministered. (Compare verse 6.)

ix. 3. "This:" referring to what he has just said; not, as in the st justly said he preferred his wages to his work. No, he was ready to deny himself for the sake of the Gospel. Note, It is the glory of a minister to prefer the success of his ministry to his interests, and deny himself that he may serve Christ, and save souls. Not that in so doing he does more than he ought, he is still acting within the bounds of the law of charity; but he acts upon truly noble principles, he brings much honour to God in so doing, and those that honour him he will honour. It is what God will approve and commend, what a man may value himself for, and take comfort in, though he cannot make a merit of it before God.

Thirdly. He shews that this self-denial was more honourable in itself, and yielded him much more content and comfort, than his preaching did. "Though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing whereof to glory," (ver. 16), "for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel." It is my charge, my business. It is the work for which I am constituted an apostle, ch. i. 17. This is a duty expressly bound upon me; it is not in any degree a matter of liberty. "Necessity is upon me." I am false and unfaithful to my trust, I break a plain and express command, and "woe be to me, if I preach not the Gospel." Those that are set apart to the office of the ministry have it in charge to preach the Gospel. Woe be to them if they do not. From this none is excused. But it is not given in charge to all or any preacher of the Gospel to do his work gratis, to preach and have no maintenance out of it. It is not said, woe be to him if he doth not preach the Gospel, and yet maintain himself. In this point he is more at liberty. It may be his duty to preach at some seasons, and under some circumstances, without receiving a maintenance for it; but he has in the general a right to it, and may expect it from those among whom he labours. And when he renounces this right for the sake of the Gospel, and the souls of men, though he does not supererogate, he yet denies himself, waives his privilege and right; he does more than his charge and office in general, and at all times, obliges him to. Woe be to him if he does not preach the Gospel, but it may sometimes be his duty to insist on his maintenance for so doing; and whenever he forbears to claim it he parts with his right, though a man may be bound to do so at sometimes, by the general duties of love to God, and charity to men. Note, It is a high attainment in religion to renounce our own rights for the good of others, and will entitle to [receive] a peculiar reward from God for.

Fourthly. The apostle here informs us that doing our duty with a willing mind will meet with a gracious recompence from God. "If I do this thing," that is, either preach the Gospel or take no maintenance, "willingly, I have a reward." Indeed, it is willing service only that is capable of reward from God. It is not the bare doing any duty, but the doing it heartily, that is, willingly and cheerfully, that God has promised to reward. Leave the heart out of our duties, and God abhors them. They are but the carcases, without the life and spirit of religion. They must preach willingly who would be accepted of God in this duty; they must make their business a pleasure, and not esteem it a drudgery. And they that, out of regard to the honour of God, or good of souls, give up their claim to a maintenance, should do this duty willingly, if they would be accepted in it, or rewarded for it. But whether the duty of the office be done willingly or with reluctance, whether the heart be in it or averse from it, all in office have a trust and charge from God, for which they must be accountable. Ministers have a dispensation of the Gospel, or 'stewardship,' οικονομία, Lut. xvi. 7, committed to them. Note, Christ's willing servants shall not fail of a recompence, and that proportioned to their fidelity, zeal, and diligence; and his slothful and unwilling servants shall all be called to an account. Taking his name, and professing to do his business, will make men accountable at his bar; and how sad an account have slothful servants to give!

Fifthly. The apostle sums up the argument, by laying before them the encouraging hope he had of a large recompence for his remarkable self-denial. "What is my reward, then?" ver. 18. What is it I expect a recompence from God for? "That when I preach the Gospel, I may make it without charge, that I abuse not my power in the Gospel." Or, not so to claim my rights as to make them destroy the great intentions and ends of my office, but renounce them for the sake of those. It is an abuse of power to employ it against the very ends for which it is given; and the apostle would never use his power or privilege of being maintained by his ministry so as to frustrate the ends of it, but would willingly and cheerfully deny himself, for the honour of Christ, and the interest of souls. And that minister who follows his example may have cheerful expectations of a full recompence.

19 For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. 20 And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; 21 To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law. 22 To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. 23 And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

The apostle takes occasion, from what he had before discoursed, to mention some other instances of his self-denial, and parting with his liberty, for the benefit of others.

First. He asserts his liberty; ver. 19, "Though I be free from all men." He was freeborn, a citizen of Rome. He was in bondage to none, nor depended upon any for his subsistence; yet he made himself a servant to all, that he might gain the more. He carried it as a servant; he laboured for their good as a servant; he was careful to please as a servant his master. He acted in many cases as if he had no privileges; and this "that he might gain the more," or make the more converts to Christianity. He made himself a servant, that they might be made free.

Secondly. He instances in some particulars wherein he made himself a servant to all. He accommodated himself to all sorts of people. 1. "To the Jews," and those "under the law," he became "a Jew," and as "under the law," to gain them. Though he looked on the ceremonial law as a yoke taken off by Christ, yet in many instances he submitted to it, that he might work upon the Jews, remove their prejudices, prevail with them to hear the Gospel, and win them over to Christ. 2. "To those that are without law, as without law;" that is, to the Gentiles, whether converted to the Christian faith or not. In innocent things he could comply with people's usages or humours for their advantage. He would reason with the philosophers in their own way. And as to converted Gentiles, he carried it amongst them as one that was not under the bondage of the Jewish law, as he had asserted and maintained concerning them; though he did not act as a lawless person, but as one who was bound by the laws of Christ. He would transgress no laws of Christ to please or humour any man, but he would accommodate himself to all men where he might do it lawfully, to gain some. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and so, one would have thought, might have excused himself from complying with the Jews; and yet to do them good, and win them over to Christ, he did, in innocent things, neglect the power he had to do otherwise, and conformed to some of their usages and laws. And though he might, by virtue of that character, have challenged authority over the Gentiles, yet he accommodated himself as much as he innocently might to their prejudices and ways of thinking. Doing good was the study and business of his life; and so he might reach this end, he did not stand on privileges and punctilios. 3. "To the weak he became as weak, that he might gain the weak," ver. 22. He was willing to make the best of them. He did not despise nor judge them, but became as one of them, forbore to use his liberty for their sake, and was careful to lay no stumblingblock in their way. Where any through the weakness of their understanding, or the strength of their prejudices, were likely to fall into sin, or fall off from the Gospel into heathen idolatry, through his use of his liberty, he refrained himself. He denied himself for their sakes, that he might insinuate into their affections, and gain their souls. In short, "he became all things to all men, that he might by all means," that is, all lawful means, "gain some." [And yet who ever pressed every doctrine of the Gospel with more determined urgency?] He would not sin against God, to save the soul of his neighbour, but he would very cheerfully and readily deny himself. The rights of God [and of the Redeemer's crown] he could not give up, but he might resign his own, and he very often did it for the good of others.

Thirdly. He assigns his reason for acting in this manner; ver. 23, "This I do for the Gospel sake, and that I might be partaker thereof with you;" that is, for the honour of Christ, whose the Gospel is, and for the salvation of souls, for which it was designed; and that he and they might communicate in the privileges of it, or partake together of them. For these ends did he thus condescend, deny himself as to his liberty, and accommodate himself to the capacities and usages of those with whom he had to do, where he lawfully might. Note. A heart warmed with zeal for God, and breathing after the salvation of men, will not plead and insist upon rights and privileges in bar to this design. They manifestly abuse their power in the Gospel who employ it not to edification, but destruction, and therefore breathe nothing of its spirit.

24 Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. 25 And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. 26 I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: 27 But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.

In these verses the apostle hints at the great encouragement he had to act in this manner. He had a glorious prize, an incorruptible crown, in view. And upon this head he compares himself to the racers and combatants in the Isthmian games, an allusion well known to the Corinthians, because they were celebrated in their neighbourhood. "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one obtaineth the prize?" ver. 24. All run at your games, but one gets the race only, and wins the crown. And here he, first. Excites them to their duty. "So run that ye may obtain." It is quite ix. 5. "A wife:" to be likewise supported by the church. Stanley suggests that the fact of these women accompanying their husbands may be accounted for by the necessity of females to gain access to and to baptise female converts in Greece and other Oriental countries.

ix. 16. The preaching of the Gospel was entrusted to him; the only matter for boasting that he had was that he did it without charge.

ix. 17. "For if I do this voluntarily (i.e., of my own accord), I have a reward (a reward might be due to me from God), but if involuntarily (as an obligation laid upon me by another), with a stewardship have I been entrusted. I am like a steward simply doing his duty."

ix. 18. "Abuse not:" rather, "not to use." Some commentators otherwise in the Christian race than in your races. Only one wins the prize in them; you may all run, so as to obtain. You have great encouragement therefore to persist constantly and diligently, and vigorously in your course. There is room for all to get the prize. You cannot fail if you run well, ["run with patience the race that is set before you, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith."] Yet there should be a noble emulation. You should endeavour to outdo one another. And it is a glorious contest who shall get first to heaven, or have the best rewards in that blessed world. I make it my endeavour thus to run, so do you. No man ever more heartily pursued the prize in your Isthmian races than I do after the recompence of the reward. So do you, as you see me go before you. Note, It is the duty of Christians to follow their ministers closely in the chase of eternal glory, and the honour and duty of ministers to lead them the way.

Secondly, He directs them in their course by setting more fully to view his own example, still carrying on the allusion. 1. They that run in their games were kept to a set diet. "Every man that strives for the mastery is temperate in all things," ver. 25. The cuffers and wrestlers in your exercises are kept to strict diet and discipline; nay, they keep themselves to it. They do not indulge themselves, but restrain themselves from the food they eat, and so from the liberties they use on other occasions. And should not Christians much more abridge themselves of their liberty for so glorious an end, as winning the race, and obtaining the prize set before them? They used a very spare diet and coarse food, and denied themselves much to prepare for their race and combat; so do I. So should you, after my example. It is hard if for the heavenly crown you cannot abstain from heathen sacrifices. 2. They were not only temperate, but inured themselves to hardships. They who cuffed with one another in these exercises prepared themselves by beating the air, as the apostle calls it, or by throwing out their arms, and thereby inuring themselves beforehand to deal about their blows in close combat, or brandish them by way of flourish. There is no room for any such exercise in the Christian warfare. Christians are ever in close combat. Their enemies make fierce and hearty opposition, and are ever at hand, and for this reason they must lay about them in earnest, and never drop the contest, or flag and faint in it. They must fight, not as those that beat the air, but must strive against their enemies with all their might. One enemy the apostle here mentions, namely, the body; this must be kept under, beaten black and blue, as the combatants were in these Grecian games, and thereby brought into subjection. By the body is to be understood fleshly appetites and inclinations. These the apostle set himself to curb and conquer, and in this the Corinthians were bound to imitate him. Note, They who would aright pursue the interests of their souls must beat down their bodies, and keep them under. They must combat hard with fleshly lusts till they have subdued them; and not indulge a wanton appetite, and long for heathenish sacrifices, or eat them to please their flesh, at the hazard of their brethren's souls. The body must be made to serve the mind, not suffered to lord over it, [and they have the promise of grace to aid them in the struggle.]

Thirdly, The apostle presses this advice on the Corinthians, by proper arguments drawn from the same contenders. 1. They take pains, and undergo all those hardships, "to obtain a corruptible crown," ver. 25, "but we an incorruptible." They who conquered in these games were only crowned with the withering leaves or boughs of trees, of olive, bays, or laurel. But Christians have an inheritance incorruptible, reserved in heaven for them; and would they yet suffer themselves to be outdone by these racers or wrestlers? Can they use abstinence in diet, exert themselves in racing, expose their bodies to so much hardship in a combat, who have no more in view but the trifling huzzas of a giddy multitude, or a crown of leaves? and shall not Christians, who hope for the approbation of the sovereign Judge, and a crown of glory from his hands, stretch forward in the heavenly race, and exert themselves in beating down their fleshly inclinations, and the strongholds of sin? 2. The racers in these games run at uncertainty. All run, "but one receives the prize," ver. 24; every racer therefore is at great uncertainty whether he shall win it or no. But the Christian racer is at no such uncertainty. Every one may run here so as to obtain, but then he must run within the lines; he must keep to the path of duty prescribed, which some think is the meaning of running not as uncertainly, ver. 26. He who keeps within the limits prescribed, and keeps on in his race, will never miss his crown, though others may get theirs before him. And would the Grecian racers keep within their bounds, and exert themselves to the very last, when one only could win, and all must be uncertain which that one would be? and shall not [real] Christians be much more exact and vigorous when all are sure of a crown when they come to the end of their race? 3. He sets before himself and them the danger of yielding to fleshly inclinations, and pampering the body, and its lusts and appetites. "I keep my body under, lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway," ver. 27; 'rejected, disapproved,' ἀδόκιμος, one to whom the βοαστήρ, 'the judge or umpire of the race, will not decree the crown. The allusion to the games runs through the whole sentence. [The metaphor is most probably changed here. This allusion seems to be to metals which, if they cannot stand the test, are rejected. The chief object of the apostle seems to be to impress ministers of the Gospel with the duty of seeking continually growing evidence of their own personal godliness, as well as of the outward success of their preaching.] Note, A preacher of salvation may yet miss it. He may shew others the way to heaven, and never get thither himself. To prevent this, Paul took so much pains in subduing and keeping under bodily inclinations, lest by any means he himself, who had preached to others, should yet miss the crown, be disapproved and rejected by his sovereign Judge. A holy fear of himself was necessary to preserve the fidelity of an apostle; and how much more necessary is it to our preservation! Note, Holy fear of ourselves, and not presumptuous confidence, is the best security against apostasy from God, and final rejection by him.

CHAPTER X.

In this chapter the apostle prosecutes the argument at the close of the last, and, I. Warns the Corinthians against security, by the example of the Jews; who, notwithstanding their profession and privileges, were terribly punished of God for their many sins, their history being left upon record for the admonition of Christians, ver. 1-14. II. He resumes his former argument, ch. viii., about eating things offered to idols; and shews that it is utterly inconsistent with true Christianity, and downright gross idolatry, to eat them as things offered to idols. It is having fellowship with devils, which cannot consist with having fellowship with God, ver. 15-22. III. He lets them yet know that, though they must not eat of things sacrificed to idols as such, and out of any regard to the idol, yet they might buy such flesh in the markets, or eat it at the table of heathen acquaintance, without asking any questions; for that the heathens' abuse of them did not render the creatures of God unfit to be the food of his servants. Yet liberty of this kind must be used with a due regard to weak consciences, and no offence given by it to Jew or Gentile, or the church of God, ver. 23-32.

Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; 2 And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; 3 And did all eat the same spiritual meat; 4 And did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ. 5 But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness.

In order to dissuade the Corinthians from communion with idolaters, and security in any sinful course, he sets before them the example of the Jews, the church under the Old Testament. They enjoyed great privileges, but having been guilty of heinous provocations they fell under very grievous punishments. In these verses he reckons up their privileges, which in the main were the same with ours.

First, He prefaces this discourse with a note of regard, "Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant;" I would not have you without the knowledge of this matter; it is a thing worthy both your knowledge and attention. It is a history very instructive and monitory. Judaism was Christianity under a veil, wrapt up in types and dark hints. The Gospel was preached to them in their legal rites and sacrifices; and the providence of God towards them, and what happened to them notwithstanding these privileges, may and ought to be warnings to us.

Secondly, He specifies some of their privileges. He begins, 1. With their deliverance from Egypt. "Our fathers," that is, the ancestors of us Jews, "were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea." They were all under the Divine covering and conduct. The cloud served for both purposes. It sometimes contracted itself into a cloudy pillar, shining on one side to shew them their way, dark on the other to hide them from their pursuing enemies; and sometimes spread itself over them as a mighty sheet, to defend them from the burning sun in the sandy desert, Ps. cv. 39. They were miraculously conducted through the Red sea, where the pursuing Egyptians were drowned. It was a lane to them, but a grave to these; a proper type of our redemption by Christ, who saves us by conquering and destroying his enemies and ours. They were very dear to God, and much in his favour, when he would work such miracles for their deliverance, and take them so immediately under his guidance and protection. 2. They had sacraments like ours. 1st. "They were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea," ver. 2, or into Moses; that is, brought under obligation to Moses' law and covenant, as we are by baptism under [those of] the Christian law and covenant. [The apostle's allusion is to baptism chiefly as a dedicating ordinance, wherein its recipients are solemnly enlisted under the banner of Christ.] It was to them a typical baptism. 2nd. "They did all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual drink," namely, that we do. The manna on which they fed was a type of Christ crucified, the bread which came down from heaven, which whoso eateth shall live for ever. Their drink was a stream fetched from a rock which followed them in all their journeyings in the wilderness, and this rock was Christ; namely, in type and figure. He is the rock on which the Christian church is built; and of the streams that issue from him do all believers drink, and are refreshed. Now all the Jews did eat of this meat, and drink of this rock, called here a spiritual rock, because it typified spiritual things. These were great privileges. One would think this should have saved them; that all who eat of that spiritual meat, and drank of that spiritual drink, should have been holy and acceptable to God. Yet was it otherwise. "With many of them God was not well pleased, for they were overthrown include the whole of this verse in the question, and find the answer in verse 19; the reward spoken of being that he "might gain the greater number."

x. 1. "Moreover," rather, "for," connecting this chapter with the last. There Paul had spoken of the need of self-denial, lest, notwithstanding all his privileges, a man should at the last be rejected. He takes in this chapter Israel as an illustration; for they, with all their privileges, were most of them castaways.

x. 2. "Baptised unto Moses:" literally, "baptised themselves," denoting the relation or fellowship into which they entered with Moses, the mediator of their covenant and representative of the law.

x. 3. "Spiritual meat:" the manna, so called in reference to its descent from heaven. (Compare Psa. lxxviii. 24, 25.)

x. 4. "The apostle has adopted the tradition current among the Jews, that the rock followed the Israelites in their journeyings. 'They drank from a miraculous rock which followed them.' But in the wilderness," ver. 5. Note, Men may enjoy many and great spiritual privileges in this world, and yet come short of eternal life. Many of those who were baptised into Moses in the cloud and sea, that is, had their faith of his Divine commission confirmed by these miracles, yet were overthrown in the wilderness, and never saw the promised land. Let none presume upon their great privileges, or profession of the truth; these will not secure heavenly happiness, nor prevent Divine judgments here on earth, except the root of the matter be in us.

6 Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted. 7 Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. 8 Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand. 9 Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents. 10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer. 11 Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. 12 Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. 13 There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it. 14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry.

The apostle, having recited their privileges, proceeds here to an account of their faults and punishments, their sins and plagues, which are left upon record for an example to us; a warning against the like sins, if we would escape the like punishments. We must not do as they did, lest we suffer as they suffered. Several of their sins are instanced in, as cautions to us; as,

First. We should shun inordinate desires after carnal objects; must "not lust after evil things as they lusted," ver. 6. God fed them with manna, but they must have flesh, Num. xi. 4. They had food for their supply, but, not content with that, they asked meat for their lusts, Ps. cvi. 14. Carnal desires get head by indulgence, and therefore should be observed and checked in their first rise. If once they prevail, and bear sway in us, we know not whither they will carry us. This caution stands first, because carnal appetites indulged are the root and source of much sin.

Secondly. He warns against idolatry. "Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is written, the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play." The sin of the golden calf is referred to, Ex. xxxii. 6. They first sacrificed to the idol, then feasted on the sacrifices, and then danced before it. Though only eating and drinking are mentioned here, yet the sacrifice is supposed. The apostle is speaking to the case of the Corinthians, who were tempted to feast on heathen sacrifices, things offered to idols, though they do not seem to have been under any temptation to sacrifice themselves. Even eating and drinking of the sacrifices before the idol, and as things sacrificed, was idolatry, which, by the example of the Israelites, they should be warned to avoid.

Thirdly. He cautions against fornication, a sin to which the inhabitants of Corinth were in a peculiar manner addicted. They had a temple among them dedicated to Venus, that is, to lust, with above a thousand priestesses belonging to it, all common prostitutes. How needful was a caution against fornication to those who lived in so corrupt a city, and had been used to such a dissolution of manners? especially when they were under temptations to idolatry too, and spiritual whoredom did in many cases lead to bodily prostitution. Most of the gods the heathens served were represented as very patterns of lewdness, and much lewdness was committed in the very worship of many of them. Many of the Jewish writers, and many Christians after them, think such worship was paid to Baal-peor; and that fornication was committed with the daughters of Moab, in the worship of that idol. They were enticed by these women both to spiritual and corporal whoredom, first to feast on the sacrifice, if not to do more beastly facts in honour of the idol, and then to defile themselves with strange flesh, Num. xxv. which brought on a plague that in one day slew twenty-three thousand, besides those which fell by the hand of public justice. Note, Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, in whatever external relation they may stand to him, and whatever outward privileges he may bestow upon them. Let us fear the sins of Israel if we would shun their plagues.

Fourthly. He warns us against tempting "Christ, as some of them tempted, and were destroyed of serpents," ver. 9, or provoking him to jealousy, ver. 22. He was with the church in the wilderness. He was the angel of the covenant that went before them. But he was greatly grieved and provoked by them many ways. "They spoke against him and Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us out of Egypt to die in the wilderness?" for which reason God sent fiery serpents among them, Num. xxi. 5, 6, by which many of them were stung mortally; and it is but just to fear that such as tempt Christ under the present dispensation should be left by him in the power of the old serpent.

Fifthly. He warns against murmuring. "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer," ver. 10; by a destroying angel, an executioner of Divine vengeance. They quarrelled with God, and murmured against Moses his minister, when any difficulties pressed them. When they met with discouragements in the way to Canaan they were very apt to fly in the face of their leaders, were for displacing them, and going back to Egypt under the conduct of others of their own choosing. Somewhat like this seems to have been the case of the Corinthians. They murmured against Paul, and in him against Christ, and seem to have set up other teachers that would indulge and soothe them in their inclinations, and in a revolt to idolatry. Rather let them feast on idol sacrifices than bear the reproach, or expose themselves to the ill-will, of heathen neighbours. Such conduct was very provoking to God, and was likely to bring upon them swift destruction, as it did on the Israelites, Num. xiv. 37. Note, Murmuring against Divine disposals and commands is a sin that greatly provokes, especially when it grows to such a head as to issue in apostasy, and a revolt from him and his good ways.

The apostle to these particular cautions, 1. Subjoins a more general one, ver. 11, "All these things happened to them for ensamples, and were written for our admonition." Not only the laws and ordinances of the Jews, but the providences of God towards them, were typical. Their sins against God, and backslidings from him, were typical of the infidelity of many under the Gospel. God's judgments on them were types of spiritual judgments now. Their exclusion from the earthly Canaan typified the exclusion of many under the Gospel out of the heavenly Canaan for their unbelief. Their history was written to be a standing monitor to the church, even under the last and most perfect dispensation. "To us on whom the end of the world is come;" the concluding period of God's gracious government over men. Note, Nothing in Scripture is written in vain. God had wise and gracious purposes towards us in leaving the Jewish history upon record, and it is our wisdom and duty to receive instruction from it. Upon this hint the apostle grounds a caution; ver. 12, "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." Note, Others' harms should be cautions to us. He that thinks he stands should not be confident and secure, but upon his guard. Others have fallen, and so may we. And then we are most likely to fall when we are most confident of our own strength, and thereupon most apt to be secure, and off our guard. Distrust of himself, putting him at once upon vigilance and dependence on God, is the Christian's best security against all sin. Note, He who thinks he stands is not like to keep his footing if he fears no fall, nor guards against it. God hath not promised to keep us from falling if we do not look to ourselves. His protection supposes our own care and caution.

But to this word of caution he, 2. Adds a word of comfort, ver. 13. Though it is displeasing to God for us to presume, it is not pleasing to him for us to despair; if the former be a great sin, the latter is far from being innocent. Though we must fear, and take heed lest we fall, yet should we not be terrified and amazed; for either our trials will be proportioned to our strength or strength shall be supplied in proportion to our temptations. We live indeed in a tempting world, where we are compassed about with snares. Every place, condition, relation, employment, and enjoyment abounds with them; yet what comfort may we fetch from such a passage? For, 1st. "No temptation," saith the apostle, "hath ye taken you, but such as is common to man," what is humane, that is, such as you may expect from men of such principles as heathens, and such power; or else such as is common to mankind in the present state; or else such as the spirit and resolution of mere men may bear you through, [though not without the grace of God.] Note, The trials of common Christians are but common trials; others have the like burthens and the like temptations. What they bear up under and break through we may also. 2nd. "God is faithful." Though Satan be a deceiver, God is true. Men may be false, and the world may be false, but God is faithful, and our strength and security is in him. He keepeth his covenant, and will never fail the filial hope and trust of his children. 3rd. He is wise as well as faithful, and will proportion our burthen to our strength, [already given:] "He will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able." He knows what we can bear, and what we can bear up against, [give more grace:] and he will in his wise providence either proportion our temptations to our strength or make us able to grapple with them. He will take care that we be not overcome, if we rely upon him, and resolve to approve ourselves faithful to him. We need not perplex ourselves with the difficulties in our way, when God will take care that they shall not be too great for us to encounter, especially, 4th. When he will make them to issue well. "He will make a way to escape," that is, either the trial itself, or at least the mischief of it. There is no valley so dark but he can find a way through it; no affliction so grievous but he can prevent or remove, or enable us to support, and in the end overrule to our advantage. [God's people have a High Priest, who is touched with a feeling of their infirmities.]

And upon this argument he, 3. Grounds another caution against idolatry. "Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry." Observe, 1st. How he addresses them: "My dearly beloved." It is out of tender affection to them that he presses this advice upon them. 2nd. The matter of this advice. "Flee idolatry." Shun it, and all approaches towards it. Idolatry is the most heinous injury and affront to the true God; it is transferring his worship and honour to a rival. 3rd. The ground of this advice. Seeing you have such encouragement to trust God and be faithful, do you approve yourselves men; be not shaken by any discouragements your heathen enemies may lay before you. God will succour and assist, help you in your trials and help you out of them; and therefore be not guilty of any idolatrous compliances. Note, We have all the encouragement in the world to flee sin, and prove faithful to God; we cannot fall by a temptation if we cleave fast to him.

15 I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say. 16 The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? 17 For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread. 18 Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar? 19 What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing? 20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. 21 Ye cannot drink (distinction between what they saw in the rock and what we see in it) the rock was Christ" (Alford). "Not one particular rock. The miracle happened at least twice. . . . Christ is called the Rock because it was through his agency that the several rocks, one after another, acquired the same water-yielding power" (Burger).

x. 16. "The cup of blessing;" answering to the Jewish "cup of blessing," over which thanks were offered at the Passover. (See Matthew xvi. 27.) This cup and the bread St. Paul calls the communion, or "participation" of the blood and body of Christ, that whereby faith really but spiritually partakes of the body and blood of Christ. Hence the inconsistency of having fellowship with devils.

x. 17. "One bread, one body:" omit "and." Those partaking, although many, became "one bread" by the assimilation of that one bread partaken, and so one body with Christ and with one another.

x. 23. See chap. vi. 12.

x. 25. "Shambles:" the meat-market. The things thus sold are the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils. 22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?

In this passage the apostle urges the general caution against idolatry, in the particular case of eating the heathen sacrifices as such, and out of any religious respect to the idol to whom they were sacrificed.

First. He prefaces his argument with an appeal to their own reason and judgment. "I speak to wise men, judge ye what I say," ver. 15, as if he had said, You are great pretenders to wisdom, to close reasoning and argument, I can leave it with your own reason and conscience whether I do not argue justly. Note, It is no dishonour to an inspired teacher, nor disadvantage to his argument, to appeal for the truth of it to the reason and consciences of his hearers; it comes upon them with the greater force when it comes with this conviction. Paul, an inspired apostle, would yet in some cases leave it with the Corinthians to judge whether what he taught was not conformable to their own light and sense.

Secondly. He lays down his argument for the Lord's supper. "The cup which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" Is not this sacred rite an instrument of communion of God? Do we not therein profess to be in friendship, and to have fellowship with them? Is it not a token whereby we professedly hold communion with Christ, whose body was broken and blood shed to procure remission of our sins and the favour of God? And can we be in alliance [union] with Christ, or friendship [covenant] with God, without being devoted to him? In short, the Lord's supper is a feast on the sacrificed body and blood of our Lord, epulum ex oblatis. And to eat of the feast is to partake of the sacrifice, and so to be his guests to whom the sacrifice was offered, and this in token of friendship with him. Thus, to partake of the Lord's table is to profess ourselves his [accepted] guests and covenant people. This is the very purpose and intention of this symbolical eating and drinking. It is holding communion with God, and partaking of those privileges, and professing ourselves under those obligations, which result from the death and [atoning] sacrifice of Christ; and this in conjunction with all true Christians, with whom we have communion also in this ordinance. "Because the bread is one, we, being many, are one body, for we are made partakers of one bread," or loaf, ver. 17; which I think is thus more truly rendered: By partaking of one broken loaf, the emblem of our Saviour's broken body, who is the only true bread that came down from heaven, we coalesce into one body, [profess to] become members of him and one another. Those who truly partake by faith have this communion with Christ and one another; and those who eat the outward elements make profession of having this communion, of belonging to God, and the blessed fraternity of his people and worshippers. This is the true meaning of this holy rite.

Thirdly. He confirms this from the Jewish worship and customs. "Behold Israel after the flesh; are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the altar?" that is, of the sacrifices offered upon it. Those who were admitted to eat of the offerings were esteemed to partake of the sacrifice itself as made for them, and to be sanctioned thereby, and therefore sure to worship God and be in alliance or covenant with him, even the God of Israel, to whom the sacrifice was made. This was a symbol or token of holding communion with him.

Fourthly. He applies this to the argument against feasting with idolaters on their sacrifices, and to prove them that do so idolaters. This he does, 1. By allowing the principle on which they would argue it to be lawful; namely, that an idol was nothing. Many of them were nothing at all, none of them had any divinity in them; what was sacrificed to idols was nothing, no way changed from what it was before, but was every whit as fit for food, considered in itself. They indeed seem to argue that, because an idol was nothing, what was offered was no sacrifice, but common and ordinary food, of which they might therefore eat with as little scruple. Now the apostle allows that the food was not changed as to its nature, was as fit to be eaten as common food, where it was set before any who knew not of its having been offered to an idol; but, 2. He proves that eating it as part of a heathen sacrifice was, 1st. A partaking with them in their idolatry. It was having fellowship with devils, [certainly not fallen angels, for to these the Gentiles did not ascribe the most diabolical passions and acts, evil demons; all heathen worship was a work of Satan:] because what the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed to devils; and to feast with them upon these sacrifices was to partake in the sacrifice, and therefore to worship the god to whom it was made, and have fellowship or communion with him, just as he who eats the Lord's supper is supposed to partake in the Christian sacrifice, or as they which ate the Jewish sacrifices did partake of what was offered on their altar. But heathens sacrificed to devils; therefore do not feast on their sacrifices, doing it as a token of your having fellowship with the demons to whom they are offered. I would not have you be in communion with devils. 2nd. It was a virtual renouncing of Christianity. "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils. Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils," ver. 21. To partake of this Christian feast was to have communion with Christ; to partake of the feasts made out of honour to the heathen idols, and made of things sacrificed to them, was to have communion with devils. Now this was to compound contraries; it was by no means consistent. Communion with Christ and communion with the devil could never be had at once; one must be renounced if the other was maintained. He who held communion with Christ must renounce that with devils; he that held communion with devils must by that very deed renounce communion with Christ. And what a manifest self-contradiction must that man's conduct be that would partake of the Lord's table, and yet partake of the table of demons. God and mammon can never be served together, nor fellowship be at once had with Christ and Satan. Those who communicate with devils must virtually renounce Christ. This may also intimate that such as indulge themselves in gluttony or drunkenness, and by so doing make their own table the table of devils, or keep up fellowship with Satan by a course of known and wilful wickedness, cannot partake truly of the cup and table of the Lord. They may use the sign, but do not the thing signified thereby; for a man can never be at once in communion with Christ and his church and yet in fellowship with Satan. Note, How much reason have we to look to it, that every sin, an idol, be renounced by us, when we eat and drink at the Lord's table.

Fifthly. He warns them upon the whole against such idolatry, by signifying to them that God is a jealous God; ver. 22, "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?" It is very likely many among the Corinthians made light of being at these heathen feasts, and thought there was no harm in it; but the apostle bids them beware. The reason with which the second commandment is enforced is, "I am a jealous God." God cannot endure a rival in matter of worship, nor give his glory, nor suffer it to be given to another. They that have fellowship with other gods provoke him to jealousy, Deu. xxxii. 16; and before this he done persons should consider whether they are stronger than he. It is a dangerous thing to provoke God's anger, unless we could withstand his power. But who can stand before him when he is angry? Nah. i. 6. This should be considered by all who continue in the love and liking of sin, and in league with it, whilst yet they profess to keep up communion with Christ. Is not this the way to provoke his jealousy and indignation? Note, Attention to the greatness of God's power should restrain us from provoking his jealousy, from doing any thing to displease him. Shall we rouse almighty wrath? and how shall we withstand it? Are we a match for God? can we resist his power or control it? And if not, shall we arm it against us, by provoking him to jealousy? No, let us fear this power, and let this restrain us from all provocation.

23 All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not. 24 Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth. 25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake: 26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. 27 If any of them that believe not bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake. 28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: 29 Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience? 30 For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks? 31 Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. 32 Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God: 33 Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

In this passage the apostle shews in what instances, notwithstanding, Christians might lawfully eat of what had been sacrificed to idols. They must not eat it out of religious respect to the idol, nor go into his temple, and hold a feast there, upon what they knew was an idol sacrifice, nor perhaps out of the temple, if they knew it was a feast held upon a sacrifice; but there were cases wherein they might eat what had been offered without sin. Some such the apostle here instances in; but,

First. Gives a caution against abusing our liberty in lawful things. That may be lawful which is not expedient, which will not edify; but a Christian must not barely consider what is lawful, but what is expedient, and for the use of edification. A private Christian should do so even in his private conduct. He must not seek his own only, but his neighbour's wealth, [not in the original.] He must be concerned not to hurt his neighbour, nay, he must be concerned to promote his welfare, and must consider how to act so as that he may help others, and not hinder them in their holiness, comfort, or salvation. They who allow themselves in every thing not plainly sinful in itself will often run into what is evil by accident, [a sinful carelessness,] and do much mischief to others. Every thing lawful in itself to be done is not therefore lawfully done. Circumstances may make that sin which in itself is none; and these must be weighed, and the expedience of an action, and its tendency to edification, must be considered before it be done. Note, The [spiritual] welfare of others, as well as our own convenience, must be consulted in many things we do, if we would do them well.

Secondly. He tells them that what was sold in the shambles they might eat without asking questions. The priest's share of heathen sacrifices was thus frequently offered to sale after it had been offered in the temple. Now the apostle tells them they need not be so scrupulous as to ask the butcher in the market whether the meat he sold had been offered to an idol; it was there sold as common food, and as such might be bought and used. "For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," ver. 26; and the fruit and products of the earth were designed by him, the great Proprietor, for the use and subsistence of mankind, and more especially of his own children and servants. "Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer," 1 Tim. iv. 4: "To the pure all things are pure," Tit. i. 15. Note, Though it is sinful to use any food in an idolatrous manner, it is no sin after such abuse to apply it in a holy manner to its common use.

Thirdly. He adds, that if they were invited by any heathen acquaintance to a feast, they might go and eat what was set before them, without asking questions, ver. 27: nay, though they knew things sacrificed to idols were served up at such entertainments, as well as sold in the shambles. Note, The apostle doth not prohibit their going to a feast upon the invitation of them that believed not. There is a civility owing even to infidels and heathens. Christianity does by no means bind us up from the common offices of humanity, or allow us in an un courteous behaviour to any of our own kind, however they may differ from us in religious sentiments or practices. And when Christians were invited to feast with infidels, [then the bulk of the population,] they were not to ask needless questions about the food set before them, but eat without harmless in themselves, and it is unwise, by asking questions, to raise needless scruples in your conscience.

x. 28. "Any man:" some weak brother wishing to warn you of what you are eating. Omit the last clause, "For the earth," &c.

x. 29, 30. "For:" either introducing a reason for verse 27, or connected with preceding clause, the sense being, "Why should I give occasion by the use of my liberty that another should condemn it?" "Why am I to be evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks?"

xi. 1. This belongs to the end of chap. x., this chapter commencing at verse 2.

xi. 2. "Ordinances;" rather, "traditions;" apostolic directions, given either verbally or in writing. St. Paul praises their general practice, but proceeds to point out some exceptions. His reference seems to be principally to ceremonies.

xi. 3. "In the Corinthian church there was a departure from the prevailing custom of the East (according to which women went scruple. Needless inquiries might perplex their minds and consciences, for which reason they were to be avoided. Any thing fit to be eaten that was set before them as a common entertainment they might lawfully eat. And why, then, should they scrupulously inquire whether what was set before them had been sacrificed? It is to be understood of civil feasting, not religious; for these last among the heathens were feasts upon their sacrifices, which he had condemned before as a participation in their idolatrous worship. At a common feast they might expect common food, and they needed not to move scruples in their own minds, whether what was set before them was otherwise or no. Note, Though Christians should be very careful to know and understand their duty, yet should they not, by needless inquiries, perplex themselves.

Fourthly. Yet even at such an entertainment, he adds, if any should say it was a thing that had been offered to idols, they should refrain; "Eat not, for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake." Whether it were the master or the feast or any of the guests,—whether it were spoken in the hearing of all, or whispered in the ear,—they should refrain for his sake who suggested this to them, whether he were an infidel or an infirm Christian; and for conscience sake, out of regard to conscience, that they might shew a regard to it in themselves, and keep up a regard to it in others. This he backs with the same reason as the former: "For the earth is the Lord's." There is food enough provided for our common Lord, of which we may eat without scruple. Note, The same doctrine may be variously improved, as here: "The earth is the Lord's," therefore you may eat anything without scruple that is set before you as common food. And yet, because the earth is the Lord's, eat nothing that will give offence, lay a stumblingblock before others, and encourage some in idolatry, or tempt others to eat when they are not clear in their own mind that it is lawful, and so sin and wound their own consciences. Note, Christians should be very cautious of doing what may thus prejudice the consciences of others and weaken their authority with them, which is by all means to be kept up, [while they labour prayerfully to enlighten weak consciences.]

Fifthly. He urges them to refrain where they will give offence, whilst yet he allows it lawful to eat what was set before them as common food, though it had been offered in sacrifice. Another man's conscience is no measure to our conduct. What he thinks unlawful is not thereby made unlawful to me, but may be a matter of liberty still; and as long as I own God as the giver of my food, and render him thanks for it, it is very unjust to reproach me for using it. This must be understood abstracted from the scandal given, by eating in the circumstance mentioned; though some understand it to mean, Why should I, by using the liberty I have, give occasion to those who are scandalised to speak evil of me? according to that advice of the apostle, Rom. xiv. 16, "Let not your good be evil spoken of." Note, Christians should take care not to use their liberty to the hurt of others, nor their own reproach.

Sixthly. The apostle takes occasion from this discourse to lay down a general rule for Christians' conduct, and apply it to this particular case, ver. 31, 32, namely, that in eating and drinking, and in all we do, we should aim at the glory of God, at pleasing and honouring him. This is the fundamental principle of practical godliness. The great end of all practical religion must direct us, where particular and express rules are wanting. Nothing must be done against the glory of God, and the good of our neighbours connected with it. Nay, the tendency of our behaviour to the common good, and the credit of our holy religion, should give direction to it. And, therefore, nothing should be done by us to offend any, whether Jew, or Gentile, or the church, ver. 32. The Jews should not be unnecessarily grieved or prejudiced, who have such abhorrence of idols, that they reckon everything offered to them thereby defiled, and that it will pollute and render culpable all who partake of it. Nor should heathens be contemned in their idolatry by any behaviour of ours, which they may construe as homage or honour done to their idols. [How sinful then are public compliances with idolatrous practices in any part of the world!] Nor young converts from Gentilism take any encouragement from our conduct, to retain any veneration for the heathen gods and worship which they have renounced. Nor should we do anything that might be a means to pervert any members of the church from their Christian profession or practice. Our own humour and appetite must not determine our practice, but the honour of God, and the good and edification of the church. We should not so much consult our own pleasure and interest as the advancement of the kingdom of God among men. Note, A Christian should be a man devoted to God, and of a public spirit, [rather, the spirit of Christ.]

Seventhly. He presses all upon them by his own example. "Even as I please all men" (or study to do it) in all things," (that I lawfully can,) "not seeking mine own profit, but that of many, that they may be saved," ver. 33. Note, A preacher may press his advice home with boldness and authority when he can enforce it with his own example. He is most likely to promote a public spirit in others who can give evidence of it in himself. And it is highly commendable in a minister to neglect his own advantages, that he may promote the salvation of his hearers. This shews that he hath a spirit suitable to his function, [an unction of the Spirit.] It is a station for [the highest] public usefulness, and can never be faithfully discharged by a man of a narrow spirit and selfish principles, [a man unrenewed.]

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter the apostle blames, and endeavours to rectify, some great indecencies and manifest disorders in the church of Corinth. As, I. The misconduct of their women (some of whom seem to have been inspired) in the public assembly, who laid by their veils, the common token of subjection to their husbands in that part of the world. This behaviour he reprehends, requires them to keep veiled, asserts the superiority of the husband, yet so as to remember the husband that both were made for mutual help and comfort, ver. 1-16. II. He blames them for their discord, riot, and neglect and contempt of the poor at the Lord's supper, ver. 17-22. III. To rectify these scandalous disorders, he sets before them the nature and intention of this holy institution, directs them how they should attend on it, and warns them of the danger of a conduct so indecent as theirs, and of all unworthy receiving, ver. 23-34.

veiled), especially on the part of heathen converts, who, even in other respects, rather overstretch the idea of Christian liberty. Since I am here discussing a question of merely outward custom, it is interesting to observe how characteristically he surveys the smallest matters in connection with the greatest, and understands how to penetrate to the remotest particulars from the fundamental principles of the Christian life. He begins not with the custom itself, but with the leading idea that ought to govern it" (Neander).

Ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ. 2 Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you. 3 But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God. 4 Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head. 5 But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven. 6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. 7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man. 8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. 9 Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. 10 For this cause ought the woman to have power on her head because of the angels. 11 Nevertheless neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. 12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God. 13 Judge in yourselves: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? 14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that, if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? 15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering. 16 But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

WOMAN OF THE EAST, VEILED.

Paul, having answered the cases put to him, proceeds in this chapter to the redress of grievances. The first verse of the chapter is put, by those who divided the epistle into chapters, as a preface to the rest of the epistle, but seems to have been a more proper close to the last, in which he had enforced the cautions he had given against the abuse of liberty by his own example.

"Head:" "By the term 'head' he expresses the next immediate relation sustained. The man has Christ for his head, to whom he is alone subordinate; while the woman who, as a member of the church, has indeed Christ in like manner for her head, is yet primarily subject to her husband, and in him has her support, her destiny, and her dignity" (Kling).

xi. 10. "Power:" i.e., the veil on her head as a sign of power or subjection. Neander explains it thus: "The wife should have upon

"Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ," ver. 1, fitly closes this argument; and the way of speaking in the next verse looks like a transition to another. But, whether it more properly belongs to this or the last chapter, it is plain from it, that Paul not only preached such doctrine as they ought to believe, but led such a life as they ought to imitate. "Be ye followers of me," is, Be imitators of me, live as you see me live. Note, Ministers are likely to preach most to the purpose when they can press their hearers to follow their example. Yet would not Paul be followed blindly neither. He encourages neither implicit faith nor obedience; he would be followed himself no farther than he followed Christ. Christ's pattern is a copy without a blot, so is no man's else. Note, We should follow no leader farther than he follows Christ. Apostles should be left by us when they deviate from the example of their Master. He passes next to reprehend and reform an indecency among them, of which the women were more especially guilty. Concerning which, observe,

First. How he prefaceth it. He begins with a commendation of what was praiseworthy in them; ver. 2, "I praise you, that you remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances as I delivered them to you." Many of them, it is probable, did this in the strictest sense of the expression; and he takes occasion from thence to address the body of the church under this good character; and the body might, in the main, have continued to observe the ordinances and institutions of Christ, though in some things they deviated from and corrupted them. Note, That when we reprove what is amiss in any, it is very prudent and fit to commend what is good in them. It will shew that the reproof is not from ill-will, and a humour of censuring and finding fault; and it will therefore procure the more regard to it.

Secondly. He lays a foundation for his future reprehension by asserting the superiority of the man over the woman. "I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God." Christ, in his mediatorial character and glorified humanity, is at the head of mankind. He is not only first of the kind, but Lord and Sovereign, [over all; a doctrine which cannot be set aside without shaking the whole gospel system.] "He has a name above every name;" though in this high office and authority he has a superior, God being his head. And as God is the head of Christ, [in his glory and humanity,] and Christ the head of the whole human kind, so the man is the head of the two sexes. Not indeed with such dominion as Christ has over the kind, or God has over the man Christ Jesus; but a superiority and headship he has. And the woman should be in subjection, and not assume or usurp the man's place. This is the situation in which God has placed her, and for that reason she should have a mind suited to her rank, and not do anything that looks like an affectation of changing places. Somewhat like this the women of the church of Corinth seem to have been guilty of, who were under inspiration, and prayed and prophesied even in their assemblies, ver. 5. It is indeed an apostolical canon, that the women should keep silence in the churches, ch. xiv. 34; 1 Tim. ii. 12; which some understand without limitation, as if a woman under inspiration also must keep silence, which seems very well to agree with the connexion of the apostle's discourse, ch. xiv. Others with a limitation: though a woman might not from her own abilities pretend to teach, or so much as question and debate anything in the church, yet, when under inspiration, the case was altered, she had liberty to speak. Or, though she might not preach, even by inspiration, because teaching is the business of a superior, yet she might pray or utter hymns by inspiration, even in the public assembly; she did not shew any affectation of superiority over the man by such acts of public worship. It is plain the apostle doth not in this place prohibit the thing, but the manner of doing it; and yet he might utterly disallow the thing, and lay an unlimited restraint on the women, in another part of the epistle. These things are not contradictory. It is to his present purpose to reprehend the manner wherein the women prayed and prophesied in the church, without determining in this place whether they did well or ill in praying or prophesying. Note, The manner of doing a thing enters into the morality of it. We must not only be concerned to do good, but that the good we do be well done.

Thirdly. The thing he reprehends is the woman's praying or prophesying uncovered, or the man's doing either covered, ver. 4, 5. To understand this, it must be observed, that it was a signification either of shame or subjection for persons to be veiled or covered in the Eastern countries, contrary to the custom of ours, where the being bareheaded betokens subjection, and being covered superiority and dominion. And this will help us better to understand,

Fourthly. The reasons on which he grounds his reprehension. 1. "The man that prays or prophesies with his head covered dishonoureth his head," namely, Christ the head of every man, ver. 3, by appearing in a habit unsuitable to the rank in which God has placed him. Note, We should even in our dress and habit avoid everything that may dishonour Christ. "The woman," on the other hand, "who prays or prophesies with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head," namely, the man, ver. 3. She appears in the dress of her superior, and throws off the token of her subjection; and she might with equal decency cut her hair short, or cut it close, the common dress of the man in that age. This would be in a manner to declare that she was desirous of changing sexes; a manifest affectation of that superiority which God had conferred on the other sex. And this was properly the fault of these prophetesses in the church of Corinth. It was doing a thing which in that age of the world betokened superiority, and therefore a tacit claim of what did not belong to them, but the other sex. Note, The sexes should not affect to change places. The order in which Divine wisdom has placed persons and things is best and fittest; to endeavour to mend it is to destroy all order, and introduce confusion. Women should keep to the rank God has chosen for them, and not dishonour their head, for this in the result is to dishonour God. If she was made out of the man, and for the man, and made to be the glory of the man, she should do nothing, especially in public, that looks like a wish of having this order inverted. 2. Another reason against this conduct was, that "the man is the image and glory of God," the representative of that glorious dominion and headship which God has over the world. It is the man who is set at the head of this lower creation, and therein bears the resemblance of God. "The woman," on the other hand, "is the glory of the man," ver. 7. She is his representative. Not but she has dominion over the inferior creatures, as she is a partaker of human nature, and so far is God's representative too, but it is at second hand. She is the image of God, inasmuch as she is the image of the man. "For the man was not made out of the woman, but the woman out of the man," ver. 8. The man was first made, and made head of the creation here below, and therein the image of the Divine dominion; and the woman was made out of the man, and shone with a reflection of his glory, being made superior to the other creatures here below, but in subjection to her husband, and deriving that honour from him out of whom she was made. 3. "The woman was made for the man," to be his help-meet, "and not the man for the woman." She was naturally therefore made subject to him, because made for him, for his use, and help, and comfort. And she who was intended to be always in subjection to the man should do nothing in Christian assemblies that looked like an affectation of equality. 4. "She ought to have power on her head, because of the angels." Power, that is, a veil, [the Greek word is not used in this sense in any other passage, but commentators, ancient and modern, agree generally in assigning to it this meaning here:] the token, not of her having power or superiority, but being under the power of her husband, and subject to him, and inferior to the other sex. Rebecca, when she met Isaac, and was delivering herself into his possession, put on her veil in token of her subjection, Gen. xxiv. 65. Thus would the apostle have the women appear in Christian assemblies, even though they spake there by inspiration, "because of the angels;" that is, say some, because of the evil angels. "The woman was first in the transgression, being deceived by the devil," 1 Tim. ii. 11, which increased her subjection to the man, Gen. iii. 16. Now, because evil angels will be sure to mix in all Christian assemblies, therefore should women wear the tokens of their shamefacedness and subjection, which in that age and country was a veil. Others say, because of the good angels. Jews and Christians have had an opinion, that these ministering spirits are many of them present in their assemblies. Their presence should restrain Christians from all indecencies in the worship of God. [Other commentators understand by angels, messengers or spies sent by heathen authorities into the Christian assemblies; others think that by angels are meant the ministers. All these senses the Greek word will bear, but the second given above is now generally received.] Note, We should learn from all to carry it in the public assemblies of Divine worship so as to express a reverence for God, and a content and satisfaction with that rank in which he has placed us.

Fifthly. He thinks fit to guard his argument with a caution, lest the inference be carried too far, ver. 11, 12; "Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, nor the woman without the man in the Lord." They were made for one another. "It is not good for him to be alone," Gen. ii. 18; and therefore was a woman made, and made for the man; and the man was intended to be a comfort, and help, and defence to the woman, though not so directly and immediately made for her. They were made to be a mutual comfort and blessing; not one a slave, and the other a tyrant. "Both were to be one flesh," Gen. ii. 24; and this for the propagation of a race of mankind. They are reciprocal instruments of each other's production. As the woman was first formed out of the man, the man is ever since propagated by the woman, ver. 12; all by the Divine wisdom and power of the First Cause so ordaining it. The authority and subjection should be no greater than is suitable to two in such near relation and close union to each other. Note, As it is the will of God that the woman know her place, so it is his will also that the man abuse not his power.

Sixthly. He enforces his argument from the natural covering provided for the woman, ver. 13—15; "Judge in yourselves," consult your own reason, hearken to what nature suggests, "is it comely for a woman to pray to God uncovered?" Should there not be a distinction kept up between the sexes in the wearing their hair, since nature has made one? Is it not a distinction which custom has kept up among all civilized nations? The woman's hair is a natural covering, to wear it long is a glory to her; but for a man to have long hair, or cherish it, is a token of softness and effeminacy. Note, It should be our concern, especially in Christian and religious assemblies, to make no breach upon the rules of natural decency.

Seventhly. He sums up all, by referring those who were contentious to the usages and customs of the churches, ver. 16. Custom is in a great measure the rule of decency. And the common practice of the churches is what he would have them govern themselves by. He does not silence the contentious by mere authority, but lets them know that they would appear to the world as very odd and singular in their humour, if they would quarrel for a custom to which all the churches of Christ were at that time utter strangers, or against a custom in which they all concurred, and that upon the foot of natural decency. It was the common usage of the churches for women to appear in public assemblies, and join in public worship, veiled, and it was manifestly decent that they should do so. They must be very contentious indeed who would quarrel with this custom, and lay it aside.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse. 18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it. 19 For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you. 20 When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper. 21 For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken. 22 What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

In this passage the apostle sharply rebukes them for much greater disorders than the former, in their partaking of the Lord's supper, which was commonly done in the first ages, as the ancients tell us, with a love feast annexed, which gave occasion to the scandalous disorders which the apostle here reprehends, Concerning which, observe,

First. The manner in which he introduces his charge. "Now in this that I declare to you, I praise you not," ver. 17. I cannot commend, but must blame and condemn you. It is plain, from the beginning of the chapter, that he was willing and pleased to commend, as far as he could. But such scandalous disorders, in so sacred an institution, as they were guilty of, called for a sharp reprehension. They quite turned the institution against itself. It was intended to make them better, to promote their spiritual interests, but it really made them worse. They came together, "not for the better, but for the worse." Note, That the ordinances of Christ, if they do not make us better, will be very apt to make us worse; if they do not do our souls good, they may do us harm; if they do not melt and mend, they will harden. Corruptions will be confirmed in us, if the proper means do not work a cure of them.

Secondly. He enters upon his charge against them in more particulars than one. 1. He tells them, that upon coming together they fell into divisions, schisms, σχίσματα. Instead of concurring unanimously in celebrating the ordi-her head a symbol of the power which the man has over her." "Because of the angels:" supposed to be present with Christ in the assemblies of the church. Alluded to probably because of the joy they take in all that is good, and of the order reigning amongst them.

xi. 16. "If any man appears still to dispute this matter, neither we nor the churches of God have such a practice as that of women praying uncovered."

xi. 19. "Heresies:" not doctrinal errors, but confirmed schisms.

xi. 24. Compare Luke xxii. 19, 20. "The truth seems to be that Luke, seeking information from every quarter, sought it from the preaching of St. Paul; and the apostle in his turn employed the knowledge acquired from other sources by his disciple."

xi. 25. "The new covenant in (ratified by and standing in) my blood."

xi. 26. "Show:" rather, "publicly announce."

nance, they fell a quarrelling with one another. Note, There may be schism where there is no separation of communion. Persons may come together in the same church, and sit down at the same table of the Lord, and yet be schismatics. Uncharitableness, alienation of affection, especially if it grows up to discord, and feuds and contentions, constitute schism. Christians may separate from each other's communion, and yet be charitable one towards another; they may continue in the same communion, and yet be uncharitable. This last is schism rather than the former. The apostle had heard a report of the Corinthians' divisions, and he tells them he had too much reason to believe it; for, adds he, there must be heresies [parties or factions, perhaps separate bodies communicating apart from each other,] also; not only quarrels, but factions, and perhaps such corrupt opinions as strike at the foundation of Christianity, and all sound religion. Note, No marvel there should be breaches of Christian love in the churches, when such offences will come as shall make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Such offences must come. Not that men are necessitated to be guilty of them, but the event is certain; and God permits them, that they which are approved, such honest hearts as will bear the trial, may be set to view, and appear faithful by their constant adherence to the truths and ways of God, notwithstanding the temptations of seducers. Note, The wisdom of God can make the wickedness and errors of others a foil to the piety and integrity of the saints. 2. He charges them not only with discord and division, but with scandalous disorder. "For in eating, every one taketh before the other his own supper, and one is hungry, and another is drunken," ver. 21. Heathens used to drink plentifully at their feasts upon their sacrifices. Many of the wealthier Corinthians seem to have taken the same liberty at the Lord's table, or at least at their ἀγάρα, or love feasts, that were annexed to the supper. They would not stay for one another. The rich despised the poor, and ate and drank up the provisions themselves brought, before the poor were allowed to partake; and thus some wanted, whilst others had more than enough. This was profaning a sacred institution, and corrupting a Divine ordinance to the last degree. What was appointed to feed the soul was employed to feed their lusts and passions. What should have been a bond of mutual amity and affection was made an instrument of discord and disunion. The poor are deprived of the food prepared for them, and the rich turned a feast of charity into a debauch. This was scandalous irregularity.

Thirdly. The apostle lays the blame of this conduct closely on them, 1. By telling them that their conduct perfectly destroyed the purpose and use of such an institution. "This is not to eat the Lord's supper," ver. 20. It was coming to the Lord's table, and not coming. They had as good have stayed away. Thus to eat the outward elements was not to eat Christ's body. Note, There is such a careless and irregular eating of the Lord's supper which is as none at all; it will turn to no account, but to increase guilt. Such an eating was that of the Corinthians. Their practices were a direct contradiction to the purposes of this sacred institution. 2. Their conduct carried in it a contempt of God's house, or of the church, ver. 22. If they had a mind to feast, they might do it at home in their own houses; but to come to the Lord's table, and cabal and quarrel, and keep the poor from their share of the provision there made for them as well as the rich, was such an abuse of the ordinance, and such a contempt of the poorer members of the church, more especially, as merited a very sharp rebuke. Such a behaviour tended much to the shame and discouragement of the poor, whose souls were as dear to Christ, and cost him as much, as those of the rich. Note, Common meals may be managed after a common manner, but religious feasts should be attended religiously. Note also, That it is a heinous evil, and severely to be censured, for Christians to treat their fellow Christians with contempt and insolence, but especially at the Lord's table. This is doing what they can to pour contempt on Divine ordinances; and we should look carefully to it, that nothing in our carriage at the Lord's table have the appearance of contemning so sacred an institution.

23 For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: 24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. 25 After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. 26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come. 27 Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. 28 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. 29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body. 30 For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. 31 For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. 32 But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. 33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another. 34

And if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

To rectify these gross corruptions and irregularities, the apostle sets the sacred institution here to view. This should be the rule in the reformation of all abuses. He,

First, Tells us how he came by the knowledge of it. He was not among the apostles at the first institution; but "he had received from the Lord what he had delivered to them," ver. 23. He had the knowledge of this matter by revelation from Christ. [Some commentators are of opinion that the apostle did not receive the account of the institution of the ordinance directly from the Lord Jesus Christ. The Greek verb for received seems to intimate very plainly that he did so receive it.] And what he had received he communicated, without varying from the truth a tittle, without adding or diminishing.

Secondly. He gives us a more particular account of the institution than we meet with elsewhere. We have here an account, 1. Of the author, our Lord Jesus Christ. The King of the church only has power to institute sacraments. 2. The time of the institution. "It was the very night wherein he was betrayed;" just as he was entering on his sufferings, which are therein to be commemorated. 3. The institution itself. Our Saviour took bread, and when he had given thanks, or blessed, (as it is in Mat. xxvi. 26.) "He brake, and said, Take, eat: this is my body broken for you, this do in remembrance of me; and in like manner he took the cup when he had supped, saying, This is the new testament in my blood, this do as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me," ver. 24, 25. In which observe,

1st. The materials of this sacrament. Both, First. As to the visible signs. These are bread and the cup; the former of which is called bread many times over in this passage, even after what the papists call consecration. What is eaten is called bread, though it be at the same time said to be the body of our Lord. A plain argument that the apostle knew nothing of their monstrous and absurd doctrine of transubstantiation. The latter is as plainly a part of this institution as words can make it. St. Matthew tells us, our Lord bade them all drink of it, Mat. xxvi. 27, as if he would by this expression lay in a caveat against the papists depriving the laity of the cup. Bread and the cup are both made use of, because it is a holy feast. Nor is it here or anywhere made necessary that any particular liquor should be in the cup. In one evangelist, indeed, it is plain wine was the liquor used by our Saviour, though it was perhaps mingled with water according to the Jewish custom: see Lightfoot on Mat. xxvi. But this doth by no means render it unlawful to have a sacrament where persons cannot come at wine. And in every place of Scripture in which we have an account of this part of the institution, it is always expressed by a figure. The cup is put for what was in it, without once specifying what the liquor was, in the words of the institution. Secondly. The things signified by these outward signs, and they are Christ's body and blood; his body broken, his blood shed, together with all the benefits which flow from his death and sacrifice. It "is the new testament in his blood." His blood is the seal and sanction of all the privileges of the new covenant, and worthy receivers take it as such at this holy ordinance; they have the new testament, and their own title to all the blessings of the new covenant, confirmed to them by his blood.

2nd. We have here the sacramental actions; the manner in which the materials of the sacrament are to be used. First. Our Saviour's actions, which are, taking the bread and cup, giving thanks, breaking the bread, and giving about both one and the other. Secondly. The actions of the communicants, which were, to take the bread and eat, to take the cup and drink, and both in remembrance of Christ. But the external acts are not the whole, nor the principal part of what is to be done at this holy ordinance; each of them hath a significance. Our Saviour having undertaken to make an offering of himself to God, and procure by his death the remission of sins, with all other gospel benefits for true believers, did, at the institution, deliver his body and blood, [not carnally and corporally, but spiritually,] with all the benefits procured by his death, to his disciples, and continues to do the same every time the ordinance is administered to true believers. And this is here exhibited or set forth as the food of souls. And as food, though ever so wholesome or rich, will yield no nourishment without being eaten, here the communicants are to take and eat, or to receive Christ and feed upon him, his grace and benefits, and by faith convert them into nourishment to their souls. They are to take him as their Lord and life, yield themselves up to him, and live upon him. "He is our life," Col. iii. 4.

3rd. We have here an account of the ends of this institution. First. It was appointed to be done in remembrance of Christ, [neither an original sacrifice nor a sacrifice to a sacrifice,] to keep fresh in our minds an ancient favour, namely, his dying for us, as well as to remember an absent friend, even Christ interceding for us in virtue of his death, at God's right hand. The best of friends, and the greatest acts of kindness are here to be remembered. The motto on this ordinance, and the very meaning of it is, 'When this you see, remember me.' Secondly. It was to shew forth Christ's death, to declare and publish it. It is not barely in remembrance of Christ, of what he hath done and suffered, that this ordinance was instituted, but to commemorate, to celebrate, his glorious condescension and grace in our redemption. We declare his death to be our life, the spring of all our comforts and hopes. And we glory in such a declaration; we shew forth his death, and spread it before God as our accepted sacrifice and ransom. We set it in view of our own faith, for our comfort and quickening; and we own before the world, by this very service, that we are the disciples of Christ, who trust in him alone for salvation and acceptance with God.

It is moreover hinted here concerning this ordinance, 1st. That it should be frequent; "As often as ye eat this bread," &c. Our bodily meals return often. We cannot maintain life and health without this; and it is fit this spiritual diet should be taken often too. The ancient churches celebrated this ordinance every Lord's day, if not every day when they assembled for worship. 2nd. That it must be perpetual. It is to be celebrated till the Lord shall come; till he shall come the second time, without sin, for the salvation of them that believe, and to judge the world. This is our warrant for keeping this feast. It was our Lord's will that we should thus celebrate the memorials of his death and passion, till he come "in his own glory, and his Father's glory, with his holy angels," and put an end to the present state of things, and his own mediatorial administration, by passing the final sentence. Note, The Lord's supper is not a temporary, but a standing and perpetual ordinance.

Thirdly. He lays before the Corinthians the danger of receiving unworthily, of prostituting this institution as they did, and using it to the purposes of feasting and faction; with intentions opposite to its design, or a temper of mind altogether unsuitable to it; or keeping up the covenant with sin and death, whilst they are there professedly renewing and confirming their covenant with God. 1. It is great guilt which such contract. "They shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," ver. 27; of violating this sacred institution; of despising his body and blood. They act as if they "counted the blood of the covenant, xi. 27. "Irreverent or contemptuous conduct towards the symbol is in fact a desecration of the object symbolised" (Kling).

xi. 29. "Damnation:" rather, "judgment." "Not discerning:" rather, "not duly judging," "not distinguishing or appreciating." Omit "unworthily," and render, "He that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning (i.e., if he does not discern) the Lord's body."

xii. 1. An occasion of disorder had been found amongst the Corinthians in the exercise of spiritual gifts. "As every one thought of his own, and no one of his neighbour's good, those gifts were most highly coveted which were most astonishing."

xii. 2. "Carried away:" "led about," "blindly transported hither and thither." "Dumb idols:" in contrast to the living God, who speaks by his Spirit.

xii. 3. The operations of the Spirit were not confined to or principally manifested in supernatural gifts; his chief work was in the whereby they are sanctified, an unholy thing," Heb. x. 29. They profane the institution, and in a manner crucify their Saviour over again. Instead of being cleansed by his blood, they are guilty of his blood. 2. It is a great hazard they run. They eat and drink judgment to themselves, ver. 29. They provoke God, and are likely to bring down punishment on themselves. No doubt but they incur great guilt, and so render themselves liable to damnation, to spiritual judgments, and eternal misery. Every sin is in its own nature damning; and therefore so heinous a sin as profaning such a holy ordinance to be sure is so. And it is profaned in the grossest sense by such irreverence and rudeness as the Corinthians were guilty of. But fearful believers should not be discouraged from attending at this holy ordinance by the sound of these words, as if they bound upon themselves the sentence of damnation by coming to the table of the Lord unprepared. This sin, as well as all others, leaves room for forgiveness upon repentance. And the Holy Spirit never indited this passage of Scripture to deter serious Christians from their duty, though the devil has often made this advantage of it, and robbed good Christians of their choicest comforts. The Corinthians came to the Lord's table as to a common feast, "not discerning the Lord's body;" that is, not making a difference or distinction between that and common food, but setting both on a level. Nay, they used much more indecency at this sacred feast than they would have done at a civil one. This was very sinful in them, and very displeasing to God, and brought down his judgments on them. "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." Some were punished with sickness, and some with death. Note, Careless and irreverent receiving the Lord's supper may bring temporal punishments. Yet the connexion seems to imply, that even those who were thus punished were in a state of favour with God, at least many of them. "They were chastened of the Lord, that they should not be condemned with the world," ver. 32. Now Divine chastening is a sign of Divine love. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," Heb. xii. 6, especially with so merciful a purpose, of preventing their final condemnation. In the midst of judgment God remembers mercy. He many times punishes those whom he tenderly loves. It is kindness to use the rod to prevent the child's ruin. He will visit such iniquity as this under consideration with stripes, and yet make those stripes the evidence of his lovingkindness. They were in the favour of God who yet so highly offended him in this instance, and brought down judgments on themselves: at least many of them were; for they were punished by him out of fatherly goodwill; punished now, that they might not perish for ever. Note, It is better to bear trouble in this world than be miserable to eternity; and God punishes his people now to prevent their eternal woe.

Fourthly. He points out the duty of those who would come to the Lord's table. 1. In general. "Let a man examine himself," ver. 28; try, and approve himself. Let him consider the sacred intention of this holy ordinance, its nature and use, [as well as his knowledge of all gospel truth, and let him use much prayer,] and compare his own views in attending on it, and his disposition of mind for it; and when he has approved himself to his own conscience in the sight of God, then let him attend. Such self-examination is necessary to a right attendance at his holy ordinance. Note, Those who through weakness of understanding cannot try themselves are by no means fit to eat of this bread and drink of this cup; nor those who, upon a fair trial, have just ground to charge themselves with impitenity, unbelief, and alienation from the life of God. They should have the wedding garment on who would be welcome at this marriage feast,—grace in habit, and grace in exercise. 2. The duty of those who were yet unpunished for their profanation of this ordinance. "If we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged," ver. 31. If we would thoroughly search and explore ourselves, and condemn and correct what we find amiss, we should prevent Divine judgments. Note, To be exact and severe on ourselves and our own conduct, is the properest way in the world not to fall under the just severity of our heavenly Father. We must not judge others, lest we be judged, Mat. vii. 1; but we must judge ourselves, to prevent our being judged and condemned by God. We may be critical as to ourselves, but should be very candid in judging of others.

Fifthly. He closes all with a caution against the irregularities of which they were guilty, ver. 33, 34, charging them to avoid all indecency at the Lord's table. They were to eat for hunger and pleasure only at home, and not charge the holy supper to a common feast, and much less eat up the provisions before those who could bring none did partake of them, lest they came together for condemnation. Note, Our holy duties, through our own abuse, may prove matter of condemnation. Christians may keep sabbaths, hear sermons, attend at sacraments, and only aggravate guilt, and bring on a heavier doom. A sad but serious truth! Oh, let all look to it, that they do not come together at any time to God's worship, and all the while provoke him, and bring down vengeance on themselves. Holy things are to be used in a holy manner, or else they are profaned. What else was amiss in this matter he tells them he would rectify when he came to them.

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Considers the case of spiritual gifts, which were very plentifully poured out on the Corinthian church. He considers their original, that they are from God; their variety and use, that they were all intended for one and the same general end, the advancement of Christianity, and the church's edification, ver. 1–11. II. He illustrates this by an allusion to a human body, in which all the members have a mutual relation and subserviency, and each its proper place and use, ver. 12–26. III. He tells us, that the church is the body of Christ, and the members are variously gifted for the benefit of the whole body, and each particular member, ver. 27–30. And then, IV. Closes with an exhortation to seek somewhat more beneficial than those gifts, ver. 31.

NOW concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant. 2 Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led. 3 Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the heart of the believer. Under his influence none could reject Jesus (literally, "anathema Jesus"), nor could any man without his help say (i.e., from his heart believe and confess) that Jesus is the Lord.

xii. 5. "Administrations:" functions, or services.

xii. 8. "Word:" literally, "discourse," or capacity for discoursing; "the 'wisdom' denoting the direct intuition into Divine mysteries, and the 'knowledge' the apprehension gained by reflection" (Kling).

Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. 4 Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. 5 And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. 6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. 7 But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. 8 For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; 9 To another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; 10 To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: 11 But all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.

The apostle comes now to treat of spiritual gifts which abounded in the church at Corinth, but were greatly abused. What these gifts were is at large told us in the body of the chapter: extraordinary offices and powers bestowed on ministers and Christians in the first ages, for conviction of unbelievers, and propagation of the Gospel. Gifts and grace, χαρίσματα and χάρις, greatly differ. Both indeed were freely given of God; but where grace is given it is for the salvation of those who have it. Gifts are bestowed for the advantage and salvation of others; and there may be great gifts where there is not a dram of grace, but persons possessed of them are utterly out of the Divine favour. They are great instances of Divine benignity to men, but do not by themselves prove those who have them the objects of Divine complacency. This church was rich in gifts, but there were many things scandalously out of order in it. Now concerning these spiritual gifts, that is, the extraordinary powers they had received from the Spirit, the apostle,

First. Tells them he would not have them ignorant neither of their original or use. They came from God and were to be used for him; and it would lead them far astray if they were ignorant of one or the other of these. Note, Right information is of great use as to all religious practice. It is wretched work gifted men make who either do not know or not advert to the nature and right use of the gifts with which they are endowed.

Secondly. He puts them in mind of the sad state out of which they had been recovered. "Ye were Gentiles, carried away to dumb idols, even as ye were led," ver. 2; and whilst they were so could have no pretensions to be spiritual men or have spiritual gifts. Whilst they were under the conduct of the spirit of Gentilism they could not be influenced by the Spirit of Christ. If they well understood their former condition they could not but know that all true spiritual gifts were from God. Now concerning this, observe,

1. Their former character. They were Gentiles; not God's peculiar people, but of the nations whom he had in a manner abandoned. The Jews were before his chosen people, distinguished from the rest of the world by his favour. To them the knowledge and worship of the true God were in a manner confined. The rest of the world "were strangers to the covenant of promise, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and in a manner 'without God,'" Eph. ii. 12. Such Gentiles were the body of the Corinthians before their conversion to Christianity. What a change was here! Christian Corinthians were once Gentiles. Note, It is of great use to the Christian, and a proper consideration to stir him up both to duty and thankfulness, to think what once he was: Ye were Gentiles.

2. The conduct they were under. "Carried away to these dumb idols, even as they were led." They were hurried upon the grossest idolatry, the worship even of stocks and stones, through the force of a vain imagination, and the fraud of their priests practising on their ignorance. For, whatever were the sentiments of their philosophers, this was the practice of the herd. The body of the people paid their homage and worship to dumb idols, "that had ears but could not ear, and mouths but could not speak," Ps. cxv. 6. Miserable abjectness of mind! And those that despised these gross conceptions of the vulgar, yet countenanced them by their practice. Oh dismal state of Gentilism! Could the Spirit of God be among such stupid idolaters, or they be influenced by it! How did the prince of this world triumph in the blindness of mankind! How thick a mist had he cast over their minds!

Thirdly. He shews them how they might discern those gifts that were from the Spirit of God, true, spiritual gifts. "No man, speaking by the Spirit, calls Jesus accursed." [Perhaps the very form of execration used by the Jews, and which persecutors required apostates to employ, in blaspheming Christ.] Thus did both Jews and Gentiles. They blasphemed him as an impostor, and execrated his name, and deemed it abominable. And yet many Jews that were exorcists and magicians went about pretending to work wonders by the Spirit of God, (see Lightfoot, Horæ in loc.) and many among the Gentiles pretended to inspiration. Now the apostle tells them, none could act under the influence, or by the power of the Spirit of God, that disowned and blasphemed Christ; for the Spirit of God bore uncontrollable witness to Christ by prophecy, miracles, his resurrection from the dead, the success of his doctrine among men, and its effect upon them, and could never so far contradict itself as to declare him accursed. And, on the other hand, "no man could say Jesus was the Lord," (that is, live by his faith, and work miracles to prove it,) "but" it must be "by the Holy Ghost." To own this truth before men, and maintain it to the death, and live under the influence of it, could not be done without the sanctification of the Holy Ghost. No man can call Christ Lord, with a believing subjection to him and dependence upon him, unless that faith be wrought by the Holy Ghost. No man can confess this truth in the day of trial but by the Holy Ghost animating and encouraging him. Note, We have as necessary a dependence on the Spirit's operation and influence for our sanctification and perseverance as on the mediation of Christ for our reconciliation and acceptance with God; and no man could confirm this truth with a miracle but by the Holy Ghost. No evil spirit would lend assistance, if it were in his power, to spread a doctrine and religion so ruinous to the devil's kingdom. The substance of what the apostle asserts and argues here is, that, whatever pretences there were to inspiration or miracles among those who were enemies

xii. 12. As there was one spirit, so was there one body—the mystical body of Christ, composed of all those who were so variously gifted, their variety being necessary to the completion of the body. "So also is Christ:" including the Church. "In the view of the apostle, Christ is the archetype of a new and glorified humanity, as it is developed in the Church. Hence the development of the Christian Church is nothing less than the progressive development of the image of Christ" (Neander).

to Christianity, they could not be from the Spirit of God; but no man could believe this with his heart, or prove with a miracle that Jesus was Christ, but by the Holy Ghost. So that the extraordinary operations and powers amongst them did all proceed from the Spirit of God. He adds, Fourthly. These spiritual gifts, though proceeding from the same Spirit, are yet divers. They have one author and original, but are themselves of various kinds. A free cause may produce variety of effects; and the same giver may bestow various gifts; ver. 4. "There are diversity of gifts," such as revelations, tongues, prophecy, interpretations of tongues, "but the same Spirit." 1. There are differences of administrations, or different offices, and officers to discharge them; different ordinances and institutions, (see ver. 28—30), "but the same Lord," who appointed all; ver. 6. "There are diversity of operations," or miraculous powers, called ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων, ver. 10, as here ἐνεργήματα; but it is the same God which worketh all in all. There are various gifts, administrations, and operations, but all proceed from one God, one Lord, one Spirit; that is, from Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the spring and origin of all spiritual blessings and bequests. All issue from the same fountain; all have the same Author. However different they may be in themselves, in this they agree, all are from God. 2. Several of the kinds are here specified, ver. 8—10. Several persons had their several gifts, some one, some another, all from and by the same Spirit. "To one was given the word of wisdom;" that is, say some, a knowledge of the mysteries of the Gospel, and ability to explain them; an exact understanding of the design, nature, and doctrines of the Christian religion; say others, an uttering grave sentences, like Solomon's proverbs. Some confine this word of wisdom to the revelations made to and by the apostles. "To another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit;" that is, say some, the knowledge of mysteries, ch. ii. 13, wrapt up in the prophecies, types, and histories of the Old Testament: say others, a skill and readiness to give advice and counsel in perplexed cases. "To another faith by the same Spirit;" that is, the faith of miracles, or a faith in the Divine power and promise, whereby they were enabled to work miracles. Or, an extraordinary impulse from above, whereby they were enabled to trust God in any emergency, and go on in the way of their duty, and own and profess the truths of Christ, whatever were the difficulty or danger. "To another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit," namely, the sick, either by laying on hands, or anointing with oil, or with a bare word. "To another the working of miracles;" the efficacies of powers, ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων; such as raising the dead, restoring the blind to sight, giving speech to the dumb, and hearing to the deaf, and the use of limbs to the lame. "To another prophecy;" that is, ability to foretell future events, which is the more usual sense of prophecy; or to explain Scripture by a peculiar gift of the Spirit; see ch. xiv. 24. "To another the discerning of spirits;" power to distinguish between true and false prophets, or to discern the real and internal qualifications of any person for an office, or to discover the inward workings of the mind by the Holy Ghost, as Peter did those of Ananias, Acts v. 3. "To another divers kinds of tongues;" or ability to speak languages by inspiration. "To another the interpretation of tongues;" or ability to render foreign languages readily and properly into their own. With such variety of spiritual gifts were the first ministers and churches blessed.

Fifthly. The end for which these gifts were bestowed. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal" ver. 7. The Spirit was manifested by the exercise of these gifts. His influence and interest appeared in them. But they were not distributed for the mere honour or advantage of those that had them, but for the benefit of the church, to edify the body, and spread and advance the Gospel. Note, Whatever gifts God confers on any man, he confers them that he may do good with them, whether they be common or spiritual. The outward gifts of his bounty are to be improved for his glory, and employed in doing good to others. No man has them merely for himself. They are a trust put into his hands to profit withal; and the more he profits others with them the more abundantly will they turn to his account in the end, Phil. iv. 17. And spiritual gifts are bestowed that men may with them profit the church and promote Christianity. They are not given for show, but for service; not for pomp and ostentation, but for edification; not to magnify those that have them, but to edify others.

Sixthly. The measure and proportion in which they are given. "All these worketh one and the same Spirit, dividing to every man as he will." It is according to the sovereign pleasure of the donor. What more free than gift? And shall not the Spirit of God do what he will with his own? May he not give to what persons he pleases, and in what proportion he pleases? and one gift to one man, and another to another; to one more, and another fewer, as he thinks fit? Is he not the best judge how his own purposes shall be served, and his own donatives bestowed? It is not as men will, nor as they may think fit, but as the Spirit pleases. Note, The Holy Ghost is a Divine person. He works Divine effects, and he divides Divine gifts as he will, by his own power, and according to his own pleasure without dependence or control. But, though he distributes these gifts free and uncontrolled, they are intended by him, not for private honour and advantage, but for public benefit, for the edification of the body, the church.

12 For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. 13 For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. 14 For the body is not one member, but many. 15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? 17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? 18 But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. 19 And if they were all one member, where were the body? 20 But now are they many members, yet but one body. 21 And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. 22 Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: 23 And those members of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. 24 For our comely parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked: 25 That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. 26 And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

The apostle here makes out the truth of what was above asserted, and puts the gifted men among the Corinthians in mind of their duty, by comparing the church of Christ to a human body.

First. By telling us one body may have many members, and that the many members of the same body make but one body, ver. 12; and that the body is not one member only, but many; "so also is Christ;" that is, Christ mystical, as divines commonly speak. Christ and his church make one body, as head and members; this body is made up of many parts, or members, yet but one body. For all the members are baptized into the same body, and made to drink of the same Spirit, ver. 13. Jews and Gentiles, bond and free, are upon a level in this, — all are baptized into the same body, and communicate in the same Spirit. Christians become members of this body by baptism. They are baptized into one body. The outward rite is of Divine institution, significant of the new birth, called therefore "the washing of regeneration," Tit. iii. 5. But it is by the Spirit, by "the renewing of the Holy Ghost," that we are made members of Christ's body. It is the Spirit's operation, signified by the outward administration, that makes us members. [Not the outward administration, as many falsely maintain. Perhaps there may be no reference to any baptism but that of the Holy Spirit.] And by communion at the other ordinance are we sustained; but then it is not merely by drinking the wine, but by drinking into one Spirit. The outward administration is a means appointed of God for our participation in this great benefit. But it is baptism by the Spirit, it is internal renovation, and drinking into one Spirit, partaking of his sanctifying influences from time to time, that makes us true members of Christ's body, and maintains our union with him. Being animated by one Spirit makes Christians one body. Note, All who have the Spirit of Christ, without difference, are the members of Christ, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free, and none but such; and all the members of Christ make up one body; the members many, but the body one. They are one body because they have one principle of life. All are quickened and animated by the same Spirit.

Secondly. Each member has its particular form, place, and use. 1. The meanest member makes a part of the body. The foot and ear are less useful, perhaps, than the hand and eye; but because one is not a hand, and the other an eye, shall they say therefore they do not belong to the body? ver. 15, 16. So every member of the body mystical cannot have the same place and office; but what then? shall it hereupon disown relation to the body? Because it is not fixed in the same station, or favoured with the same gifts as others, shall it say, I do not belong to Christ? No, the meanest member of his body is as much a member as the noblest, and as truly regarded by him. All his members are dear to him. 2. There must be a distinction of members in the body. "Were the whole body eye, where were the hearing? were the whole ear, where were the smelling?" ver. 17. "If all were one member, where were the body?" ver. 19. "They are many members," and for that reason must have distinction among them, "and yet are but one body," ver. 20. One member of a body is not a body; this is made up of many, and among these many there must be a distinction, difference of situation, shape, use, &c. So it is in the body of Christ. Its members must have different uses, and therefore have different powers, and be in different places, some having one gift, and others a different one. Variety in the members of the body contributes to the beauty of it. What a monster would a body be that were all ear, or eye, or arm? So it is for the beauty and good appearance of the church that there should be diversity of gifts and offices in it. 3. The disposal of members to a natural body, and their situation, is as God pleases. "But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him," ver. 18. We may plainly perceive the Divine wisdom in the distribution of the members; but it was made according to the counsel of his will, he distinguished and distinguished them as he pleased. So it is also in the members of Christ's body. They are chosen out to such stations, and endued with such gifts as God pleases. He who is Sovereign Lord of all disposes his favours and gifts as he will. And who should gainsay his pleasure? What foundation is here for repining in ourselves, or envying others? We should be doing the duties of our own place, and not murmuring in ourselves, or quarrelling with others, that we are not in theirs. 4. All the members of the body are in some respect useful and necessary to each other. "The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee; nor the head to the feet, I have no need of you; nay, those members of the body which seem to be more feeble," namely, the bowels, &c., "are necessary," ver. 21, 22. God has so fitted and tempered them together that they are all necessary to one another, and to the whole body. There is no part redundant and unnecessary. Every member serves some good purpose or other. It is useful to its fellow-members, and necessary to the good state of the whole body. Nor is there a member of the body of Christ but may and ought to be useful to his fellow-members, and at some times, and in some cases, is needful to them. None should

xii. 14—21. Those dissatisfied with their gifts should not consider themselves as excluded from the body, but as forming a necessary part.

xii. 22—26. Those highly gifted should not fancy that they could do without those less gifted; the weaker as well as the stronger members were necessary.

xii. 27. "Members in particular:" i.e., severally, individually, each in his assigned place.

xii. 31. "Emulously desire the greatest gifts:" if men are not to be discontent with their gifts, neither are they to neglect cultivating or acquiring greater ones, if it lays in their power to do so. And yet, besides exhorting them to seek the greatest gifts, he intends to show them a very excellent way to obtain these—through love.

xiii. 1. "On each side this chapter the tumult of argument and remonstrance still rages, but within it all is calm. The sentences move in almost rhythmical melody, the imagery unfolds itself in despise and envy another, seeing God has made the distinction between them as he pleased, yet so as to keep them all in some degree of mutual dependence, and make them valuable to each other, and concerned for each other, because of their mutual usefulness. Those who excel in any one gift cannot say they have no need of them who in that gift are their inferiors, whilst perhaps in other gifts they exceed them. Nay, the lowest members all have their use, and the highest cannot do well without them. "The eye hath need of the hand, and the head of the feet." 5. Such is the man's concern for his whole body, "that on the less honourable members more abundant honour is bestowed, and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness." Those parts which are not fit, like the rest, to be exposed to view, that are either deformed, or shameful, we most carefully clothe and cover; whereas the comely parts have no such need. The wisdom of Providence hath so contrived and tempered things that the more abundant regard and honour should be paid to that which most wanted it, ver. 24. So should the members of Christ's body carry it towards their fellow-members. Instead of despising them, or reproaching them for their infirmities, they should endeavour to cover and conceal them, and put the best face upon them that they can. 6. Divine wisdom has contrived and ordered things in this manner that the members of the body should not be schismatics, divided from each other, and acting upon separate interests, but well affected to each other; tenderly concerned for each other, having a fellow-feeling of each other's griefs, and a communion in each other's pleasures and joys, ver. 25, 26. God has tempered the members of the body natural in the manner mentioned, that "there might be no schism in the body," ver. 25, no rupture or disunion among the members, nor so much as the least mutual disregard. This should be avoided also in the spiritual body of Christ. There should be no schism in this body; but the members should be closely united by the strongest bonds of love. All decays of this affection are the seeds of schism. Where Christians grow cold towards each other they will be careless and unconcerned for each other. And this mutual disregard is a schism begun. The members of the natural body are made to have a care and concern for each other, to prevent a schism in it. So should it be in Christ's body; the members should sympathize with each other. As in the natural body the pain of the one part affects the whole, the ease and pleasure of one part affects the whole, so should Christians reckon themselves honoured in the honours of their fellow-Christians, and should suffer in their sufferings. Note, Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty. We should be so far from slighting our brethren's sufferings, that we should suffer with them; so far from envying their honours, that we should rejoice in them, and reckon ourselves honoured by them.

27 Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. 28 And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues. 29 Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles? 30 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? 31 But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

First. Here the apostle sums up the argument, and applies this similitude to the church of Christ. Concerning which, observe, 1. The relation wherein Christians stand to Christ and one another. The church, or whole collective body of Christians in all ages, is his body. Every Christian is a member of this body, and every other Christian stands related to him as a fellow-member; ver. 27. "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular," or particular members. Each is a member of the body, not the whole body; each stands related to the body as a part of it, and all have a common relation to one another, dependence upon one another, and should have a mutual care and concern. Thus are the members of the natural body, thus should the members of the mystical body, be disposed. Note, That mutual indifference, and much more contempt, and hatred, and envy, and strife, are very unnatural in Christians. It is like the members of the same body being destitute of all concern for one another, or quarrelling with each other. This is the apostle's scope in this argument. He endeavours in it to suppress the proud, and vaunting, and contentious spirit that had prevailed among the Corinthians, by reason of their spiritual gifts. 2. The variety of offices instituted by Christ, and gifts or favours dispensed by him; ver. 28. "God hath set some in the church, first apostles," the chief ministers intrusted with all the powers necessary to found a church, and make an entire revelation of God's will. "Secondarily prophets," or persons enabled by inspiration to prophesy, or interpret Scripture, or write by inspiration, as the evangelists did. "Thirdly teachers," those "who labour in the word and doctrine," whether with pastoral charge or without it. "After that miracles," or miracle workers. "Then gifts of healing," or those who had power to heal diseases. "Helps," or such as had compassion on the sick and weak, and ministered to them. "Governments," or such as had the disposal of the charitable contributions of the church, and dealt them out to the poor. "Diversities of tongues," or such as could speak divers languages. Concerning all which, observe,

1st. The plentiful variety of these gifts and offices. What a multitude are they. A good God was free in his communications to the primitive church. He was no niggard of his benefits and favours. No, he provided richly for them. They had no want, but a store; all that was necessary, and even more, what was convenient for them too. 2nd. Observe the order of these offices and gifts. They are here placed in their proper ranks. Those of most value have the first place. Apostles, prophets, and teachers, were all intended to instruct the people, to inform them well in the things of God, and promote their spiritual edification. Without them neither evangelical knowledge nor holiness could have been promoted. But the rest, however fitted to answer the great intentions of Christianity, had no such immediate regard to religion strictly so called. Note, God doth, and we should, value things according to their real worth; and the use of things is the best criterion of their real worth. Those are most valuable that best answer the highest purposes. Such were apostolical powers, compared with theirs, who had only the gift of healing and miracles. What holds the last and lowest rank in this enumeration is diversity of tongues. It is by itself the most useless and insignificant of all these gifts. To heal diseases, relieve the poor, help the sick, have their use; but how vain a thing is it to speak languages, if a man does it merely to amuse, or boast himself? This may indeed raise the admiration, but cannot promote the edification, of the hearers, nor do they any good. And yet it is manifest, from ch. 14, that the Corinthians valued themselves exceedingly on this gift. Note, How proper a method it is to beat down pride, to let persons know the true value of what they pride themselves in. It is but too common a thing for men to value themselves most on what is least worth; and it is of great use to bring them to a sober mind, by letting them know how much they are mistaken. 3rd. The several distribution of these gifts, not all to one, nor to every one alike. All members and officers had not the same rank in the church, nor the same endowments; ver. 29, 30. "Are all apostles? are all prophets?" &c. This was to make the church a monster, all one as if the body were all ear or all eye. Some are fit for one office and employment, and some for another; and the Spirit distributes to every one as he will. We must be content with our own rank and share if it be lower and less than that of others. We must not be conceited of ourselves, and despise others if we are in higher rank, and have greater gifts. Every member of the body is to preserve its own rank, and do its own office; and all are to minister to one another, and promote the good of the body in general, without envying, or despising, or neglecting, or ill-using any one particular member. How blessed a constitution were the Christian church if all the members did their duty!

Secondly. He closes this chapter with an advice, as the generality read it, and a hint. 1. An advice to covet the best gifts, χρησισματα τα κρειττονα, dona potiora, praestantiora, either the most valuable in themselves or the most serviceable to others; and these are in truth most valuable in themselves, though men may be apt to esteem those most that will raise their fame and esteem highest. Those are truly best by which God will be most honoured and his church edified. Such gifts should be most earnestly coveted. Note, We should desire that most which is best and most worth. Grace is therefore to be preferred before gifts, and of gifts those are to be preferred which are of greatest use. But some read this passage, not as an advice, but a charge, ἐνλοῦτε; Ye are envious at each other's gifts. The same word is thus translated, ch. xiii. 4, "You quarrel and contend about them." This they certainly did; and this behaviour the apostle here reprehends and labours to rectify. "Only of pride cometh contention." These contests in the church of Corinth sprung from this original. It was a quarrel about precedence, (as most quarrels among Christians are, with whatever pretences they are gilded over;) and it is no wonder that a quarrel for precedence should extinguish charity. When all would stand in the first rank no wonder if they jostle, or throw down, or thrust back their brethren. Gifts may be valued for their use, but they are made mischievous when made the fuel of pride and contention. This therefore the apostle endeavours to prevent. 2. By giving them the hint of "a more excellent way," namely, of charity, of mutual love and good-will. This was the only right way to quiet and cement them, and make their gifts turn to the advantage and edification of the church. This would render them kind to each other, and concerned for each other, and therefore calm their spirits and put an end to their little piques and contests, their disputes about precedence. They would appear to be in the foremost rank, according to the apostle, who had most of true Christian love. Note, True charity is greatly to be preferred to the most glorious gifts. To have the heart glow with mutual love is vastly better than to glare with the most pompous titles, offices, or powers.

CHAPTER XIII.

In this chapter the apostle goes on to shew more particularly what that more excellent way was of which he had just before been speaking. He. 1. Recommends it by shewing the necessity and importance of it, ver. 1—3. II. By giving a description of its properties and fruits, ver. 4—7. III. By shewing how much it excels the best of gifts and other graces, by its continuance, when they shall be no longer in being or of any use, ver. 8—13.

THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. 2 And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. 3 And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

Here the apostle shews what more excellent way he meant, or had in view, in the close of the former chapter; namely, charity, or, as it is commonly elsewhere rendered, love, ἀγάπη. Not what is meant by charity in our common use of the word, which most men understand of almsgiving, but love in its fullest and most extensive meaning: true love to God [to God as a reconciled God in Jesus Christ, which implies saving faith, the work of the Spirit—this exists only in converted souls] and man; a benevolent disposition of mind towards our fellow-Christians, growing out of sincere and fervent devotion to God. This living principle of all duty and obedience is the more excellent way of which the apostle speaks; preferable to all gifts. Nay, without this the most glorious gifts are nothing; of no account to us, of no esteem in the sight of God. He instances,

First. In the gift of tongues. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal," ver. 1. Could a man speak all the languages on earth, and that with the greatest propriety, elegance, or fluency, could he talk like an angel, and yet be without charity, it would be all empty noise, mere inharmonious and useless sound, that would neither profit nor delight. It is not talking freely, nor finely, nor learnedly, of the things of God that will save ourselves or profit others, if we are destitute of holy love. It is the charitable heart, not the voluble tongue, that is acceptable with God. The apostle instances first in this gift almost dramatic propriety, the language arranges itself with almost rhetorical accuracy. We can imagine how the apostle's amanuensis must have paused to look up in his master's face at the sudden change of his style of dictation, and seen his countenance lighted up as it had been the face of an angel, as the sublime vision of divine perfection passed before him" (Stanley). "And of angels:" not to be pressed too closely. It is added to make the general statement stronger, not as expressing anything definite concerning the tongues or languages of angels. "Sounding brass:" no particular instrument is meant, but brass of any kind struck and making a sound. "The man who speaks with never so many tongues, and is at the same time devoid of love, becomes but the organ of a foreign impulse, without independent worth" (Meyer). "Tinkling:" rather, "clanging."

because hereupon the Corinthians seemed chiefly to value themselves and despise their brethren.

Secondly. In prophecy, and the understanding of mysteries, and all knowledge. This without charity is as nothing, ver. 2. Had a man never so clear an understanding of the prophecies and types under the old dispensation, never so accurate a knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity, nay, and this by inspiration from the infallible dictates and illumination of the Spirit of God, without charity he would be nothing. All this would stand him in no stead. Note, A clear and deep head is of no signification without a benevolent and charitable [a renewed] heart. It is not great knowledge that God sets a value upon, but true and hearty devotion and love [as here understood].

Thirdly. In miraculous faith, the faith of miracles, or the faith by which persons were enabled to work miracles. "Had I all faith," (the utmost degree of this kind of faith,) "that I could remove mountains," (or say to them, Go hence into the midst of the sea, and have my command obeyed, Mar. xi. 23), "and had no charity, I am nothing" [of no account]. The most wonder-working faith, to which nothing is in a manner impossible, is itself nothing without charity. Moving mountains is a great achievement in the account of men, [it is merely a proverbial phrase used for overcoming great difficulties:] but one drachm of charity is in God's account of much greater worth than all the faith of this sort in the world. They may do many wondrous works in Christ's name whom yet he will disown, and bid depart from him as workers of iniquity, Mat. vii. 22. Saving faith is ever in conjunction with charity, but the faith of miracles may be without it.

Fourthly. He instances in the outward acts of charity; "Bestowing his goods to feed the poor," ver. 3. Should all a man hath be laid out in this manner, if he had no charity it would profit nothing. There may be an open and lavish hand where there is no liberal and charitable heart. The external act of giving alms may proceed from a very ill principle. Vainglorious ostentation, or a proud conceit of merit, may put a man to large expense this way who has no true love to God or men. Our doing good to others will do none to us, if it be not well done, namely, from a principle of devotion and charity, love to God and good-will to men. Note, If we leave charity out of religion, the most costly services will be of no avail to us. If we give away all we have, whilst we withhold the heart from God, it will not profit.

Fifthly. He instances even in sufferings, and those of the most grievous kind. "If we give our body to be burnt, without charity it profiteth nothing," ver. 3. Should we sacrifice our lives for the sake of the Gospel, and be burnt to death in maintenance of its truth, this will stand us in no stead without charity, unless we are animated to these sufferings by a principle of true devotion to God, and sincere love to his church and people, and good-will to mankind. The outward carriage may be plausible when the invisible principle is very bad. Some men have thrown themselves into the fire to procure a name and reputation amongst men. It is possible that the very same principle may have worked up some to resolution enough to die for their religion who never heartily believed and embraced it. But vindicating our religion at the cost of our lives will profit nothing if we feel not the power of it; and true charity is the very heart and spirit of religion. If we feel none of its sacred heat in our hearts it will profit nothing though we be burnt to ashes for the truth. Note, The most grievous sufferings, the most costly sacrifices, will not recommend us to God if we do not love the brethren; should we give our own bodies to be burned it would not profit us. How strange a way of recommending themselves to God are they got into who hope to do it by burning others, by murdering and massacring, and tormenting their fellow-Christians, or by any injurious usage of them! "My soul enter not thou into their secrets." If I cannot hope to recommend myself to God, by giving my own body to be burnt whilst I have no charity, I will never hope to do it by burning or maltreating others, in open defiance to all charity.

4 Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, 5 Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; 6 Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; 7 Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

The apostle gives us in these verses some of the properties and effects of charity, both to describe and commend it; that we may know whether we have this grace, and that if we have not we may fall in love with what is so exceeding amiable, and rest not till we have obtained it. It is an excellent grace, and has a world of good properties belonging to it. As,

First. It is long-suffering; μακροθυμεί. It can endure evil, and injury, and provocation, without being filled with resentment, indignation, or revenge. It makes the mind firm, gives it power over the angry passions, and furnishes it with a persevering patience, that shall rather wish and wait for the reformation of a brother than fly out in resentment of his carriage. It will put up with many slights and neglects from the person it loves, and wait long to see the kindly effects of such patience on him.

Secondly. It is kind; χρηστεύεται. It is benign, bountiful. It is courteous and obliging. "The law of kindness is in her lips." Her heart is large and her hand open. She is apt to shew favour and to do good. She seeks to be useful, and not only seizes on opportunities of doing good, but searches for them. This is her general character. She is patient under injuries, and apt and inclined to do all good offices in her power. And under these two generals all the particulars of the character may be reduced.

Thirdly. Charity suppresses envy. "It envieth not." It is not grieved at the good of others. Neither at their gifts, nor good qualities, nor honours, nor estates. If we love our neighbour we shall be so far from envying his welfare, or being displeased with it, that we shall share in it, and rejoice at it. His bliss and satisfaction will be an addition to ours, instead of impairing or lessening it. This is the proper effect of kindness and benevolence. Envy is the effect of ill-will. The prosperity of those to whom we wish well can never grieve us; and the mind which is bent on doing good to all can never wish ill to any.

Fourthly. Charity subdues pride and vainglory. "It vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up;" is not bloated with self-conceit, does not swell upon its acquisitions, not arrogate to itself that honour or power, or respect, which doth not belong to it. It is not insolent, apt to despise others, or trample on them, or treat them with contempt and scorn. They that are animated with a principle of true brotherly love will "in honour prefer one another," Rom. xii. 10. They will "do nothing out of" a spirit of contention, or "vainglory, but in lowliness of mind will esteem others better than themselves," Phil. ii. 3. True love will give us an esteem of our brethren, raise our value for them; and this will limit our esteem of ourselves, and prevent the tumours of self-conceit and arrogance. These ill qualities can never grow out of tender affection for the brethren, or a diffusive benevolence. The word rendered in our translation, vaunteth itself, bears other significations, nor is the proper meaning, as I can find, settled, but in every sense and meaning true charity stands in opposition to it. The Syriac renders it, non tumultuatur,—it does not raise tumults and disturbances. Charity calms the angry passions instead of raising them. Others render it, non perperam et perverse agit,—it does not act insidiously with any, seek to ensnare them, nor tease them with needless importunities and addresses. It is not forward, nor stubborn, nor untractable, nor apt to be cross and contradictory. Some understand it of dissembling and flattery, when a fair face is put on, and fine words said without any regard to truth or intention of good. Charity abhors such falsehood and flattery. Nothing is commonly more pernicious, nor apt to cross the purposes of true love and good-will.

Fifthly. Charity is careful not to pass the bounds of decency; οὐκ ἀσχημονεί. "It becometh not unseemly." It acts nothing indecorous, nothing that in the common account of men is [justly] base or vile. It does nothing out of place or time, but carries it towards all men as becomes their rank and ours; with reverence and respect to superiors, with kindness and condescension to inferiors, with courtesy and good-will towards all men. It is not for breaking order, confounding ranks, bringing all men on a level; but for keeping up the distinction God has made between men, and acting decently in its own station, and minding its own business, without taking upon it to mend, or censure, [except on Christian principle,] or despise the conduct of others. Charity would do nothing that misbecomes it.

Sixthly. Charity is an utter enemy to selfishness. "Seeketh not her own." Doth not inordinately desire, or seek its own praise, or honour, or profit, or pleasure. Indeed, self-love in some degree is natural to all men, enters into their very constitution; and a reasonable love of self is, by our Saviour, made the measure of our love to others, that charity which is here described: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." The apostle doth not mean that charity destroys all regard to self. He does not mean that the charitable man should never challenge what is his own, but utterly neglect himself and all his interests. Charity must then root up that principle which is wrought into our very nature. But charity never seeks its own to the hurt of others, or with the neglect of others. It many times neglects its own for the sake of others, prefers their welfare and satisfaction, and advantage, to its own. And it ever prefers the weal of the public, of the community, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to its private advantage. It would not advance, or aggrandize, or enrich, or gratify itself at the cost and damage of the public.

Seventhly. It tempers and restrains the passions. Οὐ παροξύνεται, is not exasperated. It corrects a sharpness of temper, sweetens and softens the mind, so that it doth not suddenly conceive, nor long continue, a vehement passion. Where the fire of love is kept in, the flames of wrath will not easily kindle, nor long keep burning. Charity will never be angry without a cause, and will endeavour to confine the passion within proper limits, that it do not exceed the measure that is just, either in degree or duration. Anger cannot rest in the bosom where love reigns. It is hard to be angry with those we love, but very easy to drop our resentments, and be reconciled.

Eighthly. Charity "thinks no evil;" it cherishes no malice, nor gives way to revenge,—so some understand it. It is not soon nor long angry, but it is never mischievous nor inclined to revenge. It does not suspect evil of others, οὐ λογίζεται τὸ κακόν, it doth not reason out evil, charge guilt upon them by inference and innuendo, when nothing of this sort appears open. True love is not apt to be jealous and suspicious; it will hide appearing faults, and draw a veil over them, instead of hunting and raking out those that lie covered and concealed. It will never indulge suspicions without proofs, but rather incline to darken and disbelieve evidence against the person it affects. It will difficultly give in to an ill opinion of another, and do it with regret and reluctance when the evidence cannot be resisted; and then to be sure will never be forward to suspect ill, and reason itself into a bad opinion upon mere appearances, or give way to suspicion without any. It will not make the worst construction of things, but put the best face that it can on circumstances that have no good appearance.

Ninthly. The matter of its joy and pleasure is here suggested. 1. Negatively. "It rejoiceth not in iniquity;" it takes no pleasure in doing injury or hurt to any; it thinketh not evil of any without very clear proof; it wishes ill to none, much less will it hurt or wrong any, and least of all make this the matter of its delight, rejoice in doing harm and mischief. Nor will it rejoice at the faults and failings of others, and triumph over them, either out of pride or ill-will, because it will set off its own excellences, or gratify its spite. The sins of others are rather the grief of a charitable spirit than its sport or delight. They will touch it to the quick, and stir all its compassion, but can give it no entertainment. It is the very height of malice to take pleasure in the misery of a fellow-creature. And is not falling into sin the greatest calamity that can befall one? How inconsistent is this with Christian charity, to rejoice at such fall! 2. Affirmatively. "It rejoiceth in the truth," is glad of the success of the Gospel, commonly called the truth, by way of emphasis, in the New Testament; and rejoices to see men moulded into an evangelical temper by it, and made good. It takes no pleasure in their sins, but is highly delighted to see them do well, to approve themselves men of [Christian] probity and integrity. It gives it much satisfaction to see truth and justice prevail amongst men, innocence cleared, and mutual faith and trust established, and to see piety and true religion flourish.

Tenthly. "It beareth all things, it endureth all things," πάντα στέγει, πάντα υπομένει. Some read the first, 'covers all things;' so the original also signifies. "Charity will cover a multitude of sins," 1 Pet. iv. 8; it will draw a veil over them as far as it can in consistence with duty. It is not for blazing and publishing the faults of a brother, till duty manifestly demands it; necessity only can extort this from the charitable mind. Though such a man may be free [nay, constrained] to tell his brother his faults in private, he is very unwilling to expose him by making them public. Thus we do by our own faults, and thus charity would teach us to do by the faults of others, not publish them to their shame and reproach, but cover them from public notice as long as we can, and be faithful to God and to others. Or, it "beareth all things," will pass by and put up with injuries without indulging anger, or cherishing revenge; will be patient upon provocation, and long patient, πάντα υπομένει; holds firm, though it be much shocked, and borne hard upon. Sustains all manner of injury and ill usage, and bears up under it, such as curses, contumacies, slanders, prison, exile, bonds, torments, and death itself, for the sake of the injurious, and of others; and perseveres in this firmness. Note, What a fortitude and firmness fervent love [the love of souls] will give the mind. What cannot a lover endure from the beloved, and for his sake! How many slights and injuries will he put up with, how many hazards will he run, and how many difficulties encounter!

Eleventhly. Charity believes and hopes well of others; "Believeth all things, hopeth all things." Indeed, charity doth by no means destroy prudence, and, out of mere simplicity and silliness, believe every word, Pr. xiv. 17. Wisdom xiii. 4. "Suffereth long;" negative, withholding anger. "Is kind;" positive side, exercising kindness. "Vaunteth not itself;" does not make a display. "Puffed up;" applicable to the Corinthians (chap. iv. 6, viii. 1).

xiii. 5. "Thinketh no evil;" "imputeth not the evil." So far from devising evil, love takes a charitable view of others' faults.

xiii. 6. "Rejoiceth in the truth;" rather, "rejoiceth with the truth;" takes delight in the triumphs of truth.

xiii. 7. "Beareth;" used of water-tight vessels; hence, to conceal. "Endures without divulging its personal distress."

xiii. 8. "Never faileth;" endures for ever.

xiii. 9, 10. "Our knowledge and our prophesying (utterance of Divine things) are but partial, embracing but a part; but when that which is perfect (entire, universal) shall have come, this partial shall be abolished, superseded" (Alford).

xiii. 12. "Through a glass;" i.e., in a mirror; the reflected may dwell with love, and charity be cautious; but it is apt to believe well of all, to entertain a good opinion of them when there is no appearance to the contrary; nay, to believe well when there may be some dark appearances, if the evidence of ill be not clear. All charity is full of candour, apt to make the best of every thing, and put on it the best face and appearance. It will judge well, and believe well, as far as it can with any reason; and rather stretch its faith beyond appearances for the support of a kind opinion. But it will go into a bad one with the utmost reluctance, and fence against it as much as it fairly and honestly can. And when in spite of inclination it cannot believe well of others, it will yet hope well, and continue to hope as long as there is any ground for it. It will not presently conclude a case desperate, but wishes [and prays] the amendment [conversion] of the worst of men, and is very apt to hope for what it wishes. How well-natured and amiable a thing is Christian charity. How lovely a mind is that which is tinctured throughout with such benevolence as it diffuses over its whole frame. Happy the man who has this heavenly fire glowing in his heart, flowing out of his mouth, and diffusing its warmth over all with whom he has to do. How lovely a thing would Christianity appear to the world, if those that profess it were more actuated and animated by this Divine principle, and paid a due regard to a command on which its blessed Author laid a chief stress, "A new commandment give I to you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another," 1 Jno. xiii. 34; "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples," ver. 35. Blessed Jesus, how few of thy professed disciples are to be distinguished and marked out by this characteristic!

8 Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. 9 For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. 10 But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. 11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. 12 For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. 13 And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

Here the apostle goes on to commend charity, and shew how much it is preferable to the gifts on which the Corinthians were so apt to pride themselves, to the utter neglect, and almost extinction, of charity. This he makes out.

First. From its longer continuance and duration. "Charity never faileth;" it is a permanent and perpetual grace, lasting as eternity; whereas the extraordinary gifts, on which the Corinthians valued themselves, were of a short continuance. They were only to edify the church on earth, and that but for a time, not during its whole continuance in this world, but in heaven would be all superseded, which yet is the very seat and element of love. "Prophecy must fail," that is, either the prediction of things to come, which is its most common sense, or the interpretation of Scripture by immediate inspiration. "Tongues shall cease," that is, the miraculous power of speaking languages without learning them. There will be but one language in heaven. There is no confusion of tongues in the region of perfect tranquillity. And "Knowledge will vanish away;" not that in the perfect state above holy and happy souls shall be unknowing, ignorant. It is a very poor happiness that can consist with utter ignorance. The apostle is plainly speaking of miraculous gifts, and therefore of knowledge to be had out of the common way, (see ch. xiv. 6); a knowledge of mysteries supernaturally communicated. Such knowledge was to vanish away, [because all mysteries would then be made plain.] Some indeed understand it of common knowledge acquired by instruction, taught and learnt. This way of knowing is to vanish away, though the knowledge itself, once acquired, will not be lost. But it is plain the apostle is here setting the grace of charity in opposition to supernatural gifts; and it is more valuable because more durable. It shall last when they shall be no more; it shall enter into heaven, where they will have no place, because they will be of no use; though in a sense even our common knowledge may be said to cease in heaven, by reason of the improvement that will then be made in it. The light of a candle is perfectly obscured by the sun shining in its strength.

Secondly. He hints that these gifts are only adapted to a state of imperfection. "We know in part, and we prophesy in part," ver. 9. Our best knowledge, and our greatest abilities, are at present like our condition, narrow, and temporary. Even the knowledge they had by inspiration was but in part. How little a portion of God, and the unseen world, was heard even by apostles and inspired men! How much short do others come of them! But these gifts were fitted to the present imperfect state of the church, valuable in themselves, but not to be compared with charity, because they were to vanish with the imperfections of the church, nay, and long before, whereas charity was to last [and grow] for ever.

Thirdly. He takes occasion from hence to shew how much better it will be with the church hereafter than it can be here. A state of perfection is in view; ver. 10, "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." When the end is once attained, the means will of course be abolished. There will be no need of tongues, and prophecy, and inspired knowledge, in a future life, because then the church will be in a state of perfection, complete both in knowledge and holiness. God will be known then clearly, and in a manner by intuition, and as perfectly as the glorified mind's capacity will allow, not by such transient glimpses, and little portions, as here. The difference between the two states is here pointed out in two particulars, 1. The present state is a state of childhood, the future that of manhood. "When I was a child I spake as a child," that is, as some think, spake with tongues, "I understood as a child," επονοουν, sapiebam, that is, I prophesied, I was taught the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, in such an extraordinary way, as manifested I was not got out of my childish state, "I thought," or reasoned, ἐλογίζετο, "as a child; but when I became a man I put away childish things." Such is the difference between earth and heaven. What narrow views, what confused and indistinct notions of things, have children in comparison of grown men! And how naturally do men, when reason is ripened and matured, despise and evacuate their infant thoughts, put them away, reject them,—esteem them as nothing. Thus shall we think of our most valued gifts and acquisitions in this world, when we come to heaven. We shall despise our childish folly, in priding ourselves on such things, when we are grown up to men in Christ. 2. Things are all dark and confused now, in comparison of what they will be hereafter. "Now we see through a glass darkly," (εἰς ἀινικια,—"in a riddle,") "then face to face; now we know in part, but then we shall know as we are known." Now we can only discern things at a great distance as through a telescope, and that involved in clouds and obscurity, [obscurely, as by means of those imperfect mirrors which were placed by the ancients in their windows;] but hereafter the things to be known will be near and obvious, open to our eyes; and our knowledge will be free from all obscurity and error. God is to be seen face to face, and we are to know him as we are known by him; not indeed as perfectly, but in some sense in the same manner. We are known to him by mere inspection; he turns his eye towards us, and sees and searches us throughout. We shall then fix our eye on him, and see him as he is, 1 Jno. iii. 2; we shall know how we are known, enter into all the mysteries of Divine love and grace. O glorious change! to pass from darkness to light, from clouds to the clear sunshine of our Saviour's face, and in God's own light to see light! Ps. xxxvi. 9. Note, It is the light of heaven only that will remove all clouds and darkness from the face of God. It is at best but twilight whilst we are in this world; there it will be perfect and eternal day.

Fourthly. To sum up the excellences of charity, he prefers it not only to gifts, but to other graces, to faith and hope; ver. 13, "And now abideth faith, hope, and charity; but the greatest of these is charity." [They abide even in this world when extraordinary spiritual gifts shall have ceased.] True grace is much more excellent than any spiritual gifts whatever; and faith, hope, and love are the three principal graces, of which charity is the chief, being the end to which the other two are but means. This is the Divine nature, the soul's felicity, or its complacental rest in God, and holy delight in all his saints; and it is its everlasting work when faith and hope shall be no more. Faith fixes on the Divine revelation, [accepting, receiving, and resting upon Christ alone for justification, sanctification, and eternal life, by virtue of the covenant of grace,] and assents to that. Hope fastens on future felicity, and waits for that; and in heaven faith will be swallowed up of vision, and hope of fruition. There is no room to believe and hope [as on earth at least] when we see and enjoy. But love fastens on the Divine perfections themselves, and the Divine image on the creatures, and our mutual relation to both God and them. These will all shine forth in the most glorious splendours in another world; and there will love be made perfect. There we shall perfectly love God, because he will appear perfectly amiable for ever, and our hearts will kindle at the sight, and glow with perpetual devotion. And there shall we perfectly love one another, when all the saints meet there, when none but saints are there, and saints made perfect. O blessed state! how much surpassing the best below. O amiable and excellent grace of charity! how much doth it exceed the most valuable gifts, when it outshines every grace, and is the everlasting consummation of them! When faith and hope are at an end true charity will burn for ever with the brightest flame. Note, They border most upon the heavenly state and perfection whose hearts are fullest of this Divine principle, and burn with the most fervent charity. It is the surest offspring of God, and bears his fairest impression; for God is love, 1 Jno. iv. 8, 16. And where God is to be seen as he is, and face to face, there charity is in its greatest height, there, and there only, will it be perfected.

[There seems to be a progression, an ascent by successive stages from a lower to a higher discipline, in the moral education and moral history of our species—whether we comprehend or not the various footsteps of it—as when the spirit of bondage gives way to the Spirit of adoption, or the oldness of the letter to the newness of the Spirit; or as when the terrors of the law are succeeded by a delight in the law; or as when the commandment, formerly graven on tables of stone, comes to be graven on the fleshly tables of the heart; or as when the law fulfils but the office of a preparatory schoolmaster for bringing men to Christ, or guiding them onward to the higher lessons of the Gospel; or, finally, as when the supremacy of law makes place for the supremacy of love, even of the charity which never faileth, but abideth and reigneth everlastingly in heaven, after that the means and the preparatives for this great consummation have all vanished away.—Lectures on Romans xiii. 10, by Dr. Chalmers.]

CHAPTER XIV.

In this chapter the apostle directs them about the use of their spiritual gifts, preferring those most that are best, and fitted to do the greatest good. I. He begins with advising them of all spiritual gifts to prefer prophesying, and shews this is much better than speaking with tongues, ver. 1–6. II. He goes on to shew them how unprofitable the speaking foreign languages was, and useless to the church; it is like piping in our tone, like sounding a trumpet without any certain note, like talking gibberish, whereas gifts should be used for the good of the church, ver. 6–15. III. He advises that worship should be celebrated so as the most ignorant might understand and join in prayer and praise, and presses the advice by his own example, ver. 15–21. IV. He informs them that tongues were a sign for unbelievers rather than those that believe; and represents the advantage of prophecy above speaking with tongues, from the different suggestions they would give to the mind of an unbeliever coming into their assemblies, ver. 21–26. V. Blames them for the disorder and confusion they had brought into the assembly by their vanity and ostentation of their gifts; directs them in using their gifts both of tongues and prophecy, ver. 26–34. VI. Forbids women speaking in the church, and closes this subject by requiring them to perform every thing in the public worship with order and decency, ver. 34–40.

FOLLOW after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy. 2 For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man understandeth him; howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries. 3 But he that pro-object appearing as if seen through the mirror. Ancient mirrors were of polished metal.

xiii. 13. There is an emphasis on "abideth." "Now" does not signify "in this present time," but forms an inference from what precedes. "Since these gifts just mentioned will all pass away, there abide permanently only these three." Love contains in itself the root of the other two.

xiv. 1. St. Paul returns from the digression in chap. xiii. to the subject he had in hand—the use of spiritual gifts. "Pursue love (as your chief aim); meantime, however (as a secondary aim), strive for spiritual gifts; but more (more for this than for others) that ye may prophesy." Upon the subject of the gift of prophecy Conybeare and Howson remark, "In the scriptural sense of the term, a prophet does not mean a foreteller of future events, but a revealer of God's will to man; though the latter sense may (and sometimes does) include the former. So the gift of prophecy was that phesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort. 4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church. 5 I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

The apostle, in the foregoing chapter, had himself preferred, and advised the Corinthians to prefer, Christian charity to all spiritual gifts. Here he teaches them, among spiritual gifts, which they should prefer, and by what rules they should make comparison. He begins the chapter.

First. With an exhortation to charity; ver. 1, "Follow after charity," pursue it. The original διώκετε, when spoken of a thing, signifies a singular concern to obtain it; and is commonly taken in a good and laudable sense. It is an exhortation to obtain charity, to get this excellent disposition of mind upon any terms, whatever pains or prayers it may cost; as if he had said, In whatever you fail, see you do not miss of this. The principal of all graces is worth your getting at any rate.

Secondly. He directs them which spiritual gift to prefer, from a principle of charity. "Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that you may prophesy," or chiefly that you may prophesy. Whilst they were in close pursuit of charity, and made this Christian disposition their chief scope, they might be zealous for spiritual gifts, be ambitious of them in some measure, but especially of prophesying, that is, of interpreting Scripture. This preference would most plainly discover that they were indeed upon such pursuit, that they had a due value for Christian charity, and were intent upon it. Note, Gifts are fit objects of our desire and pursuit, in subordination to grace and charity. That should be sought first, and with greatest earnestness, which is most worth.

Thirdly. He assigns the reasons of this preference. And it is remarkable here that he only compares prophesying with speaking with tongues. It seems this was the gift on which the Corinthians principally valued themselves. This was more ostentatious than the plain interpretation of Scripture; more fit to gratify pride, or do good to the souls of men; for, 1. He that spake with tongues must wholly speak between God and himself; whatever mysteries might be communicated in his language, none of his own countrymen could understand them, because they did not understand the language, ver. 2. Note, What cannot be understood can never edify. No advantage can be reaped from the most excellent discourses, if delivered in unintelligible language, such as the audience can neither speak or understand. But he that prophesies speaks to the advantage of his hearers; they may profit by his gift. Interpretation of Scripture will be for their edification. They may be exhorted and comforted by it, ver. 3; and, indeed, these two must go together. Duty is the proper way to comfort; and they that would be comforted must bear being exhorted. 2. He that speaks with tongues may edify himself, ver. 4. He may understand and be affected with what he speaks; and so every minister should. And he that is most edified himself is in the best disposition and fitness to do good to others by what he speaks; but he that speaks with tongues, or language unknown, can only edify himself; others can reap no benefit from his speech. Whereas the end of speaking in the church is to edify the church, ver. 4, to which prophesying, or interpreting Scripture by inspiration, or otherwise, is immediately adapted. Note, That is the best and most eligible gift which best answers the purposes of charity, and does most good; most that which can edify ourselves only, but that which will edify the church. Such is prophesying, or preaching, and interpreting Scripture, compared with speaking in an unknown tongue.

Indeed, no gift is to be despised, but the best are to be preferred. "I could wish," saith the apostle, "that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied," ver. 5. Every gift of God is a favour from God, and may be improved for his glory, and as such is to be valued and thankfully received; but then those are to be most valued that are most useful. "Greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaks with tongues, unless he interpret, that the church may receive edifying," ver. 5. Benevolence makes a man truly great. "It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and it is true [Christian] magnanimity to study and seek to be useful to others rather than to raise their admiration, and draw their esteem. Such a man has a large soul, copious and diffused in proportion to his benevolence and bent of mind for public good. Greater is he that interprets Scripture to edify the church than he that speaks tongues to recommend himself; and what other end he that speaks with tongues could have, unless he interpreted what he spake, is not easy to see. Note, That makes most for the honour of a minister [whose sole honour is from Christ, in honouring his works,] that is most for the church's edification, not what shews his gifts to most advantage. He acts in a narrow sphere whilst he aims at himself, but his spirit and character increase in proportion to his usefulness; I mean his own intention and endeavours to be useful.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine? 7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or which enabled its possessor to utter Divine strains of warning, exhortation, encouragement, or rebuke; and to teach and enforce the truths of Christianity with supernatural energy and effect. St. Paul describes the marvellous effect of the inspired address thus spoken (verse 25)."

xiv. 8. "Uncertain:" i.e., as to meaning; for a particular succession of notes then, as now, gave the signal for attack or retreat, and various evolutions of the army.

harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? 8 For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? 9 So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air. 10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. 11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me. 12 Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. 13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret. 14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

In this paragraph he goes on to shew how vain a thing the ostentation of speaking unknown and unintelligible language must be. It was altogether unedifying and unprofitable; ver. 6, "If I come to you speaking with tongues, what will it profit you, unless I speak to you by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?" It would signify nothing to utter any of these in an unknown tongue. An apostle, with all his furniture, [graces and miraculous gifts,] could not edify, unless he spoke to the capacity of his hearers. New revelations, the most clear explications of old ones, the most instructive discourses in themselves, would be unprofitable in a language not understood.

[Though Paul should utter among them, as he had abundant ability to do, the most weighty and important truths, yet, unless he interpreted what he said in a manner clear from obscurity, like revelation; or intelligibly, and so as to constitute knowledge; or in the manner that the prophets spoke, in a plain and intelligible manner; or in the manner usual in simple and plain instruction,—it would be useless to them.—A. B.]

Nay, interpretations of Scripture made in an unknown tongue would need to be interpreted over again, before they could be of any use. This he illustrates by several allusions. 1. To a pipe and a harp playing always in one tone. Of what use can this be to those that are dancing? If there be no distinction of sounds, how should they order their steps or motions? Unintelligible language is like piping or harping without distinction of sounds. It gives no direction how a man should order his conversation, than a pipe with but one stop, or a harp with but one string, can direct a dancer how he should order his steps. [In the original there is no allusion to dancing, and it is not necessary to suppose any.]

["Or harp." This instrument (καθάρτα) was a stringed instrument, and was made in the same way as a modern harp. It usually had ten strings, and was struck with the plectrum, or with a key. It was commonly employed in praise. "Except they give a distinction in the sounds." Unless they give a difference in the tones, such as are indicated in the gamut for music. "How shall it be known," &c. That is, there would be no time, no music. Nothing would be indicated by it. It would not be fitted to excite the emotions of sorrow or of joy.—A. B.]

2. To a trumpet giving an uncertain sound, ἀόριστον φωνήν, a sound not manifest; either not the proper sound for the purpose, or not distinct enough to be discerned from every other sound. If, instead of sounding an onset, it sounded a retreat, or sounded one knew not what, who would prepare for the battle? To talk in an unknown language in a Christian assembly is altogether as vain, and to no purpose, as for a trumpet to give no certain sound in the field or day of battle. The army in one case, and the congregation in the other, must be all in suspense, and at a perfect nonplus. To speak words that have no significance to those who hear them is to leave them ignorant of what is spoken. It is speaking to the air, ver. 9. Words without a meaning can convey no notion or instruction to the mind; and words not understood have no meaning with those that do not understand them. To talk to them in such language is to waste our breath. 3. He compares this speaking in an unknown tongue to the gibberish of barbarians. There are, as he says, ver. 10, many kinds of voices in the world, none of which are without their proper signification. This is true of the several languages spoken by several nations; all of them have their proper signification. Without this they would be φωνήν ἀφανήν, "a voice and no voice;" for that is no language, nor can answer the end of speaking, which has no meaning. But whatever proper signification the words of any language may have in themselves, and to those who understand them, they are perfect gibberish to men of another language, that understand them not. In this case speaker and hearers are barbarians to each other, ver. 11. They talk and hear only sounds without sense; for this is to be a barbarian. For thus saith the polite Ovid, when banished into Pontus, Barbarus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor ulli.—I am a barbarian here, none understand me. To speak in the church in an unknown tongue is to talk gibberish, it is to play the barbarian; it is to confound the audience instead of instructing them, and for this reason utterly vain and unprofitable.

The apostle, having thus established his point, in the two next verses applies it. 1st. By advising them to be chiefly desirous of those gifts that were most for the church's edification; ver. 12, "Forasmuch as you are zealous of spiritual gifts," this way it will become commendable zeal. Be zealous to edify the church, to promote Christian knowledge and practice, and covet those gifts most that will do the best service to men's souls. This is the great rule he gives. Which, 2nd. He applies to the matter in hand, that, if they did speak a foreign language, they should beg of God the gift of interpreting it, ver. 13. That these were different gifts: see ch. xii. 10. They might speak and understand a foreign language who could not readily translate it into their own. And yet was this necessary to the church's edification; for the church must understand, that it might be edified; which yet it could not do, till the foreign language was translated into its own. Let him therefore pray for the gift of interpreting what he

xiv. 11. "Barbarian:" i.e., a foreigner; one who is ignorant of the speech and habits of a people.

xiv. 15. "What is it then?" i.e., "What then is my determination?" "I will pray with the understanding;" mind. Alford explains thus: "I will interpret my prayer for the benefit of myself and the church." This resolution or expression of self-obligation evidently leads to the inference, by-and-by clearly expressed (verse 28), that if he could not pray with the understanding he would keep silence."

speaks in an unknown tongue; or rather, covet and ask of God the gift of interpreting, than of speaking in a language that needs interpretation, this being most for the church's benefit, and therefore among the gifts that excel: see ver. 12. Some understand it, Let him pray so as to interpret what he utters in a language unintelligible without it. The sum is, that they should perform all religious exercises in their assemblies, so as that all might join in them, and profit by them. 3rd. He enforces this advice with a proper reason, that if he prayed in an unknown tongue, his spirit might pray, that is, a spiritual gift might be exercised in prayer, or his own mind might be devoutly engaged, but his understanding would be unfruitful, ver. 14; that is, the sense and meaning of his words would be unfruitful. He would not be understood, nor therefore would others join with him in his devotions. Note, It should be the concern of such as pray in public to pray intelligibly; not in a foreign language, nor in a language that, if it be not foreign, is above the level of his audience. Language that is most obvious and easy to be understood is the most proper for public devotions and other religious exercises.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also. 16 Else when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? 17 For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. 18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all: 19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue. 20 Brethren, be not children in understanding: howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men.

The apostle here sums up the argument hitherto, and, First, Directs them how they should sing and pray in public; ver. 15, "What is 't then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also. I will sing with the spirit," &c. He does not forbid their praying or singing under Divine affluents, or when they were inspired for this purpose, or had such a spiritual gift communicated to them; but he would have them perform both so as to be understood by others, that others might join with them. Note, Public worship should be performed so as to be understood.

Secondly, He enforces the argument with several reasons. 1. That otherwise the unlearned could not say Amen to their prayers or thanksgiving, could not join in the worship, for they did not understand it, ver. 16. He who fills up or occupies the place of the unlearned, that is, as the ancients interpret it, the body of the people, who in most Christian assemblies are illiterate, how should these say Amen to prayers in an unknown tongue? that is, how should they declare their consent and concurrence? This is saying Amen, so be it, God grant the thing we have requested. Or we join in the confession that hath been made of sin, in the acknowledgment that hath been made of Divine mercies and favours. This is the import of saying Amen. All should say Amen inwardly, and it is not improper to testify this inward concurrence in public prayers and devotions by an audible Amen. The ancient Christians said Amen aloud: see Just. Mart. Apol. 2, prope fin. Now, how should the people say Amen to what they did not understand? Note, There can be no concurrence in those prayers that are not understood. The intention of public devotions is therefore entirely destroyed if they be performed in an unknown tongue. He that performs may pray well, and give thanks well, but not in that time and place; because others are not, cannot be edified, ver. 17, by what they understand not.

2. He alleges his own example to make the greater impression. Concerning which, observe, 1st. That he did not come behind any of them in this spiritual gift. "I thank my God I speak with tongues more than ye all," ver. 18, not only more than any single person among you, but more than all together. It was not envy at their better furniture [gifts] that made Paul depreciate what they so highly valued, and so much vaunted in. He surpassed them all in this very gift of tongues, and did not vilify their gift because he had it not. This spirit of envy is too common in the world. But the apostle took care to guard against this misconstruction of his purpose, by letting them know there was more ground for them to envy him upon this head than for him to envy them. Note, When we beat down men's unreasonable value for themselves, or any of their possessions or attainments, we should let them see, if possible, that this doth not proceed from an envious and grudging spirit. We miss our aim if they can fairly give our conduct this invidious turn. Paul could not be justly censured or suspected for any such principle in this whole argument. He spake more languages than they all. Yet, 2nd. He "had rather speak five words with understanding," that is, so as to be understood, and instruct and edify others, "than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue," ver. 19. He was so far from valuing himself upon talking languages, or making ostentation of his talents of this kind, that he had rather speak five intelligible words to benefit others, than make a thousand, ten thousand fine discourses, that would do no one else any good, because they did not understand them. Note, A truly Christian minister will value himself much more upon doing the least spiritual good to men's souls than upon procuring the greatest applause and commendation to himself. This is true grandeur and nobleness of spirit. It is acting up to his character; it is approving himself the servant of Christ, and not a vassal to his own pride and vanity.

3. He adds a plain intimation that the fondness they discovered for this gift was but too plain an indication of the immaturity of their judgment. "Brethren, be not children in understanding; in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men," ver. 20. Children are apt to be struck with novelty and strange appearances. They are taken with an outward show, without inquiring into the true nature and worth of things. Do not you act like them, and prefer noise and show to worth and substance. Shew a greater ripeness of judgment, and act a more manly part. Be like children in nothing but an innocent and inoffensive disposition. A double rebuke is couched in this passage, both of their pride upon account of their gifts and their arrogance and haughtiness towards each other, and the contests and quarrels proceeding from them. Note, Christians should be harmless and inoffensive as children, void of all guile and malice: but should have wisdom and knowledge that is ripe and mature. They should not be unskilful in the word of righteousness, Heb. v. 13, though they should be unskilful in all the arts of mischief.

21 In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord. 22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe. 23 If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad? 24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all: 25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

In this passage the apostle pursues the argument, and reasons from other topics, as,

First. For that tongues, as the Corinthians used them, were rather a token of judgment from God, than mercy to any people, ver. 21; "In the law," that is, the Old Testament, "it is written, with men of other tongues, and other lips, will I speak to this people, and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord," Isa. xxviii. 11: compare Deu. xxviii. 46, 49. To both these places it is thought the apostle refers. Both are delivered by way of threatening, and one is supposed to interpret the other. The meaning in this view is, that it is an evidence that a people are abandoned of God when he gives them up to this sort of instruction, to the discipline of those that speak in another language. And sure the apostle's discourse implies you should not be fond of the tokens of Divine displeasure. God can have no gracious regards to those who are left merely to this sort of instruction, and taught in language which they cannot understand. They can never be benefited by such teaching as this. And when they are left to it, it is a sad sign that God gives them over as past cure. And should Christians covet to be in such a state, or bring the churches into it? Yet thus did the Corinthian preachers in effect, who would always deliver their inspirations in an unknown tongue.

Secondly. Tongues were rather a sign to unbelievers than to believers, ver. 22. It was a spiritual gift, intended for the conviction and conversion of infidels, that they might be brought into the Christian church; but converts were to be built up in Christianity by profitable instructions in their own language. The gift of tongues was necessary to spread Christianity and gather churches. It was proper, and intended to convince unbelievers of that doctrine which Christians had already embraced; but prophesying, and interpreting Scripture in their own language, were most for the edification of such as did already believe: so that speaking with tongues in Christian assemblies was altogether out of time and place; neither one nor the other was proper for it. Note, That gifts may be rightly used, it is proper to know the ends which they are intended to serve. To go about the conversion of infidels, as the apostles did, without the gift of tongues, and the discovery of this gift, had been a vain undertaking, [in their circumstances,] but in an assembly of Christians already converted to the Christian faith, to make use and ostentation of this gift would be perfectly impertinent, because it would be of no advantage to the assembly; not for conviction of truth, because they had already embraced it: not for their edification, because they did not understand, and could not get benefit without understanding what they heard.

Thirdly. The credit and reputation of their assemblies among unbelievers required them to prefer prophesying before speaking with tongues. For, 1. If, when they were all assembled for Christian worship, and their ministers, or all employed in public worship, should talk unintelligible language, and infidels should drop in, they would conclude them to be mad, to be no better than a parcel of wild fanatics. Who in their right senses could carry on religious worship in such a manner? Or what sort of religion is that which leaves out sense and understanding? Would not this make Christianity ridiculous to a heathen, to hear the ministers of it pray, or preach, or perform any other religious exercise, in a language that neither he nor the assembly understood. Note, Christian religion is a sober and reasonable thing in itself, and should not, by the ministers of it, be made to look wild or senseless. They disgrace their religion, and vilify their own character, who act any thing that has this aspect. But, on the other hand, 2. If, instead of speaking with tongues, those who minister plainly interpret Scripture, or preach, in language intelligible and proper, the great truths and rules of the Gospel, a heathen or unlearned person coming in would probably be convinced, and become a convert to Christianity, ver. 24, 25. His conscience will be touched, the secrets of his heart will be revealed to him, he will be condemned by the truth he hears, and so will be brought [by God's grace] to confess his guilt, to pay his homage to God, and own that he is indeed among you, present in the assembly. Note, Scripture truth, plainly and duly taught, has a marvellous aptness to awaken the conscience, and touch the heart. And is not this much more for the honour of our religion than that infidels should conclude the ministers of it a set of madmen, and their religious exercises only fits of frenzy? This last would at once cast contempt on themselves and their religion too. Instead of procuring applause for themselves, it would render them ridiculous, and involve their profession in the same censure; whereas prophesying would certainly edify the church, much better keep up their credit, [inspire deeper respect,] and might probably convince and convert infidels that might occasionally hear them. Note, Religious exercises in Christian assemblies should be such as are fit to edify the

xiv. 21. The quotation is from Isa. xxviii. 11. "The context there is this: the scoffers in Jerusalem (verse 14) are introduced as scorning the simplicity of the Divine commands, which were line upon line, precept upon precept, as if to children (verses 9, 10). Jehovah threatens them that, since they would not hear these simple commands, he would speak to them by men of other tongues, viz., the Assyrians, their captors. Here, as in many other cases, the historical sense is not so much considered as the aptness of the expressions used for illustrating the matter in hand, viz., that belief would not be produced in the unbelieving by speaking to them in strange tongues" (Alford).

xiv. 26. "How is it then?" i.e., "What, then, is the inference to be drawn from what I have said? Whenever you meet in congregations, those of you who have spiritual gifts are ready each one to exercise his gift; one is ready to pour forth songs of praise, another has an exposition of doctrine, another is ready to speak in tongues," &c.

faithful, and convince, affect, and convert unbelievers. The ministry was not instituted to make ostentation of gifts and parts, but to save souls.

26 How is it then, brethren? when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying. 27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church; and let him speak to himself, and to God. 29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge. 30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. 31 For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. 32 And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. 33 For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints.

First. He blames them for the confusion they introduced into the assembly by ostentation of their gifts; ver. 26, "When ye come together, every one hath a psalm, [a poetical effusion,] hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, &c.; that is, either you are apt to confound the several parts of worship, and whilst one has a psalm to utter by inspiration another has a doctrine or revelation; or else, you are apt to be confused in the same branch of worship, many of you having psalms or doctrines to propose at the same time, without staying for one another. Is not this perfect uproar? Can this be edifying? And yet all religious exercises in public assemblies should have this view. "Let all things be done to edifying."

Secondly. He corrects their faults, and lays down some regulations for their future conduct. As, 1. To speaking in an unknown tongue, he orders that no more than two or three should do it at one meeting, and this not all together, but successively, one after another; and even this was not to be done unless there were some one to interpret, ver. 27, 28, some other interpreter besides himself who spoke; for to speak in an unknown tongue what himself was afterwards to interpret could only be for ostentation. But if another were present who could interpret, two miraculous gifts might be exercised at once, and thereby the church edified, and the faith of the hearers confirmed at the same time. But if there were none to interpret, he was to be silent in the church, and only exercise his gift between God and himself, ver. 28; that is, as I think, in private at home, for all who are present at public worship should join in it, and not be at their private devotions in public assemblies. Solitary devotions are out of time and place when the church is met for social worship. 2. As to prophesying, he orders, 1st. That two or three only should speak at one meeting, ver. 29, and this successively, not all at once; and that the other should examine and judge what he delivered, that is, discern and determine concerning it, whether it were of Divine inspiration or no. There might be false prophets, mere pretenders to Divine inspiration, and the true prophets were to judge of these, and discern and discover who was Divinely inspired, and by such inspiration interpreted Scripture and taught the church, and who was not; what was of Divine inspiration, and what was not. This seems to be the meaning of this rule. For where a prophet was known to be such, and under the Divine afflatus, he could not be judged, for this were to subject even the Holy Spirit to the judgment of men. He who was indeed inspired, and known to be so, was above all human judgment. 2nd. He orders, that if any assistant prophet had a revelation whilst another was prophesying, that other should hold his peace, ver. 30, namely, before the inspired assistant uttered his revelation. Indeed, it is by many understood that the former speaker should immediately hold his peace. But this seems unnatural, and not so well to agree with the context; for why must one that was speaking by inspiration be immediately silent upon another man's being inspired, and suppress what was dictated to him by the same Spirit? Indeed, he who had the new revelation might claim liberty of speech in his turn, upon producing his vouchers. But why must liberty of speech be taken from him who was speaking before, and his mouth stopped, when he was delivering the dictates of the same Spirit, and could produce the same vouchers? Would the Spirit of God move one to speak, and, before he had delivered what he had to say, move another to interrupt him, and put him to silence? This seems to me an unnatural thought. Nor is it more agreeable to the context, and the reason annexed, ver. 31, "That all might prophesy one by one," or one after another, which could not be where any one was interrupted and silenced before he had done prophesying; but might easily be, if he, who was afterwards inspired, forbore to deliver his new revelation till the former prophet had finished what he had to say. And, to confirm this sense, the apostle quickly adds, "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets," ver. 32; that is, the spiritual gifts they have leave them still possessed of their reason, and capable of using their own judgment in the exercise of them. Divine inspirations are not like the diabolical possessions of heathen priests, violent and ungovernable, and prompting them to act as if they were beside themselves, but are sober, and calm, and capable of regular conduct. The man inspired by the Spirit of God may still act the man, and observe the rules of natural order and decency in delivering his revelations. His spiritual gift is thus far subject to his pleasure, and to be managed by his discretion.

Thirdly. The apostle gives the reasons of these regulations. As, 1. That they would be for the church's benefit, their instruction, and consolation. It is that "all may learn, and all may be comforted," or exhorted, that the prophets were to speak in that orderly manner the apostle advises. Note, The instruction, edification, and comfort of the church, is that for which God instituted the ministry. And sure ministers should as much as possible fit their ministrations to these purposes. 2. He tells them, "God is not the God of confusion, but of peace and good order," ver. 33; and therefore Divine inspirations should by no means throw Christian assemblies into confusion, and break through all rules of common decency, which yet would be unavoidable if several inspired men should all at once utter what was suggested to them by the Spirit of God, and not wait to take their turns. Note, The honour of God requires that things should be managed in Christian assemblies so as not to transgress the rules of natural decency. If they are managed in a tumultuous and confused manner, what a notion must this give of the God who is worshipped to considerate observers? Doth it look as if he were the God of peace and order, and an enemy to confusion? Things should be managed so in Divine worship as that no unlovely or dishonourable notion of God should be formed in the minds of observers. 3. He adds, that things were thus orderly managed in all the other churches, "as in all the churches of the saints," ver. 33. They kept to these rules in the exercise of their spiritual gifts, which was a manifest proof that the church of Corinth might observe the same regulations; and it would be perfectly scandalous for them, who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, to be more disorderly than any in the exercise of them. Note, Though other churches are not to be our rule, [Christ has appointed an authority in his church for determining such points, but that authority must be guided by his word,] yet the regard they pay to the rules of natural decency and order should restrain us from breaking these rules. Thus far they may be proposed as examples, and it is a shame not to follow them.

34 Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. 35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

Here the apostle,

First. Enjoins silence to their women in public assemblies, and to such a degree that they must not ask questions for their own information in the church, but "ask their husbands at home." "They are to learn in silence with all subjection; but," saith the apostle, "I suffer them not to teach," 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12. There is indeed an intimation, ch. xi. 5, as if the women sometimes did pray and prophesy in their assemblies, which the apostle in that passage doth not simply condemn, but the manner of performance, namely, praying or prophesying with the head uncovered, which in that age and country was throwing off the distinction of sexes, and setting themselves on a level with the men; but here he seems to forbid all public performances of theirs. [His prohibition is express in as far as relates to preaching.] They are not permitted to speak, ver. 34, namely, in the church, neither in praying nor prophesying. The connexion seems plainly to include the last, in the limited sense in which it is taken in this chapter, namely, for preaching, or interpreting Scripture by inspiration. And, indeed, for a woman to prophesy in this sense were to teach, which doth not so well befit her state of subjection. A teacher of others has in that respect a superiority over them, which is not allowed the woman over the man, nor must she therefore be allowed to teach in a congregation. "I suffer them not to teach." But praying and uttering hymns inspired was not teaching; and seeing there were women who had spiritual gifts of this sort in that age of the church, see Acts xii. 9, and might be under this impulse in the assembly, must they altogether suppress it? Or why should they have this gift, if it must never be publicly exercised? For these reasons some think these general prohibitions are only to be understood in common cases, but that upon extraordinary occasions, when women were under a Divine afflatus, and known to be so, they might have liberty of speech. They were not ordinarily to teach, nor so much as to debate and ask questions in the church, but learn in silence there; and if difficulties occurred, "ask their husbands at home." Note, That, as it is the woman's duty to learn in subjection, it is the man's duty to keep up his superiority, by being able to instruct her. If it be her duty to ask her husband at home, it is his concern and duty to endeavour at least to be able to answer her inquiries. If it be a shame for her to speak in the church, where she should be silent, it is a shame for him to be silent when he should speak, and not be able to give an answer when she asks him at home.

Secondly. We have here the reason of this injunction, namely, it is God's law and commandment that they should be under obedience, ver. 34. They are placed in subordination to the man, and it is a shame for them to do any thing that looks like an affectation of changing ranks, which speaking in public seemed to imply, at least in that age, and among that people, as would public teaching much more. So that the apostle concludes it was a shame for women to speak in the church, in the assembly. Shame is the mind's uneasy reflection on having done an indecent thing; and what more indecent than for a woman to quit her rank, renounce the subordination of her sex, or do what in common account had such aspect and appearance? Note, Our spirit and conduct should be suitable to our rank. The natural distinctions God has made we should observe. Those he has placed in subjection to others should not set themselves on a level, or affect or assume superiority. The woman was made subject to the man, and she should keep her station, and be content with it. For this reason they must be silent in the churches, nor set up for teachers; for this is setting up for superiority over the men.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only? 37 If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. 38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant. 39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues. 40 Let all things be done decently and in order.

In these verses the apostle closes his argument.

First. With a just rebuke of the Corinthians for their extravagant pride and self-conceit. They so managed with their spiritual gifts as no church did like them. They behaved in a manner by themselves, and would not easily endure

This was their state, what was to be done? "Let all these be exercised with a view to edification;" answering the question, "How is it then?"

xiv. 27. "By course;" i.e., "by turn." St. Paul means here that in one and the same assembly not more than two, or at most three, were to exercise the gift of tongues, and that in turn and when one was present who could interpret; thus limiting and regulating the exercise.

xiv. 28. If there was no interpreter, the person possessing the tongue is to remain silent, speaking privately, with only himself and God to witness it.

xiv. 29. "Let the other judge;" i.e., the other prophets, or those with discerning of spirits.

xiv. 30. "Let the first hold his peace;" i.e., give place to the one who has just had something revealed to him.

xiv. 31. "For ye have power one by one all to prophesy;" (i.e., control or regulation. Now, saith the apostle, to beat down this arrogant humour, "Came the Gospel out from you? or came it to you only?" ver. 36. Did Christianity come out of Corinth? Was its original among you? Or if not, is it now limited and confined to you? Are you the only church favoured with Divine revelations, that you will depart from the decent usages of all other churches? and, to make ostentation of your spiritual gifts, bring confusion into Christian assemblies? How intolerably assuming is this behaviour! Pray bethink yourselves. When it was needful or proper the apostle could rebuke with all authority; and sure his rebukes, if ever, were proper here. Note, They must be [faithfully] reproved and humbled whose spiritual pride and self-conceit throw Christian churches and assemblies into confusion; though such men will hardly bear even the rebukes of an apostle.

Secondly. He lets them know that what he said to them was the command of God; nor durst any true prophet, any one really inspired, deny it; ver. 37. "If any man think himself a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge," &c. Nay, let him be tried by this very rule. If he will not own what I deliver on this head to be the will of Christ, he himself never had the Spirit of Christ. The Spirit of Christ can never contradict itself. If it speak in me and in them, it must speak the same things in both. If their revelations contradict mine, they do not come from the same Spirit; either I or they must be false prophets. "By this therefore you may know them." If they say my directions in this matter are no Divine commandments, you may depend upon it they are not Divinely inspired. But if any continue after all, through prejudice or obstinacy, uncertain or ignorant, whether they or I speak by the Spirit of God, they must be left under the power of this ignorance, [to bear its punishment.]. If their pretences to inspiration can stand in competition with the apostolical character and powers which I have, I have lost all my authority and influence; and the persons that allow of this competition against me are out of the reach of conviction, and must be left to themselves. Note, It is just with God to leave them to the blindness of their own minds who wilfully shut out the light. They who would be ignorant in so plain a case were justly left under the power of their mistake.

Thirdly. He sums up all in two general advices.

1. That though they should not despise the gift of tongues, nor altogether disuse it under the mentioned regulations, yet they should prefer prophesying. This is indeed the scope of the whole argument. It was to be preferred to the other, because it was the more useful gift.

2. He charges them to "let all things be done decently and in order," ver. 40; that is, that they should avoid every thing that was manifestly indecent and disorderly. Not that they should hence take occasion to bring into the Christian church and worship any thing that a vain mind might think ornamental to it, and would help to set it off. Such indecencies and disorders as he had remarked upon were especially to be shunned. They must do nothing that was manifestly childish, ver. 20; or what would give occasion to say they were mad, ver. 22; nor so as to breed confusion, ver. 33. This would be utterly indecent; it would make a tumult and mob of a Christian assembly. But they were to do things in order. They were to speak one after another, and not all at once; take their turns, and not interrupt one another. To do otherwise was to destroy the end of a Christian ministry, and all assemblies for Christian worship. Note, Manifest indecencies and disorders are to be carefully kept out of all Christian churches, and every part of Divine worship. They should have nothing in them that is childish, absurd, ridiculous, wild, or tumultuous; but all parts of Divine worship should be carried on in a manly, grave, rational, composed, and orderly manner. God is not to be dishonoured, nor his worship disgraced, by our unbecoming and disorderly performance of it, and attendance at it.

[In view of this chapter, we may remark, (1.) That public worship should be in a language understood by the people, the language which they commonly employ. Nothing can be clearer than the sentiments of Paul on this. The whole strain of the chapter is to demonstrate this, in opposition to making use of a foreign and unintelligible language in any part of public worship. Paul specifies in the course of the discussion every part of public worship; "public preaching," ver. 2, 3, 5, 13, 19; "prayer," ver. 14, 15; "singing," ver. 15; and insists that all should be in a language that should be understood by the people. It would almost seem that he had anticipated the sentiments and practice of the Roman Catholic denomination. It is remarkable that a practice should have grown up, and have been defended, in a church professedly Christian, so directly in opposition to the explicit meaning of the New Testament. Perhaps there is not, even in the Roman Catholic denomination, a more striking instance of a custom or doctrine in direct contradiction to the Bible. If anything is plain and obvious, it is that worship, in order to be edifying, should be in a language that is understood by the people. (2.) Preaching should be simple and intelligible. There is a great deal of preaching which might as well be in a foreign tongue as in the language which is actually employed. The most successful preachers have been those who have been most remarkable for their simplicity and clearness. Nor are simplicity and intelligibility of manner inconsistent with bright thought and profound sentiments. (3.) We should learn to value useful talent more than that which is splendid and showy, ver. 3. The whole scope of this chapter goes to demonstrate that we should more highly prize and desire that talent which may be useful to the church, or which may be useful in convincing unbelievers, ver. 24, 25, than that which merely dazzles, or excites admiration. Ministers of the Gospel who preach as they should do, engage in their work to win souls to Christ, not to induce them to admire eloquence; they come to teach men to adore the great and dreadful God, not to be loud in their praises of a mortal man. Cowper has drawn the character of what a minister of the Gospel should be, in the well-known and most beautiful passage in the Task:

Would I describe a preacher, such as Paul,
Were he on earth, would hear, approve, and own,
Paul should himself direct me. I would trace
His master-strokes, and draw from his design.
I would express him simple, grave, sincere;
In doctrine uncorrupt; in language plain;
And plain in manner; decent, solemn, chaste,
And natural in gesture; much impress'd
Himself, as conscious of his awful charge,
And anxious mainly that the flock he feeds
May feel it too; affectionate in look,
And tender in address, as well becomes A messenger of grace to guilty men.

He establishes the strong, restores the weak,
Recl'ms the wanderer, binds the broken heart
And, arm'd himself in panoply complete
Of heavenly temper, furnishes with arms,
Bright as his own, and trains, by every rule
Of holy discipline, to glorious war,
The sacramental host of God's elect.—A. B. 1

CHAPTER XV.

In this chapter the apostle treats of that great article of Christianity, the resurrection of the dead. I. He establishes the certainty of our Saviour's resurrection, ver. 1—11. II. He, from this truth, sets himself to refute those who said, There is no resurrection of the dead, ver. 12—19. III. From our Saviour's resurrection he establishes the resurrection of the dead, and confirms the Corinthians in the belief of it by some other considerations, ver. 20—34. IV. He answers an objection against this truth, and takes occasion thence to shew what a vast change will be made in the bodies of believers at the resurrection, ver. 35—50. V. He informs us what a change will be made in them, that shall be living at the sound of the last trumpet, and the complete conquest the just shall then obtain over death and the grave, ver. 51—57. And, VI. Sums up the argument with a very serious exhortation to Christians, to be resolved and diligent in their Lord's service, because they know they shall be so gloriously rewarded by him, ver. 58.

Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; 2 By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. 3 For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; 4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures: 5 And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve: 6 After that, he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep. 7 After that, he was seen of James; then of all the apostles. 8 And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time. 9 For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. 10 But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. 11 Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

It is the apostle's business in this chapter to assert and establish the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which some of the Corinthians flatly denied, ver. 10. Whether they turned this doctrine into allegory, as did Hymeneus and Philletus, by saying it was already past, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, and several of the ancient heretics, by making it mean no more than a changing their course of life, or whether they rejected it as absurd, upon principles of reason and science, it seems they denied it in the proper sense; and they disowned a future state of recompenses by denying the resurrection of the dead. Now that heathens and infidels should deny this truth doth not seem so strange, but that Christians, who had their religion by revelation, should deny a truth so plainly discovered, is surprising, especially when it is a truth of such [vital] importance. It was time for the apostle to confirm them in this truth, when the staggering of their faith in this point was likely to shake their Christianity, and they were yet in great danger of having their faith staggered. He begins with an epitome or summary of the Gospel, what he had preached amongst them, namely, the death and resurrection of Christ. Upon this foundation the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is built. Note. Divine truths appear with greatest evidence when they are looked upon in their mutual connection. The foundation must be strengthened, that the superstructure may be secured. Now concerning this Gospel, observe,

First. What a stress he lays on it; ver. 1, 2, "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Gospel which I preached to you." 1. It was what he constantly preached. His word was not yea and nay. He always preached the same Gospel, and taught the same truth. He could appeal to his hearers for this. Truth is in its own nature invariable, and the infallible teachers of Divine truth could never be at variance with themselves or one another. The doctrine which Paul had heretofore taught, he still taught. 2. It was what they had received, had been convinced of the faith, believed it in their hearts, or at least made profession of doing so with their mouths; it was no strange doctrine; it was that very Gospel in which, or by which, they had hitherto stood, and must continue to stand. If they gave up this truth, they left themselves no ground to stand upon, no footing in religion. Note, The doctrine of Christ's death and resurrection is at the foundation of Christianity. Remove this foundation and the whole fabric falls; all our hopes for eternity sink at once; and it is by holding this truth firm that Christians are made to stand in a day of trial, and kept faithful to God. 3. It was that alone by which they could hope for salvation, ver. 2; for there is no salvation in any other name, "no name given

"you have power to bring about this result—you can be silent if you please) in order that all may learn and all may be exhorted (or comforted)" (Alford).

xiv. 36. Alford thinks that St. Paul refers here to all the points of church custom which he has been noticing, showing them the unseemliness or absurdity of their pretending to originate customs unknown to other churches, as if the word of God first went forth from them.

xv. 1. "Now I make known unto you," &c.: not without approach that it should be necessary for him to declare again the Gospel which they had already received.

xv. 2. "Unless ye became believers in vain:" i.e., were deceived in what you believed. That they had not been deceived he shows in the chapter.

xv. 5. "The twelve:" Luke xxiv. 33—36. There were but eleven; twelve is retained as the term for the whole company of apostles.

under heaven by which we may be saved, but the name of Christ;" and there is no salvation in his name, but upon ascription of his death and resurrection. These are the saving truths of our holy religion. The death and revival, the crucifixion of our Redeemer, and his conquest over death, are the very source of our spiritual life and hopes. Now concerning these saving truths, observe, 1st. That they must be retained in mind; they must be held fast, so the word is translated, Heb. x. 23. "Let us hold fast the profession of faith." Note, The saving truths of the Gospel must be fixed on our mind, revolved much in our thoughts, and maintained and held fast to the end, if we would be saved. They will not save us if we do not attend to them and yield to their power, and continue to do so to the end, [perseverance necessarily belonging to the saints.] "He only that endureth to the end shall be saved," Mat. x. 22. 2nd. That we believe in vain unless we continue and persevere in the faith of the Gospel. We shall be never the better for a temporary faith; nay, we shall aggravate our guilt by relapsing into infidelity; and in vain is it to profess Christianity, or our faith in Christ, if we deny the resurrection; for this must imply and involve the denial of his resurrection, [with all its consequences.] And take away this, you make nothing of Christianity, you leave nothing for faith or hope to fix upon.

Secondly, Observe what this Gospel is, on which the apostle lays such stress. It was that doctrine which he had received, and delivered to them, ἐκ πρώτης, 'among the first,' the principal. It was a doctrine of the first rank, a most necessary truth, namely, how that Christ died for our sins, and was buried, and rose again; or, in other words, that "he was delivered for our offences, and rose again for our justification," Rom. iv. 25; that he was offered in sacrifice for our sins, and rose again, to shew that he had procured forgiveness for them, and was accepted of God in this offering [as our righteousness.] Note, Christ's death and resurrection are the very sum and substance of evangelical truth. Hence we derive our spiritual life now, and here we must find our hopes of everlasting life hereafter.

Thirdly, Observe how this truth is confirmed. 1. By Old Testament predictions. He died for our sins, according to the Scriptures; he was buried and rose from the dead, according to the Scriptures; according to Scripture prophecies and Scripture types. Such prophecies as Ps. xvi. 10; Isa. liii. 4-6, &c.; Dan. ix. 26, 27; Hos. vi. 2; such Scripture types as Jonah, Mat. xii. 40; as Isaac, who is expressly said by the apostle to have been received from the dead in a figure, Heb. xi. 19. Note, It is a great confirmation of our faith of the Gospel to see how it corresponds with ancient types and prophecies. 2. By the testimony of many eye-witnesses, who saw Christ after he was risen from the dead; he reckons up five several appearances besides that to himself. "He was seen of Cephas," or Peter, "then of the twelve," called so, though Judas was no longer among them, because this was their usual number. "Then he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once," many of which were living when the apostle wrote this epistle, though some were fallen asleep; this was in Galilee, Mat. xxviii. 10. After that he was seen of James singly, and then by all the apostles when he was taken up into heaven. This was on mount Olivet, Lu. xxiv. 50; compare Acts i. 2, 5-7. Note, How uncontrollably evident was Christ's resurrection from the dead, when so many eyes saw him at so many several times alive, and when he indulged the weakness of one disciple so far as to let him handle him, to put his resurrection out of doubt? And what reason have we to believe those who were so steady in maintaining this truth, though they hazarded all that was dear to them in this world, by endeavouring to assert and propagate it! Even Paul himself was last of all favoured with the sight of him. It is one of the peculiar offices of an apostle to be a witness of our Saviour's resurrection, Lu. xxiv. 48; and when Paul was called to the apostolical office, he was made an evidence of this sort. "The Lord Jesus appeared to him by the way to Damascus," Acts ix. 17.

And, having mentioned this favour, he takes occasion from it to make an humble digression concerning himself. He was highly favoured of God, but he always endeavoured to keep up a mean opinion of himself, and to express it. So he does hereby, observing, 1st. That he was "one born out of due time," ver. 8; an abortive, ἐκτροπία, a child dead born, and out of time. Paul resembled such a birth, in the suddenness of his new birth, in that he was not matured for the apostolical function, as the others were, who had personal converse with our Lord. He was called to the office when such conversation was not to be had, he was out of time for it. He had not known nor followed the Lord, nor been formed in his family, as the others were, for this high and honourable function. This was in Paul's account a very humbling circumstance. 2nd. By owning himself inferior to the other apostles; "Not meet to be called an apostle." The least, because the last of them, called latest to the office, and not worthy to be called an apostle, neither to have the office and title, because he had been "a persecutor of the church of God," ver. 9. Indeed, he tells us elsewhere that he was "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles," 2 Cor. xi. 5; for gifts, graces, services, and sufferings, inferior to none of them. Yet some circumstances in his case made him think more meanly of himself than of any of them. Note, A humble spirit in the midst of high attainments is a great ornament to any man; it sets his good qualities off to much greater advantage. What kept Paul low in an especial manner was the remembrance of his former wickedness, his raging and destructive zeal against Christ and his members. Note, How easily God can bring good out of the greatest evil? When sinners are by Divine grace turned into saints, he makes the remembrance of their former sins very serviceable, to make them humble, and diligent, and faithful. 3rd. By ascribing all that was valuable in him to Divine grace; "But by the grace of God I am that I am," ver. 10. It is God's prerogative to say, "I am that I am." It is our privilege to be able to say, By God's grace we are what we are, we are nothing but what God makes us; nothing in religion, but what his grace makes us. All that is good in us is a stream from this fountain. Paul was sensible of this, and kept humble and thankful by this conviction; so should we. Nay, though he was conscious of his own diligence, and zeal, and service, so that he could say of himself, "The grace of God was not given me in vain, but I laboured more abundantly than they all;" he thought himself so much more the debtor to Divine grace. "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." Note, Those that have the grace of God bestowed on them should take care that it be not in vain. They should cherish and exercise and exert this heavenly principle [with most fervent prayer.] So did Paul, and therefore laboured with so much heart, and so much success; and yet, the more he laboured, and the more good he did, the more humble was he in his opinion of himself, and the more disposed to own and magnify the favor of God towards him, his free and unmerited favour. Note, A humble spirit will be very apt to own and magnify the grace of God. A humble spirit is commonly a gracious one; where pride is subdued, there it is reasonable to believe grace reigns.

After this digression, the apostle returns to his argument, and tells them, (ver. 11), that he not only preached the same Gospel himself at all times, and in all places, but that all the apostles preached the same. "Whether it were they or I, so we preached, and so ye believed." Whether Peter or Paul, or any other apostle, had converted them to Christianity, all maintained the same truth, told the same story, preached the same doctrine, and confirmed it by the same evidence. All agreed in this, that Jesus Christ, and him crucified, and slain, and then rising from the dead, was the very sum and substance of Christianity; and this all true Christians believe. All the apostles agreed in this testimony; all Christians agree in the belief of it. By this faith they live, in this faith they die.

12 Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? 13 But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: 14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. 15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. 16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: 17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. 18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. 19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

Having confirmed the truth of our Saviour's resurrection, the apostle goes on to refute those among the Corinthians that said there would be none. "If Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" ver. 12. It seems from this passage, and the course of the argument, there were some among the Corinthians that thought the resurrection an impossibility. This was a common sentiment among the heathens. But against this the apostle produces incontestable matter of fact, namely, the resurrection of Christ; and goes on to argue against them from the absurdities that must follow from their principle. As,

First, "If there be," can be, "no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen," ver. 13; and again, "if the dead rise not," cannot be raised, or recovered to life, "then is not Christ raised," ver. 16. And yet it was foretold by ancient prophecies that he should rise; and it has been proved by multitudes of eye-witnesses that he is risen. And will you say, will any among you dare to say, that is not, cannot be, which God long ago said shall be, and is now undoubted matter of fact?

Secondly, It would follow hereupon that the preaching and faith of the Gospel would be vain. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith vain," ver. 14. This supposition admitted would destroy the principal evidence of Christianity, and so, 1. Make preaching vain. "We" apostles "should be found false witnesses of God." We pretend to be God's witnesses for this truth, and to work miracles by his power in confirmation of it, and are all the while deceivers; liars for God, if in his name, and by power received from him, we go forth and publish, and assert a thing false in fact, and impossible to be true. And doth not this make us the vainest fellows in the world, and our office and ministry the vainest and most useless thing in the world? What end could we propose to ourselves in undertaking this hard and hazardous service, if we knew our religion stood on no better a foot, nay, if we were not well assured of the contrary? What should we preach for? Would not our labour be wholly in vain? We can have no very favourable expectations in this life, and we could have none beyond it. If Christ be not risen, the Gospel is a jest; it is chaff and emptiness. 2. This supposition would make the faith of Christians vain, as well as the labours of ministers. "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins," ver. 16; yet under the guilt and condemnation of sin, because it is through his death and sacrifice for sin alone that forgiveness is to be had. "We have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins," Eph. i. 7. No remission of sins is to be had but through the shedding of his blood. And had his blood been shed, and his life taken away without ever being restored, what evidence could we have had that through him we should have justification [be accepted as righteous through the imputation of his righteousness] and eternal life? Had he remained under the power of death, how should he have delivered us from its power? And how vain a thing is faith in him, upon this supposition! He must "rise for our justification, who was delivered for our sins," or in vain we look for any such benefit by him. There had been no justification nor salvation if Christ had not risen; and must not faith in Christ be vain, and of no signification, if he be still among the dead?

Thirdly, Another absurdity following from this supposition is, that "those who are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." If there be no resurrection, they cannot rise, and therefore are lost; even those who have died in the Christian faith, and for it. It is plain from this, that those among the Corinthians who denied the resurrection meant thereby a state of future retribution, and not merely the revival of the flesh. They took death to be the destruction and extinction of the man, and not merely of the bodily life; for otherwise the apostle could not infer the utter loss of those that slept in Jesus, from the supposition they would never rise more, or that they had no hopes in Christ after life, [they had died in a faith destitute of foundation if the resurrection of Christ was not true, and thus they were utterly lost.] ver. 20; for they might have hope of happiness for their minds, if these survived their bodies; and this would prevent the limiting their hopes in Christ to this life only. Upon supposition there is no resurrection in your sense, no after state and life, then dead Christians are quite lost. How vain a thing were our faith and religion upon this supposition! And this,

Fourthly, Would infer, that Christ's ministers and servants were "of all men most miserable," as having hope in him in this life only, ver. 19; which is another absurdity that would follow from the asserting no resurrection. Their condition who hope in Christ would be worse than that of other men. Who "hope in Christ," [trust or confide in him.] Note, All that believe in Christ have hope in him; all who believe in him as Redeemer hope for redemption and salvation by him. But if there be no resurrection, nor state of future recompense, (which was intended by those who denied the resurrection at Corinth,) their hope in him must be limited to this life. And if all their hopes in Christ lie within the compass of this life, they are in much worse condition than the rest of mankind, especially at that time, and under those circumstances, in

xv. 8. "One whose relation to the rest of the apostles in point of worthiness was that of the immature and deformed child to the rest of the family" (Alford).

xv. 11. "So;" rather, "such" was our preaching, as given in verses 3, 4.

xv. 12. The denial of the resurrection of the dead was in fact a rejection of the apostle's preaching, for it implied that Christ had not risen. Alford says, these deniers of the resurrection "must have been Gentile believers inheriting the unwillingness of the Greek mind to receive that of which a full account could not be given (see verses 35, 36), and probably of a philosophical and cavilling turn."

xv. 14. "Vain" here signifies "empty," "unreal;" in verse 17 "frustrated" (see Rom. iv. 25).

xv. 17, 18. "Here," says Stanley, "we find the climax of the whole argument. As may be seen from 1 Thess. iv. 13, one of the

which the apostle wrote; for then they had no countenance nor protection from the rulers of the world, but were hated and persecuted by all men. Preachers and private Christians therefore had a hard lot if in this life only they had hope in Christ. Better be any thing than a Christian upon these terms; for in this world they are hated, and hunted, and abused, stripped of all worldly comforts, and exposed to all manner of sufferings. They fare much harder than other men in this life, and yet have no farther nor better hopes. And is it not absurd for one who believes in Christ to admit a principle that involves so absurd an inference? Can that man have faith in Christ who can believe concerning him that he will leave his faithful servants, whether ministers or others, in a worse state than his enemies? Note, It is a gross absurdity in a Christian to admit the supposition of no resurrection or future state, [in other words, utterly to deny the faith.] It leaves him no hopes beyond this world, and this many times would make his condition the worst in the world; indeed, the Christian is by his religion crucified to this world, and taught to live upon the hope of another. Carnal pleasures are insipid to him in a great degree, and spiritual and heavenly pleasures are those which he affects and pants after. How sad is his case indeed, if he must be dead to worldly pleasures, and yet never hope for any better!

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept. 21 For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. 22 For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. 23 But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. 24 Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. 25 For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. 26 The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. 27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. 28 And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all. 29 Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead? 30 And why stand we in jeopardy every hour? 31 I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily. 32 If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantage it me, if the dead rise not? let us eat and most harrowing thoughts to the apostolic Christians was the fear lest their departed brethren should, by a premature death, be debarred from that communion with the Lord which they hoped to enjoy; and in itself nothing could be more disheartening to the Christian's hope than to find that Christians had lived and died in vain."

xv. 19. The English version fails to give the full sense. The words are, "If in this life in Christ we have been hoping only;" that is, as Alford explains, "If all we have done is merely having drink; for to-morrow we die. 33 Be not deceived; evil communications corrupt good manners. 34 Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame.

COMBATS WITH WILD ANIMALS.—VER. 32.

In this passage the apostle establishes the truth of the resurrection of the dead, the holy dead, the dead in Christ,

First. On the resurrection of Christ. 1. Because he is indeed "the firstfruits of them that slept," ver. 20. He is truly risen himself, and he is risen in this very quality and character, as the firstfruits of them that sleep in him. As he is assuredly risen, so in his resurrection there is as much an earnest given that the dead in him shall rise as there was that the Jewish harvest in general should be accepted and blessed by the offering and acceptance of the firstfruits. The whole lump was made holy by the consecration of the firstfruits, Rom. xi. 16; and the whole body of Christ, all that are by faith united to him, are by his resurrection ascertained of their own. As he is risen they shall rise; just as the lump is holy, because the firstfruits are so. He is not risen merely for himself, but as head of the body the church; and those that sleep in him God will bring with him, 1 Thes. ix. 14. Note, Christ's resurrection is a pledge and earnest of ours, if we are true believers in him; because he is risen, we shall rise. We are a part of the consecrated lump, and shall partake of the acceptance and favour vouchsafed the firstfruits. This is the first argument used by the apostle in confirmation of the truth; and it is, 2. Illustrated by a parallel between the first and second Adam. "For since by man came death," it was every way proper that by man should come deliverance from it, or, which is all one, a resurrection, ver. 21; and so, "as in Adam all die, in Christ shall all be made alive." As through the sin of the first Adam all men became mortal, [they incurred spiritual as well as natural death,] because all men derived from him the same sinful nature, so, through the merit and resurrection of Christ, shall all that are made to partake of his Spirit, and the spiritual nature, [all who are under the covenant of grace, whose covenant head he is, the elect of God,] revive, and become immortal. All that die through the sin of Adam. All that are raised, in the sense of the apostle, rise through the merit and power of Christ; but the meaning is not, that, as all men died in Adam, so all men without exception shall be made alive in Christ; for the scope of the apostle's argument restrains the general meaning. Christ rose as the firstfruits; therefore those that are Christ's, ver. 23, shall rise too. From hence it will not follow that all men without exception shall rise too; but it will fitly follow that all who thus rise, rise in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and so that their revival is owing to the man Christ Jesus, as the mortality of all mankind was owing to the first man; and so as by man came death, by man came deliverance. Thus it seemed fit to the Divine wisdom, that, as the first Adam ruined his posterity by sin, the second Adam should raise his seed to a glorious immortality. Before he leaves the argument, he observes, 3. That there will be an order observed in their resurrection. What that precisely will be we are nowhere told, but in the general only here, that there will be order observed. Possibly they may rise first who have held the highest rank, and done the most eminent service, or suffered the most grievous evils or cruel deaths for Christ's sake. It is only here said, that the firstfruits are supposed to rise first, and afterward all that are Christ's when he shall come again; not that Christ's resurrection must in fact go before the resurrection of any of his, but it must be laid as the foundation: as it was not necessary that those who lived remote from Jerusalem must go thither and offer the firstfruits before they could account the lump holy, but yet they must be set apart for this purpose till they could be offered, which might be done at any time from Pentecost till the feast of dedication: see Bishop Patrick on Num. xxvi. 2. The offering of the firstfruits was what made the lump holy, and the lump was made holy by this offering, though it was not made before the harvest was gathered in, so it were set apart for that end, and duly offered afterwards. So Christ's resurrection must in order of nature precede that of his saints, though some of these might rise in order of time before him. It is because he is risen that they rise. Note, Those that are Christ's must rise [to glory], [but only] because of their relation to him, [while those that are not Christ's shall be raised to the resurrection of condemnation.]

Secondly. He argues from the continuance of the mediatorial kingdom till all Christ's enemies are destroyed, the last of which is death, ver. 24—26. He hoped in this life, and if it is then to end, and that hope have no result." "Most miserable;" "most to be pitied;" referring to the delusion under which Christians would live, and the disappointment they were destined to experience.

xv. 29. "Alford thinks that there is an allusion to a practice at Corinth of baptising a living person on behalf of a friend who died unbaptised. Thus St. Paul, without giving the least sanction to the practice, uses an ad hominem argument from it against its practisers, is risen, and upon his resurrection was invested with sovereign empire, had all power in heaven and earth put into his hand, Mat. xxviii. 18; had a name given him above every name, that every knee might bow to him, and every tongue confess him Lord, Phil. ii. 9-11. And the administration of this kingdom must continue in his hands till all opposing power and rule and authority be put down, ver. 24; till all enemies are put under his feet, ver. 25; and till the last enemy is destroyed, which is death, ver. 26. Now this argument implies in it all these particulars. 1. That our Saviour rose from the dead to have all power put into his hands, and have and administer a kingdom as Mediator; "For this end he both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living," Rom. xiv. 9. 2. That this mediatorial kingdom is to have an end, at least as far as it is concerned in bringing his people safe to glory, and subduing all his and their enemies; "Then cometh the end," ver. 24. 3. That it is not to have an end till all opposing power be put down, and all enemies brought to his feet, ver. 24, 25. 4. That among other enemies death must be destroyed (ver. 26) or abolished; its power over his members must be annulled. Thus far the apostle is express, but he leaves us to make the inference that therefore the saints must rise, else death and the grave would have power over them, nor would our Saviour's kingly power prevail against the last enemy of his people, and annul its power. When saints shall live again, and die no more, then, and not till then, is death abolished, which must be brought about before our Saviour's mediatorial kingdom is delivered up, which yet must be in due time. The saints therefore shall live again, and die no more.

This is the scope of the argument; but the apostle drops several hints in the course of it that will be properly noticed. As, 1st. That our Saviour, as man, and Mediator between God and man, has a delegated royalty,—a kingdom given. "All things are put under him, he excepted that did put all things under him," ver. 27. As man, all his authority must be delegated. And though his mediation supposes [absolutely implies] his Divine nature, yet as Mediator he does not so explicitly sustain the character of God, but a middle person between God and man, partaking of both natures, (he acts not according to both natures,) human and Divine, as he was to reconcile both parties, God and man, and receiving commission and authority from God the Father to act in this office. The Father appears, in this whole dispensation, in the majesty, and with the authority, of God. The Son made man appears as the minister of the Father, though he is God as well as the Father. Nor is this passage to be understood of the eternal dominion over all his creatures, which belongs to him as God, but of a kingdom committed to him as Mediator and God-man, and that chiefly after his resurrection, when, having overcome, he sat down with his Father on his throne, Rev. iii. 21. Then was the prediction verified, "I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion," Ps. ii. 6, placed him on his throne. This is meant by the phrase, so frequent in the writings of the New Testament, of "sitting at the right hand of God," Mar. xvi. 19; Rom. viii. 34; Col. iii. 1, &c.; "on the right hand of power," Mar. xiv. 62; Lu. xx. 69; "on the right hand of the Majesty on high," Heb. i. 3; "on the right hand of the throne of God," Heb. xii. 2; "on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens," Heb. viii. 1. Sitting down in this seat is taking upon him the exercise of this mediatorial power and royalty, which was done upon his ascension into heaven, Mar. xvi. 19; and it is spoken of in Scripture as a recompense made him for his deep humiliation and self-abasement in becoming man, and dying for man the accursed death of the cross, Phil. ii. 6-12. Upon his ascension he was made "head over all things to the church," had power given him to govern and protect it against all its enemies, and in the end destroy them, and complete the salvation of all that believe in him. This is not a power appertaining to Godhead as such; it is not original and unlimited power, but power given and limited to special purposes; and, though he who has it is God, yet (inasmuch as he is somewhat else besides God, and in this whole dispensation acts not as God, but as Mediator, not as the offended Majesty, but as one interposing in favour of his offending creatures, and this by virtue of his consent and commission who acts and appears always in that character,) he may properly be said to have this power given him. He may reign as God with power unlimited, and yet may reign as Mediator with a power delegated, and limited to these particular purposes. 2nd. That this delegated royalty must sometimes be delivered up to the Father from whom it was received, ver. 24; for it is a power received for particular ends and purposes, a power to govern and protect his church till all the members of it are gathered in, and the enemies of it for ever subdued and destroyed, ver. 25, 26. And when these ends shall be obtained there is no need that the power and authority should be continued. The Redeemer must reign till his enemies are destroyed, and the salvation of his church and people is accomplished; and when this end is attained then will he deliver up the power which he had only for this purpose, though he may continue to reign over his glorified church and body in heaven; and in this sense it may notwithstanding be said, that "He shall reign for ever and ever," Rev. xi. 15; "that he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Lu. i. 33; "that his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away," Dan. vii. 14; see also Mic. iv. 7. 3rd. The Redeemer shall certainly reign till the very last enemy of his people is destroyed, till death itself be abolished, till his saints revive, and recover perfect life, never to be in fear or danger of dying any more. He shall have all power in heaven and earth till then; "He who loved us, and gave himself for us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood;" he who is so nearly related to us, and so much concerned for us. What support should this be to his saints in every hour of distress and temptation! "He is alive who was dead, and liveth for ever," and doth reign, and will continue to reign, till the redemption of his people be completed, and the utter ruin of their enemies effected. 4th. When this is done, "and all things are put under his feet, then shall the Son become subject to him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all," ver. 28. The meaning of which I take to be, that then the man Christ Jesus, who has appeared in so much majesty during the whole administration of this kingdom, shall appear, upon the giving it up, to be a subject of the Father. Things are in Scripture many times said to be, when they are manifested and made to appear; and this delivering up the kingdom will make it manifest that he who appeared in the majesty of the Sovereign King was during this administration a subject of God. The glorified humanity of our Lord Jesus Christ, with all the dignity and power conferred on it, was no more than a glorious creature. This will appear when the kingdom shall be delivered up; and it will appear to the Divine glory, that God may be all in all, that is, that the accomplishment of our salvation may appear all over Divine, and God alone may have the honour of it. Note, Though the human nature must be employed in the work of our redemption, yet God was all in all in it. It was the Lord's doing, and shall be marvellous in our eyes.

[The Son also himself.] The term "Son of God" is applied to the Lord Jesus with reference to his human nature, his incarnation by the Holy Ghost, and his resurrection from the dead: see note on Rom. i. 4. It refers, I apprehend, to that in this place. It does not mean that the second person in the Trinity, as such, should be subject to the first; but it means the incarnate Son, the Mediator,—the man that was born and that was raised from the dead, and to whom this wide dominion had been given,—should resign that dominion, and that the government should be reassumed by the Divinity as God. As man he shall cease to exercise any distinct dominion. This does not mean, evidently, that the union of the Divine and human nature will be dissolved; nor that important purposes may not be answered by that continued union for ever; nor that the Divine perfections may not shine forth in some glorious way through the man Christ Jesus; but that the purpose of government shall no longer be exercised in that way; the mediatorial kingdom, as such, shall no longer be continued, and power shall be exercised by God as God. The redeemed will still adore their Redeemer as their incarnate God, and dwell upon the remembrance of his work and upon his perfections, (Rev. i. 5, 6; v. 12; xi. 15;) but not as exercising the peculiar power which he now has, which was needful to effect their redemption;—"That God may be all in all;" that God may be supreme; that the Divinity, the Godhead, may rule; and that it may be seen that he is the Sovereign over all the universe. By the word "God," (ὁ Θεός;) Whitby and Hammond, I think correctly, understand the Godhead, the Divine nature, the Divinity, consisting of the Three Persons, without respect to any peculiar office or kingdom.—A. B.]

Thirdly. He argues for the resurrection, from the case of those that were baptized for the dead; ver. 29, "What shall they do who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not? Why are they baptized for the dead?" What shall they do, if the dead rise not? What have they done? How vain a thing hath their baptism been! Must they stand by it, or renounce it? Why are they baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not? ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν. But what is this baptism for the dead? It is necessary to be known, that the apostle's argument may be understood; whether it be only argumentum ad hominem or ad rem, whether it concludes for the thing in dispute universally, or only against the particular persons who were baptized for the dead. But who shall interpret this very obscure passage, which, though it consists of no more than three words, besides the articles, has had more than three times three senses put on it by interpreters? it not being agreed what is meant by baptism, whether it be to be taken in a proper or figurative sense, and if in a proper sense, whether it be to be understood of Christian baptism properly so called, or other ablution. And as little is it agreed who are the dead, or in what sense the proposition ὑπὲρ is to be taken. Some understand the dead of our Saviour himself: see Whitby in loc. Why are persons baptized in the name of a dead Saviour, a Saviour who remains among the dead, if the dead rise not? But it is, I believe, an instance perfectly singular for οἱ νεκροί to mean no more than one dead person. It is a signification the words have nowhere else. And the οἱ βαπτίζοντες, 'the baptized,' seem plainly to mean some particular persons, not Christians in general, which yet must be the signification, if the οἱ νεκροί, 'the dead,' be understood of our Saviour. Some understand the passage of the martyrs. Why do they suffer martyrdom for their religion? This is sometimes called the baptism of blood by the ancients, and, by our Saviour himself, baptism indefinitely, Mat. xx. 22; Lu. xii. 50. But in what sense can they that die martyrs for their religion be said to be baptized, that is, die martyrs, for the dead? Some understand it of a custom that was observed, as some of the ancients tell us, among many that professed the Christian name in the first ages, of baptizing some in the name and stead of catechumens dying without baptism. But this savoured of such superstition, that, if the custom had prevailed in the church so soon, the apostle would hardly have mentioned it without signifying a dislike of it. Some understand it of baptizing over the dead, which was a custom they tell us that early obtained; and this to testify their hope of the resurrection. This sense is pertinent to the apostle's argument, but it appears not that any such practice was in use in the apostle's time. Others understand it of those who have been baptized for the sake, or on occasion, of the martyrs, that is, the constancy with which they died for their religion. Some there were, doubtless, converted to Christianity by observing this; and it would have been a vain thing for persons to have become Christians upon this motive, if the martyrs, by losing their lives for religion, became utterly extinct, and were to live no more. But the church at Corinth had not in all probability suffered much persecution at this time, or seen many instances of martyrdom among them, nor many converts made by the constancy and firmness which the martyrs discovered—not to observe, that οἱ νεκροί seems to be too general an expression to mean only the martyred dead. It is as easy an explication of the phrase as any I have met with, and as pertinent to the argument, to suppose οἱ νεκροί to mean some among the Corinthians who had been taken off by the hand of God. We read that many were sickly among them, and many slept, ch. xi. 38, because of their disorderly behaviour at the Lord's table. These executions might terrify some into Christianity, as the miraculous earthquake did the jailer, Acts xv. 29, &c. Persons baptized on such an occasion might be properly said to be baptized for the dead, that is, on their account. And the οἱ βαπτίζοντες, 'the baptized,' and the οἱ νεκροί, 'the dead,' answer to one another; and upon this supposition the Corinthians could not mistake the apostle's meaning. Now, says he, what shall they do, and why were they baptized, if the dead rise not? You have a general persuasion these men have done right, and acted wisely, and as they ought, on this occasion; but why, if the dead rise not? seeing they may perhaps hasten their death by provoking a jealous God, and have no hopes beyond it? But whether this be the meaning, or whatever else it be, doubtless the apostle's argument was good, and intelligible to the Corinthians. (Doddridge renders it, 'in the room of the dead, who are just fallen in the cause of Christ, but are yet supported by a succession of new converts, who immediately offer themselves to fill up their places, as ranks of soldiers that advance to the combat in the room of their companions who have just been slain in their sight.'—A. B. T. Scott approves of this interpretation.) And his next is as plain to us.

Fourthly. He argues from the absurdity of his own and other Christians' conduct upon this supposition.

1. It would be a foolish thing for them to run so many hazards; ver. 30, "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" Why do we expose ourselves to continual peril—we Christians, especially we apostles? Every one knows that it was dangerous being a Christian, and much more a preacher and apostle, at that time. Now, saith the apostle, what fools are we to run these hazards, if we have no better hopes beyond death,—if, when we die, we die wholly, and revive no more! Note, Christianity were a foolish profession if it proposed no hopes beyond this life, at least in such hazardous times as attended the first profession of it. It required men to risk all the blessings and comforts of this life, and to face and endure all the evils of it, without any future prospects. And is this a character of his religion fit for a Christian to endure? And must he not fix this character on it, if he gives up his future hopes, and denies the resurrection of the dead? This argument the apostle brings home to himself; "I protest," says he, "by your rejoicing in Christ Jesus," that is, by all the comforts of Christianity, all the peculiar succours and supports of our holy faith, that "I die daily," ver. 31. He was in continual danger of death, and carried his life, as we say, in his hand. And why should he thus expose himself if he had no hopes after life? To live in daily view and expectation of death, and yet have no prospect beyond it, must be very heartless and uncomfortable, and his case upon this account a very melancholy one. He had need be very well assured of the resurrection of the dead, or he was guilty of extreme weakness in hazarding all that was dear to him in this world, and his life into the bargain. He had encountered very great difficulties, and there some of whom, though using it, denied the resurrection. Bengel translates, 'Over (immediately upon) the dead—i.e., who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. The price they get for their trouble is, that they should be gathered to the dead for ever. Many in the ancient Church put off baptism till near death.' This seems the better view, though there may have been some rites of symbolical baptism at Corinth, now unknown, perhaps grounded on Jesus' words (Mat. xx. 22, 23), which St. Paul here alludes to."

xv. 31. "Your rejoicing," &c.: rather, "by the glorying which I have concerning you" (they were his "crown and rejoicing" as his converts). "I die daily," i.e., am daily in expectation of death.

xv. 32. "After the manner of men," i.e., merely as man, without any hope beyond the grave. "Fought with beasts," not literally; his rights of Roman citizenship would preclude his being thrown to the beasts. It must refer to some violent opposition which St. Paul had met with at Ephesus, the particulars of which are not recorded.

enemies; he had "fought with beasts at Ephesus," ver. 32, and was in danger of being pulled to pieces by an enraged multitude, stirred up by Demetrius and the other craftsmen, Acts xix. 28; though some understand this literally of Paul's being exposed to fight with wild beasts in the amphitheatre at a

AMPHITHEATRE AT EPHESUS.

Roman show in that city, and Nicephorus tells a formal story to this purpose, and of the miraculous complaisance of the lions to him, when they came near him. But so remarkable a trial and circumstance of his life, methinks, would not have been passed over by Luke, and much less by himself, when he gives us so large and particular a detail of his sufferings, 2 Cor. xi. 24-33. When he mentions that he was five times scourged of the Jews, thrice beaten with rods, once stoned, thrice shipwrecked, it is strange he should not have said he was once exposed to fight with the beasts. I take it, therefore, that this fighting with beasts is a figurative expression; the beasts intended were men of a fierce and feline disposition, and that this refers to the passage above cited. Now, saith he, what advantage have I from such contests, "if the dead rise not?" Why should I die daily, expose myself daily to the danger of dying by violent hands, if the dead rise not? And if post mortem nihil,—"if I am to perish by death, and expect nothing after it, could any thing be more weak? And was Paul so senseless? Had he given the Corinthians any ground to entertain such a thought of him? If he had not been well assured death would have been to his advantage, would he in this stupid manner have thrown away his life? Could any thing but the sure hopes of a better life after death have extinguished the love of life in him to this degree? "What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" What can I propose to myself? Note, It is very lawful and fit for a Christian to propose advantage to himself by his fidelity to God. Thus did Paul; thus did our blessed Lord himself, Heb. xii. 2; and thus we are bid to do after his example, and "have our fruit to holiness, that our end may be everlasting life." This is the very end of our faith, namely, the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. i. 9; not only what it will issue in, but what we should aim at.

2. It would be a much wiser thing to take the comforts of this life; "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," ver. 32, turn epicures: thus this sentence means in the prophet, Isa. xxii. 13. Let us even live like beasts, if we must die like them. This would be a wiser course, if there be no resurrection, no after-life or state, than to abandon all the pleasures of life, and offer and expose ourselves to all the miseries of life, and live in continual peril of perishing by savage rage and cruelty. This passage also plainly implies, as I have hinted above, that those who denied the resurrection among the Corinthians were perfect Sadducees, of whose principles we have this account in the holy writings, that they say, "There is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit," Acts xxiii. 8, that is, that the man is all body,—that there is nothing in him to survive the body; nor will that, when once he is dead, ever revive again. Such Sadducees were the men against whom the apostle argues here. Otherwise, his arguments had no force in them; for, though the body should never revive, yet as long as the mind survived it he might have much advantage from all the hazards he ran for Christ's sake. Nay, it is certain that the mind is to be the principal seat and subject of the heavenly glory and happiness. But if there be no hopes after death, would not every wise man prefer an easy, comfortable life before such a wretched one as the apostle led? nay, and endeavour to enjoy the comforts of life as fast as possible, because the continuance of it is short? Note, Nothing but the hopes of better things hereafter can enable a man to forego all the comforts and pleasures here, and embrace poverty, contempt, misery, and death. Thus did the apostles and primitive Christians; but how wretched was their case, and how foolish their conduct, if they deceived themselves, and abused the world with vain and false hopes!

Fifthly. The apostle closes his argument with a caution, exhortation, and reproof. 1. A caution against the dangerous conversation of ill men, men of loose lives and principles. "Be not deceived," says he, "evil communications corrupt good manners," ver. 33. Possibly some of those who said there was no resurrection of the dead were men of loose lives, and endeavoured to countenance their vicious practices by so corrupt a principle, and had that speech often in their mouths, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Now, the apostle grants that this talk was to the purpose if there were no future state; but, having confuted their principle, he now warns the Corinthians how dangerous such men's conversation must prove. He tells them they would likely be corrupted by them, and fall in with their course of life, if they gave in to their evil principles. Note, Bad company and conversation are likely to make bad men. Those who would keep their innocence must keep good company. Error and vice are infectious, and if we would avoid the contagion we must keep clear of those who have taken it. "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but a companion of fools shall be destroyed," Pr. xiii. 20. 2. Here is an exhortation to break off their sins and rouse themselves, and lead a more holy and righteous life; ver. 34, "Awake to righteousness," or awake righteously, ἐκνήψατε δικαιοσύνην; "and sin not," or sin no more, [or awake, as you ought, and ear no more from the truth.] Rouse yourselves, break off your sins by repentance; renounce and forsake every evil way, correct whatever is amiss, and do not by sloth and stupidity be led away into such conversation and principles as will sap your Christian hopes, and corrupt your practice. The disbelief of a future state destroys all virtue and piety. But the best improvement to be made of the truth is, to cease from sin, and set ourselves to the business of religion, and that in good earnest. If there will be a resurrection and a future life, we should live and act as those that believe it; and should not give into such senseless and sottish notions as will debauch our morals, and render us loose and sensual in our lives. 3. Here is a reproof, and a sharp one, to some at least among them: "Some of you have not the knowledge of God; I speak this to your shame." Note, It is a shame in [professed] Christians not to have the knowledge of God. Christian religion gives the best information that can be had about God, his nature, and grace, and government. Those who profess this religion reproach themselves by remaining without the knowledge of God; for it must be owing to their own sloth and slight of God that they are ignorant of him. And is it not a horrid shame for a [declared] Christian to slight God, and be so wretchedly ignorant in matters that so nearly and highly concern him? Note also, That it must be ignorance of God that leads men into the disbelief of a resurrection and future life. Those that know God know that he will not abandon his faithful servants, and leave them exposed to such hardships and sufferings without any recompense or reward. They would know he is not unfaithful, nor unkind, to forget their labour and patience, their faithful services and cheerful sufferings, nor let their labour be in vain. But I am apt to think the expression has a much stronger meaning—that there were atheistical people among them that hardly owned a God, or one that had any concern with, or took any cognizance of, human affairs, [perhaps some of the false teachers.] These were a scandal and shame to any Christian church indeed. Note, Real atheism lies at the bottom of men's disbelief of a future state. Those who own a God and a providence, and observe how unequal the distributions of the present life are, and how frequently the best men fare worst, can hardly doubt an after state. [But it is the gospel scheme only that clears up all difficulties, and vindicates the Divine government.]

35 But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come? 36 Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die: 37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: 38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. 39 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. 40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. 41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory. 42 So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: 43 It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: 44 It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. 45 And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. 46 Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. 47 The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven. 48 As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. 49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. 50 Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

The apostle comes now to answer a plausible and principal objection against the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, concerning which observe the proposal of the objection; "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up, xv. 36. "Thou fool:" emphatic, with appeal to the objector's own experience. St. Paul shows from the natural world, first, that death precedes the quickening into life of the seed; and secondly, the difference between the seed and the after-plant, and so meets some plausible objections to the resurrection.

xv. 39-42. "As the kinds of flesh, however widely differing from one another, are still bodies, all this is to illustrate the difference of the new celestial body from its terrestrial seed, whilst retaining a substantial identity. As the various fountains of light, which is so similar in its aspect and properties, differ (the sun from the moon, and the moon from the stars, and even one star from another star, though all seem so much alike), so there is nothing unreasonable in the doctrine that our present bodies differ from our resurrection bodies, though still continuing bodies."

xv. 44. "The expression 'natural body' denotes, in general, an organisation that corresponds to the soul, and 'spiritual body' one and with what body do they come?" ver. 35. The objection is plainly twofold: "How are they raised up? that is, by what means? How should they be raised? what power is equal to this effect?" It was an opinion that prevailed much among the heathens, and the Sadducees seem to have been in the same sentiment, that it was not within the compass of Divine power, mortales aternitate donare, aut revocare defunctos,—to make men immortal, or revive and restore the dead. Such sort of men they seem to have been who, among the Corinthians, denied the resurrection of the dead, and object here, how are they raised? How should they be raised? Is it not utterly impossible? The second part of the objection is about the quality of their bodies who shall rise; "With what body will they come?" Will it be with the same body? with like shape, and form, and stature, and members, and qualities, or various? The former objection is that of those who opposed the doctrine, the latter the enquiry of curious doubters.

First. To the former the apostle answers, by telling them this was to be brought about by Divine power, that very power which they had all observed to do somewhat very like it year after year, in the death and revival of the corn; and therefore it was an argument of great weakness and stupidity to doubt whether the resurrection of the dead might not be effected by the same power. "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened unless it die," ver. 36. It must first corrupt before it will quicken and spring up; it not only sprouts after it is dead, but it must die that it may live. And why should any be so foolish as to imagine that the man once dead cannot be made to live again by the same power which every year brings the dead grain to life? This is the substance of what he answers to the first question. Note, It is a foolish thing to question the Divine Power to raise the dead, when we see him every day quickening and reviving things that are dead.

Secondly. But he is longer in answering the second inquiry. He begins, 1. By observing that there is a change made in the seed that is sown. "It is not that body which shall be" that is sown, "but bare grain" of wheat or barley, &c., but God gives it such a body as he will, and in such way as he will, only so as to distinguish every kind from each other. Every seed sown has its proper body, is constituted of such materials, and figured in such a manner, as is proper for it, proper to that kind. This is plainly in the Divine power, though we no more know how it is done than we know how a dead man is raised to life again. It is certain the grain undergoes a great change; and it is intimated in this passage that so will the dead, when they rise again and live again in their bodies after death.

2. He proceeds hence to observe, that there is a great deal of variety among other bodies, as there is among plants; as, 1st. In bodies of flesh; "All flesh is not the same." That of men is of one kind, that of beasts another, that of fishes another, and that of birds another, ver. 39. There is variety in all the kinds, and somewhat peculiar in every kind to distinguish it from the other. 2nd. In bodies celestial and terrestrial there is also a difference; and what is for the glory of one is not for the other, for the true glory of every being consists in its fitness for its rank and state. Earthly bodies are not adapted to the heavenly regions, nor heavenly bodies fitted to the condition of earthly beings. Nay, 3rd. There is a variety of glory among heavenly bodies themselves: "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differs from another star in glory," ver. 41. All this is to intimate to us that the bodies of the dead, when they rise, will be so far changed that they will be fitted for the heavenly regions, and that there will be a variety of glories among the bodies of the dead when they shall be raised, as there is among the sun, and moon, and stars, nay, among the stars themselves. And all this carries an intimation along with it that it must be as easy to Divine power to raise the dead, and recover their mouldered bodies, as out of the same materials to form so many different kinds of flesh and plants, and, for aught we know, celestial bodies as well as terrestrial ones. The sun and stars may, for aught we know, be composed of the same materials as the earth we tread on, though so much refined and changed by the Divine skill and power; and can he, out of the same materials, form such various beings, and yet not be able to raise the dead? Having thus prepared the way, he comes,

3. To speak directly to the point. "So also," saith he, "is the resurrection of the dead;" so as the plant growing out of the putrified grain, so as no longer to be a terrestrial but a celestial body, and varying in glory from the other dead who are raised, as one star doth from another. But he instances some particulars, as, 1st. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." "It is sown;" burying the dead is like sowing them; it is like committing the seed to the earth, that it may spring out of it again. And our bodies that are sown are corruptible, liable to putrify and moulder, and crumble to dust; but when we rise they will be out of the power of the grave, and never more be liable to corruption. 2nd. "It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory:" ours is at present a vile body, Phil. iii. 21. Nothing is more loathsome than a dead body; it is thrown into the grave "as a despised and broken vessel, in which there is no pleasure;" but at the resurrection a glory will be put upon it, it will be made like the glorious body of our Saviour. It will be purged from all the dregs of earth and refined into ethereal substance, and shine out with a splendour resembling his. 3rd. "It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power." It is laid in the earth a poor helpless thing, wholly in the power of death, deprived of all vital capacities and powers, of life and strength; it is utterly unable to move or stir. But when we rise, our bodies will have heavenly life and vigour infused into them. They shall be hale, and firm, and durable, and lively, and liable no more to any infirmity, weakness, or decay. 4th. "It is sown a natural" or animal "body;" σῶμα ψυχικόν, a body fitted to the low condition and sensitive pleasures and enjoyments of this life, which are all gross in comparison with the heavenly state and enjoyments. But when we rise it will be quite otherwise; our body will rise spiritual. Not that body will be changed into spirit, this would be a contradiction in our common conceptions; it would be as much as to say, body changed into what is not body, matter made immaterial. The expression is to be understood comparatively. We shall at the resurrection have bodies purified and refined to the last degree, made light and agile; and, though they are not changed into spirit, yet made fit to be perpetual associates of spirits made perfect. And why should it not be as much in the power of God to raise incorruptible, glorious, lively, spiritual bodies, out of the ruins of those vile, corruptible, lifeless, and animal ones, as first to make matter out of nothing, and then out of the same mass of matter produce such variety of beings both in earth and heaven? To God all things are possible; and this cannot be impossible.

4. He illustrates this by a comparison of the first and second Adam. "There is an animal body," saith he, "and there is a spiritual body," and then goes into the comparison in several instances: as, 1st. As we have our natural body, the animal body we have in this world from the first Adam, we expect our spiritual body from the second. This is implied in the whole comparison. 2nd. And this is but consonant to the different characters these two persons bear. "The first Adam was made a living soul," [a living animated being,] such a being as our-elves, and with a power of propagating such beings as himself, and conveying to them a nature and animal body like his own, but none other nor better. "The second Adam is a quickening spirit;" he is "the resurrection and the life," Ino. xi. 25; "He hath life in himself, and quickeneth whom he will," Ino. v. 20, 21; "The first man was of the earth," made out of the earth, and was "earthly;" his body was fitted to the region of his abode; but "the second Adam is the Lord from heaven," he who came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world, Ino. vi. 33; he who came down from heaven, and was in heaven at the same time, Ino. iii. 13; the Lord of heaven and earth. If the first Adam could communicate to us natural and animal bodies, cannot the second Adam make our bodies spiritual ones? If the deputed lord of this lower creation could do the one, cannot the Lord from heaven, the Lord of heaven and earth, do the other? 3rd. We must first have natural bodies from the first Adam, before we can have spiritual bodies from the second, ver. 46. We must bear the image of the earthly before we can bear the image of the heavenly; such is the established order of providence. We must have weak, frail, mortal bodies by descent from the first Adam, before we can have lively, spiritual, and immortal ones by the quickening power of the second. We must die before we can live to die no more. 4th. Yet if we are Christ's, true believers in him, (for this whole discourse relates to the resurrection of the saints,) it is as certain that we shall have spiritual bodies as it is now that we have natural or animal ones. By these we are as the first Adam, earthly, we bear his image; by those we shall be as the second Adam, have bodies like his own, heavenly, and so bear his image; and we are as certainly intended to bear the one as we have borne the other. As sure, therefore, as we have had natural bodies we shall have spiritual ones. The dead in Christ shall not only rise, but shall rise thus gloriously changed.

5. He sums up this argument by assigning the reason of this change; ver. 50, "Now this I say, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor doth corruption inherit incorruption." The natural body is flesh and blood, consisting of bones, muscles, nerves, veins, arteries, and their several fluids; and as such it is of a corruptible frame and form, liable to dissolution, to rot and moulder. But no such thing shall inherit the heavenly regions; for this were for corruption to inherit incorruption, which is little better than a contradiction in terms. The heavenly inheritance is incorruptible, and never fadeth away, 1 Pet. i. 4. How can this be possessed by flesh and blood, which is corruptible, and will fade away? It must be changed into ever-enduring substance before it can be capable of possessing the heavenly inheritance. The sum is, that the bodies of the saints, when they shall rise again, will be greatly changed from what they are now, and much for the better. They are now corruptible flesh and blood; they will be then incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual bodies, fitted to the celestial world and state, where they are ever afterwards to dwell and have their eternal inheritance.

51 Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, 52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. 53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. 54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. 55 O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? 56 The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. 57 But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

To confirm what he had said of this change he here

First. Tells them what had been concealed from them, or unknown to them till then, that all the saints should not die, but all would be changed. They that are alive at our Lord's coming will be caught up into the clouds, without dying, 1 Thess. iv. 17. But it is plain, from this passage, that it will not be without changing from corruption to incorruption. The frame of their living bodies shall be thus altered, as well as those that are dead, and this "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," ver. 52. What cannot almighty power effect? That power that calls the dead into life can surely thus soon and suddenly change the living—for changed they must be as well as the dead, because "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God." This is the mystery which the apostle shews the Corinthians; "Behold, I shew you a mystery," or bring into open light a truth dark and unknown before. Note, There are many mysteries shewn to us in the Gospel; many truths that before were utterly unknown are there made known; many truths that were but dark and obscure before are there brought into open day, and plainly revealed; and many things are in part revealed that will never be fully known nor perhaps clearly understood. The apostle here makes known a truth unknown before, namely, that the saints living at our Lord's second coming would not die, but be changed; that this change would be made "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and at the sound of the last trump." For, as he tells us elsewhere, "The Lord himself shall descend with a shout, with the voice of an archangel and the trump of God," 1 Thess. iv. 16, so here the trumpet must sound. It is the loud summons of all the living and all the dead, to come and appear at the tribunal of Christ. At this summons the graves shall open, the dead saints shall rise incorruptible, and the living saints be changed into the same incorruptible state, ver. 52.

Secondly. He assigns the reason of this change; ver. 53, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." How otherwise could the man be a fit inhabitant of the incorruptible regions, or be fitted to possess the eternal inheritance? How can that which is corruptible and mortal enjoy what is incorruptible, permanent, and immortal? This corruptible body must be made incorruptible, this mortal body must be changed into immortal, that the man may be capable of enjoying the happiness designed for him. Note, It is "this corruptible must put on incorruption," the demolished fabric that must be reared again. What is sown must be quickened. Saints will come in their own bodies, ver. 38, not in other bodies.

Thirdly. He lets us know what will follow upon this change of the living and dead in Christ. "Then shall be brought to pass that saying, Death is swallowed that corresponds to the spirit. The former is one which carries the impress of the soul, the other the impress of the spirit. The soul is that by means of which our spiritual part is linked to a physical life—a life of impulse and sensation, dependent for its nourishment upon a world of sense. The corporeity corresponding to this, and determined by it, is precisely on this account made dependent upon this outward world and is affected by it; and by reason of it it is exposed to all that which has just been expressed by the words 'corruption,'

'dishonour,' 'weakness,' of which death is the catastrophe. The nature of the spirit is, on the contrary, a free, super-mundane life of light and love in God; and the spiritual body is an organisation suited to its character, being lifted above all dependence on the outward world and the consequences following from it, and displays itself in incorruption, glory, and power" (Kling). "There is a natural body," &c.: rather, "If there is a natural body, there is also," &c.

xv. 54. "Death is swallowed up in victory;" see Isa. xlv. 8.

up in victory," or, He will swallow up death in victory, [unto victory, so that victory is obtained.] Isa. xxv. 8; for "mortality shall be then swallowed up of life," 2 Cor. v. 4; and death perfectly subdued and conquered, and saints for ever delivered from its power. Such a conquest shall be obtained over it that it shall for ever disappear in those regions to which our Lord will bear his risen saints, and therefore will the saints hereupon sing their ἐπαινον, their song of triumph. Then, when this mortal shall have put on immortality, will death be swallowed up, for ever swallowed up, εἰς νίκην. Christ hinders it from swallowing his saints when they die; but when they rise again, death shall, as to them, be swallowed up for ever, and upon this destruction of death will they break out into a song of triumph.

1. They will glory over death as a vanquished enemy, and insult this great and terrible destroyer. "O death, where is thy sting?" "Where is now thy sting, thy power to hurt? What mischief hast thou done us? We were dead, but behold we live again, and shall die no more. Thou art vanquished and disarmed, and we are out of the reach of thy deadly dart. Where now is thy fatal artillery, thy stores of death? We fear no farther mischiefs from thee, nor heed thy weapons, but defy thy power and despise thy wrath." And, "O grave, where is thy victory?" "Where now is thy victory? what is become of it? where are the spoils and trophies of it? Once we were thy prisoners, but the prison doors are burst open, the locks and bolts have been forced to give way, and our shackles are knocked off, and we are for ever released."

"Captivity is taken captive." The imaginary victor is conquered, and forced to resign his conquests and release his captives. Thy triumphs, grave, are at an end. The bands of death are loosed, and we are at liberty, and are never more to be hurt by death or imprisoned in the grave. In a moment the power of death, and the conquests and spoils of the grave, are gone; and, as to the saints, the very signs of them will not remain. Where are they? Thus will they raise themselves, when they become immortal; and, to the honour of their Saviour and the praise of Divine grace, glory over vanquished death.

2. The foundation for this triumph is here intimated. 1st. In the account given whence death had its power to hurt. "The sting of death is sin," that gives venom to his dart, that only puts it into the power of death to hurt and kill. And sin unpardoned, and nothing else, can keep any under his power; and "the strength of sin is the law." It is the Divine threatening against the transgressors of the law, the curse there denounced, that gives power to sin. Note, Sin is the parent of death, and gives it all its hurtful power; "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin," Rom. v. 12; it is its cursed progeny and offspring. 2nd. In the account given of the victory saints obtain over it through Jesus Christ, ver. 57. The sting of death is sin, but Christ, by dying, has taken out this sting; he has made atonement for sin, he has obtained remission of it, [for God's elect.] It may hiss, therefore, but it cannot hurt. "The strength of sin is the law," but the curse of the law is removed by our Redeemer's becoming a curse for us; so that sin is deprived of its strength and sting through Christ, that is, by his incarnation, suffering, and death. Death may seize the believer, but cannot sting him, cannot hold him in its power. There is a day coming when the grave shall open, the bands of death be loosed, the dead saints revive, and become incorruptible and immortal, and put out of the reach of death for ever; and then will it plainly appear, that as to them death will have lost its strength and sting, and all by the mediation of Christ, by his dying in their room. By dying he conquered death and spoiled the grave; and, through faith in him, believers become sharers in his conquests. They rejoice beforehand many times in the hope of this victory; and when they rise glorious from the grave will boldly triumph over death. Note, It is altogether owing to the grace of God, in Christ, that sin is pardoned and death disarmed. The law puts arms into the hands of death to destroy the sinner, but pardon of sin takes away this power from the law, and deprives death of its strength and sting. It is by the grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, that we are freely justified, Rom. iii. 24. It is no wonder, therefore, 3rd. If this triumph of the saints over death should issue in thanksgiving to God; "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through Christ Jesus our Lord," ver. 57. The way to sanctify all our joy is to make it tributary to the praise of God; then only do we enjoy our blessings and honours in a holy manner when God has his revenue of glory out of it, and we are free to pay it to him. And this really improves and exalts our satisfaction; we are conscious at once of having done our duty and enjoyed our pleasure. And what can be more joyous in itself than the saints' triumph over death when they shall rise again? And shall they not then rejoice in the Lord, and be glad in the God of their salvation? Shall not their souls magnify the Lord? When he shews such wonders to the dead, shall they not arise and praise him? Ps. lxxxviii. 10. Those who remain under the power of death can have no heart to praise; but such conquests and triumphs will certainly tune the tongues of saints to thankfulness and praise, praise for the victory. It is great and glorious in itself and for the means whereby it is obtained; it is given of God through Christ Jesus; a victory obtained not by our power, but the power of God; not given because we are worthy, but because Christ is so, and has, by dying, obtained this conquest for us. Must not this circumstance endear the victory to us, and heighten our praise to God? Note, How many springs of joy to the saints, and thanksgiving to God, are opened by the death and resurrection, the sufferings and conquests, of our Redeemer! With what acclamations will saints, rising from the dead, applaud him! How will the heaven of heavens resound his praises for ever! "Thanks be to God" will be the burthen of their song, and angels will join in the chorus, and declare their consent with a loud Amen, hallelujah!

58 Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

In this verse we have the improvement of the whole argument, in an exhortation, enforced by a motive resulting plainly from it.

First. An exhortation, and this threefold. 1. That they should be steadfast, ἐπαροι, firm, fixed in the faith of the Gospel, that Gospel which he had preached, and they had received, namely, "That Christ died for our sins, and rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures," ver. 3, 4; and the faith of the glorious resurrection of the sanctified dead, which, as he had shewn, had so near and necessary a connexion with the former. Do not let your belief of these truths be shaken or staggered; they are most certain and of the last importance. Note, Christians should be steadfast believers of this great article of the resurrection of the dead. It is evidently founded on the death of Christ. Because he lives, his servants shall live also, Jno. xiv. 19. And it is of the last importance. A disbelief of a future life will open a way to all manner of licentiousness, and corrupt men's morals to the last degree. It will be easy and natural from hence to infer that we may live like beasts, and eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. 2. He exhorts them to be immoveable, namely, in their hope and expectation of this great privilege, of being raised incorruptible and immortal. Christians should not be moved away from this hope of the Gospel, Col. i. 23, this glorious and blessed hope. They should not [for a moment] renounce nor resign their comfortable expectations. They are not vain but solid hopes, built upon sure foundations, the purchase and power of their risen Saviour, and the promise of God, to whom it is impossible to lie—hopes that shall be their most powerful supports under all the pressures of life, the most effectual antidotes against the fears of death, and the most quickening motives to diligence and perseverance in Christian duty. Should they part with these hopes? Should they suffer them to be shaken? Note, Christians should live in the most firm expectation of a blessed resurrection. This hope should be an anchor to their souls, firm and sure, Heb. vi. 19. 3. He exhorts them to abound in the work of the Lord, and that always, in the Lord's service, in obeying the Lord's commands. They should be diligent and persevering herein, and going ever on towards perfection. They should be continually making advances in true piety, and ready and apt for every good work. The [most earnest prayerfulness, the] most cheerful duty, the greatest diligence, the most constant perseverance, is what becomes those who have such glorious hopes. Can we too much abound in zeal and diligence in the Lord's work, when we are secured of such abundant recompenses in a future life? What vigour and resolution, what constancy and patience, should those hopes inspire! Note, Christians should not stint themselves as to their growth in holiness, but be always improving in sound religion, [vital godliness,] and abounding in the work of the Lord.

Secondly. The motive resulting from the former discourse is that their labour shall not be in vain in the Lord; nay, they know it shall not. They have the best grounds to be expected. As sure as Christ is risen, they shall rise, and Christ is as surely risen as the Scriptures are true and the word of God. The apostles saw him after his death, testified this truth to the world in the face of a thousand deaths and dangers, and confirmed it by miraculous powers received from him. Is there any room to doubt a fact so well attested? Note, True Christians have undoubted evidence that their labour will not be in vain in the Lord. Not their most diligent services nor their most painful sufferings. They will not be lost labour. They may lose for God, but they shall lose nothing by him. Nay, there is more implied than is expressed in this phrase. It means that they shall be abundantly rewarded. He will never be found unjust to forget their labour of love, Heb. vi. 10. Nay, he will do exceeding abundantly above what they can now ask or think. Neither the services they do for him, nor the sufferings they endure for him here, are worthy to be compared with the joy hereafter to be revealed in them, Rom. viii. 18. Note, They that [truly] serve God have good wages. They cannot do too much, nor suffer too much, for so good a master. If they serve him now they shall see him hereafter; if they suffer for him on earth they shall reign with him in heaven; if they die for his sake they shall rise again from the dead, be crowned with glory, honour, and immortality, and inherit eternal life.

[Thus closes this chapter of inimitable beauty, and of unequalled power of argumentation. Such is the prospect which is before the Christian. He shall indeed die like other men. But his death is a sleep—a calm, gentle, undisturbed sleep, in the expectation of being again awakened to a brighter day, ver. 6. He has the assurance that his Saviour rose, and that his people shall therefore also rise, ver. 12–20. He encounters peril, and privation, and persecution; he may be ridiculed and despised; he may be subjected to danger, or doomed to fight with wild beasts, or to contend with men who resemble wild beasts; he may be doomed to the pains and terrors of a martyrdom at the stake; but he has the assurance that all these are of short continuance, and that before him there is a world of eternal glory, ver. 29–32. He may be poor, unhooured, and apparently without an earthly friend or protector; but his Saviour and Redeemer reigns, ver. 25. He may be opposed by wicked men, and his name slandered, and body tortured, and his peace marred, but his enemies shall all be subdued, ver. 26, 27. He will himself die, and sleep in his grave, but he shall live again, ver. 22, 23. He has painful proof that his body is corruptible, but it will be incorruptible; that it is now vile, but it will be glorious; that it is weak, frail, feeble, but it will yet be strong, and no more subject to disease or decay, ver. 42, 43. And he will be brought under the power of death, but death shall be robbed of its honours, and despoiled of its triumph. Its sting from the saint is taken away, and it is changed to a blessing. It is now not the dreaded monster, the king of terrors; it is a friend that comes to remove him from a world of toil to a world of rest—from a life of sin to a life of glory. The grave is not to him the gloomy abode, the permanent resting place of his body; it is a place of rest for a little time, grateful like the bed of down to a wearied frame, where he may lie down and repose after the fatigues of the day, and gently wait for the morning. He has nothing to fear in death; nothing to fear in the dying pang, the gloom, the chill, the sweat, the paleness, the fixedness of death; nothing to fear in the chillness, the darkness, the silence, the corruption of the grave. All this is in the way to immortality, and is closely and indissolubly connected with immortality, ver. 55–57. And in view of all this we should be patient, faithful, laborious, self-denying; we should engage with zeal in the work of the Lord; we should calmly wait till our change come, ver. 58. No other system of religion has any such hopes as this; no other system does anything to dispel the gloom, or drive away the horrors of the grave. How foolish is the man who rejects the Gospel—the only system which brings life and immortality to light! How foolish to reject the doctrine of the resurrection, and to lie down in the grave without peace, without hope, without any belief that there will be a world of glory—living without God, and dying like the brute. And yet infidelity seeks and claims its chief triumph in the attempt to convince poor dying man that he has no solid ground of hope; that the universe is "without a Father and without a God;" that the grave terminates the career of man for ever; and that in the grave he sinks away to eternal annihilation. Strange that man should seek such degradation! Strange that all men, conscious that they must die, do not at once greet Christianity as their best friend, and hail the doctrine of the future state, and of the resurrection, as that which is adapted to meet the deeply-felt evils of this world, to fill the desponding mind with peace, and to sustain the soul in the temptations and trials of life, and in the gloom and agony of death!—A. B.]

CHAPTER XVI.

In this chapter the apostle, I. Gives direction about some charitable collection to be made in this church, for the afflicted and impoverished churches in Judea, ver. 1–4. II. He talks of making them a visit, ver. 5–9. III. He recommends Timothy to them, and tells them Apollos intended to come to them, ver. 10–13. IV. He presses them to watchfulness, constancy, charity, and to pay a due regard to all who helped him and his fellow-labourers in their work, ver. 13–18. V. After salutations from others, and his own, he closes the epistle with a solemn admonition to them, and his good wishes for them, ver. 19–24.

xv. 55. St. Paul here makes a free translation from Hos. xiii. 14.

xv. 56. The meaning is that death has a sting imparted to it by means of sin. "The strength of sin is the law:" see Rom. iii. 20, iv. 15, v. 13.

xv. 58. Instead of listening to those who say there is no resurrection, believe rather that there is no such thing as real death to those in the Lord, either to themselves or their labour.

xvi. 1. "The conclusion of this epistle, as of that to the Romans, Ephesians, Colossians, and 2 Timothy, is taken up with matters more or less personal and secular. Of these the first is (the collection amongst the Gentile churches for the poorer Christians in Judea. From whatever cause, there was at this period much poverty in Palestine compared with the other eastern provinces of the Roman empire. The chief allusions contained in the apostolical epistles to the duties of the rich towards the poor, are those which we find in connection with the contribution here mentioned, and in the

OW concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. 2 Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. 3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. 4 And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

In this chapter Paul closes this long epistle with some particular matters of less moment; but, as all was written by Divine inspiration, it is all profitable for our instruction. He begins with directing them about a charitable collection on a particular occasion, namely, the distresses and poverty of the Christians in Judea, that at this time were extraordinary, partly through the general calamities of that nation, and partly through the particular sufferings to which they were exposed. Now concerning this, observe,

First. How he introduces his direction. It was not a peculiar service which he required of them—he had given the like orders to the churches of Galatia, ver. 1. He desired them only to conform themselves to the same rules which he had given to other churches on the like occasion. He did not desire that others should be eased and they burdened, 2 Cor. viii. 13. He also prudently mentions these orders of his to the churches of Galatia, to excite emulation, and stir them up to be liberal according to their circumstances, and the occasion. Those who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, and, as it is probable, in worldly wealth, (see the argument,) sure would not suffer themselves to come behind any in their bounty to their afflicted brethren. Note, The good examples of other Christians and churches should stir in us a holy emulation. It is becoming a Christian not to bear to be outdone by a fellow-Christian in any thing virtuous and praiseworthy, provided this consideration only makes him exert himself, not envy others; and the more advantages we have above others the more should we endeavour to exceed them. The church of Corinth should not be outdone in this service of love by the churches of Galatia, who do not appear to have been enriched with equal spiritual gifts or outward ability.

Secondly. The direction itself. Concerning which, observe,

1. The manner in which the collection was to be made. Every one was to lay by in store, ver. 2; have a treasury or fund with himself for this purpose. The meaning is that he should lay by as he could spare from time to time, and by that means make up a sum for this charitable purpose. Note, It is a good thing to lay up a store for good uses. Those who are rich in this world should be rich in good works, 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18. The best way to be so is to appropriate part of their income, and have a treasury for this purpose, a stock for the poor as well as themselves. By this means they will be ready to every good work as the opportunity offers; and many who labour with their own hands for a livelihood should so work "that they may have to give to him that needeth," Eph. iv. 28. Indeed their treasury for good works can never be very large, (though, according to circumstances, it may considerably vary,) but the best way in the world for them to get a treasury for this purpose is to lay by from time to time as they can afford. Some of the Greek fathers rightly observe here, that this advice was given for the sake of the poorer among them. They were to lay by from week to week, and not bring in to the common treasury, that by this means their contributions might be easy to themselves, and yet grow into a sum for the relief of their brethren. "Every little," as the proverb says, "would make a mickle." Indeed all our charity and benevolence should be free and cheerful, and for that reason should be made as easy to ourselves as may be. And what more likely way to make us easy in this matter than thus to lay by? We may cheerfully give when we know we can spare, and that we have been laying by in store that we may.

2. Here is the measure in which they are to lay by; "As God hath prospered him;" καὶ ὡς εὐδοκῶντος, as he hath been prospered, namely, by Divine providence; as God has been pleased to bless and succeed his labours and business. Note, All our business and labour is that to us which God is pleased to make it. It is not the diligent hand that will make rich by itself, without the Divine blessing; compare Pr. x. 4, 22. Our prosperity and success is from God, and not from ourselves. And he is to be owned in all and honoured with all. It is his bounty and blessing to which we owe all we have; and whatever we have is to be used, and employed, and improved for him. His right in ourselves, and all that is ours, is to be owned and yielded to him; and what argument more proper to excite us to charity to the people and children of God than to consider all we have as his gift, as coming from him? Note, When God blesses and prospers us we should be ready to relieve and comfort his needy servants. When his bounty flows forth upon us we should not confine it to ourselves, but let it stream out on others. The good we receive from him should stir us up to do good to others, to resemble him in our beneficence; and, therefore, the more good we receive from God the more we should do good to others. They were to lay by as God had blessed them, in that proportion. The more they had through God's blessing gained by their business or labour, their traffic or work, the more they were to lay by. Note, God expects that our beneficence to others should hold some proportion to his bounty to us. All we have is from God; the more he gives, (circumstances being considered,) the more he enables us to give, and the more he expects we should give; that we should give more than others that are less able; that we should give more than ourselves when we were less able; and, on the other hand, from him to whom God gives less he expects less. He is no tyrant or cruel taskmaster to exact brick without straw, or expect men should do more good than he gives ability. No, nor according to what he hath not, 2 Cor. viii. 12; but, as he prospers and blesses us, and puts us into a capacity to do good, he expects we should. The greater ability he gives, the more enlarged should our hearts be, and the more open our hands; but where the ability is less the hands cannot be as open, however willing the mind may be, and large the heart; nor doth God expect it.

3. Here is the time when this is to be done. "The first day of the week," κατὰ μίαν σαββάτων, Lu. xxiv. 1, the Lord's day, the Christian holiday, [sabbath,] when public assemblies were held, and public worship was celebrated, and the Christian institutions and mysteries (as the ancients called them) were attended upon; then let every one lay by him. It is a day of holy rest, and the more vacation the mind has from worldly cares and toils the more disposition hath it to shew mercy; and the other duties of the day should stir us up to the performance of this. Works of charity should always accompany works of piety. True piety towards God will beget kind and friendly dispositions towards men. "This command have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also," 1 Jno. iv. 24. Works of mercy are the genuine fruits of true love to God, and therefore are a proper service on his own day. Note, God's day is a proper season on which to lay up for charitable uses, or lay out in them, according as he hath prospered us. It is paying tribute for the blessings of the past week, and it is a proper way to procure his blessing on the work of our hands for the next.

Thirdly. We have here the disposal of the collections thus made. The apostle would have every thing ready against he came, and therefore gave direction as before. "That there be no gatherings when I come," ver. 2. But when he came, as to the disposal of it, he would leave it much to themselves. The charity was theirs, and it was fit they should dispose of it in their own way, so it answered its end, and was applied to the right use. Paul no more pretended to lord it over the purses of his hearers than over their faith. He would not meddle with their contributions without their consent. He tells them, 1. That they should give letters of credence, and send messengers of their own with their liberality, ver. 3. This would be a proper testimony of their respect and brotherly love to their distressed brethren, to send their gift by members of their own body, trusty and tender-hearted, that would have compassion on their suffering brethren, and a Christian concern for them, and not defraud them. It would argue they were very hearty in this service when they should send some of their own body on so long and hazardous a journey or voyage, to convey their liberality. Note, We should not only charitably relieve our poor fellow-Christians, but do it in such a way as will best signify our compassion to them, and care of them. 2. He offers to go with their messengers if they thought proper, ver. 4. His business, as an apostle, was not to serve tables, but to give himself to the word and prayer. But yet he was never wanting to set afoot or help forward a work of charity when an opportunity offered. He would go to Jerusalem to carry the contributions of the church of Corinth to their suffering brethren, rather than they should go without them, or the charity of the Corinthians fail of a due effect. It was no hindrance to his preaching work, but a great furtherance to the success of it, to shew such a tender and benign disposition of mind. Note, Ministers are doing their proper business when they are promoting or helping in works of charity. Paul stirs up the Corinthians to gather for the relief of the churches in Judaea, and he is ready to go with their messengers to convey what is gathered; and he is still in the way of his duty, in the business of his office.

5 Now I will come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass through Macedonia. 6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go. 7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit. 8 But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. 9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries.

In this passage the apostle notifies and explains his purpose of coming to visit them. Concerning which, observe,

First. His purpose. He intended to pass out of Asia, where he now was, ver. 8, 19, and to go through Macedonia into Achaia, [Greece was divided by Augustus into the provinces of Macedonia and Achaia, the former comprising Macedonia Proper, Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly; the latter, of which Corinth was the capital, all the country lying to the south of the former,] where Corinth was, and to stay some time with them, and perhaps the winter, ver. 5, 6. He had long laboured in this church, and done much good amongst them, and had his heart set upon doing much more, (if God saw fit,) and therefore he had it in his thoughts to see them, and stay with them. Note, The heart of a truly Christian minister must be much towards that people among whom he has laboured long, and with remarkable success. No wonder Paul was willing to see Corinth, and stay with them as long as the other duties of his office would permit. Though some among this people despised him, and made a faction against him, doubtless there were many who loved him tenderly, and paid him all the respect due to an apostle, and their spiritual father; and is it any wonder he should be willing to visit them, and stay with them? And as to the rest, who now carried it with disrespect, he might hope to reduce them to a better temper, and thereby rectify what was out of order in the church, by staying amongst them for some time. It is plain he hoped for some good effect, because he saith he intended to stay, that they might bring him on his journey whithersoever he went, ver. 6. Not barely set him going, as we say, accompany him a little way on the road, but expedite and furnish him for his journey, help and encourage him to it, and provide him for it. He is to be understood of being brought forward in his journey after a godly sort, as it is expressed 3 Jno. 6; so as nothing might be wanting to him, as himself speaks, 2d. iii. 13. His stay amongst them he hoped would cure the factious humour, and reconcile them to himself, and their duty. Note, It was a just reason for an apostle to make his abode in a place that he had a prospect of doing good.

Secondly. His excuse for not seeing them now, namely, because it would be only by the way, ver. 7; ἐν παραπομπῇ, en passant,—"it would only be a transient visit." He would not see them because he could not stay with them. Such a visit would neither give him nor them any satisfaction or advantage. It would rather raise the appetite than regale it, rather heighten their desires of being together than satisfy them. He loved them so that he longed for an opportunity to stay with them, take up his abode amongst them for some length of time. This would be more pleasing to himself, and more serviceable to them, than a cursory visit in his way; and therefore he would not see them now, but another time when he could tarry longer.

Thirdly. We have the limitation of this purpose. "I trust to tarry awhile with you, if the Lord permit," ver. 7. Though the apostles wrote under inspiration, they did not now thereby now God would dispose of themselves. Paul epistle of St. James and that to the Hebrews, both addressed, if not to Judea, at least to Jewish communities. And with this agrees the great stress laid in the Gospels on the duty of alms-giving. We learn also, from the account of the last struggle for independence in Josephus, how deeply the feelings of the poor were embittered against the rich in Jerusalem, so as to give to the intestine factions of that time something of the character of a social war. This was in part occasioned by the greater density of population in Palestine, compared with the thinly-inhabited tracts of Greece and Asia Minor; in part, by the strongly-marked distinction of rich and poor, which had been handed down to the Jews from the earlier periods of their history, where we are familiar with it from the denunciations of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Nehemiah. The Christians besides were, as a general rule, from the poorer classes (Jas. ii. 5), and would be subject to persecutions and difficulties on account of their religion (Heb. x. 24). From the mention of the poor as a distinct class in the Chris-had a purpose of coming to Corinth, and staying there, and hoped to do good thereby. This was not a purpose proceeding from any extraordinary motion or impulse of the Spirit of God, not the effect of inspiration; for, had it been such, he could not have spoken of it in this manner. A purpose formed thus in him must have been the purpose of God, signified to him by his Spirit. And could he say he would come to Corinth upon this view only, if God permit? that is, that he would execute God's own purpose concerning himself with God's permission? It is to be understood then of a common purpose formed in his own spirit; and, concerning all our purposes, it is fit we should say, we will execute them if the Lord permit. Note, All our purposes must be made with submission to the Divine providence. We should say, "If the Lord will we shall live, and do this and that," Jas. iv. 15. It is not in us to effect our own designs without the Divine leave. It is by God's power and permission, and under his direction and conduct, we must do every thing. Heathens have concurred in acknowledging this concern of Providence in all our actions and concerns. Sure we should readily own it, and frequently and seriously attend to it.

Fourthly. We have his purpose expressed of staying at Ephesus for the present. He says, he would stay there till Pentecost, ver. 8. It is very probable he was at the time of writing this epistle in Ephesus, from this passage compared with ver. 19, where he says, "The churches of Asia salute you." A proper salutation from Ephesus, but hardly so proper had he been at Philippi, as the subscription to this epistle in our common copies has it. The churches of Macedonia salute you, had been much more properly inserted in the close of a letter from Philippi than the other. But,

Fifthly. We have the reason given for his staying at Ephesus for the present; "Because a great door, and effectual, was opened to him, and there were many adversaries," ver. 9. A great door, and effectual, was opened to him. Many were prepared to receive the Gospel at Ephesus, and God gave him great success amongst them. He had brought over many to Christ, and he had great hope of bringing over many more. For this reason he determined to stay awhile at Ephesus. Note, Success, and a fair prospect of more, was a just reason to determine an apostle to stay and labour in a particular place. "And there are many adversaries," because a great door, and an effectual, was opened. Note, Great success in the work of the Gospel commonly creates many enemies. The devil opposes those most, and makes them most trouble, who most heartily and successfully set themselves to destroy his kingdom. "There were many adversaries," and therefore the apostle determined to stay. Some think he alludes in this passage to the custom of the Roman circus, and the doors of it, at which the charioteers were to enter, as their antagonists did at the opposite door. True courage is whetted by opposition, and it is no wonder the Christian courage of the apostle should be animated by the zeal of his adversaries. They were bent to ruin him, and prevent the effect of his ministry at Ephesus, and should he at this time desert his station, and disgrace his character and doctrine? No, the opposition of adversaries only animated his zeal. He was in nothing daunted by his adversaries, but the more they raged and opposed the more he exerted himself. Should such a man as he flee? Note, Adversaries and opposition do not break the spirits of faithful and successful ministers, [they know who has said to them, "Fear them not."] but only warm their zeal, and inspire them with fresh courage. Indeed, to labour in vain is heartless and discouraging. This damps the spirits and breaks the heart; but success will give life and vigour to a minister, though enemies rage, and blaspheme, and persecute. It is not the opposition of enemies, but the hardness and obstinacy of his hearers, and the backslidings and revolt of professors, that damp a faithful minister and break his heart.

10 Now if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do. 11 Let no man therefore despise him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren. 12 As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

In this passage he, First, Recommends Timothy to them in several particulars. As, 1. He bids them take care that he should be among them without fear, ver. 10. Timothy was sent by the apostle to correct the abuses crept in amongst them, and not only to direct, but to blame, and censure, and reprove those that deserved. They were all in factions, and no doubt the mutual strife and hatred ran very high amongst them. There were some very rich, as it is probable, and many very proud, upon account both of their outward wealth and spiritual gifts. Proud spirits cannot easily bear reproof; it was reasonable, therefore, to think young Timothy might be roughly used, and the apostle warns them against using him ill. Not but that he was prepared for the worst; but, whatever his firmness and prudence might be, it was their duty to behave themselves well towards him, and not discourage and dishearten him in his Lord's work. They should not fly out into resentment at his reproof. Note, Christians should bear faithful reproof from their ministers, and not terrify and discourage them from doing their duty. 2. He warns them against despising him, ver. 11. He was but a young man, and alone, as Ecumenius observes. He had no one to back him, and his own youthful face and years commanded but little reverence; and, therefore, the great pretenders to wisdom amongst them might be apt to entertain contemptuous thoughts of him. Now, says the apostle, guard against this. Not that he distrusted Timothy; he knew that himself would do nothing to bring contempt on his character, he would do nothing to make his youth despicable; but pride was a reigning sin among the Corinthians, and such a caution was but too necessary. Note, Christians should be very careful not to pour contempt on any, but especially on ministers, the faithful ministers of Christ. These, whether young or old, are to be had in high esteem for their work's sake. 3. He tells them they should give him all due encouragement, use him well whilst he was with them, and, as an evidence of this, they should send him away in friendship, and well prepared for his journey back again to Paul. This, as I have above observed, is the meaning of bringing on his journey in peace, ver. 11. Note, Faithful ministers are not only to be well received by a people, among whom they may for a season minister, but are to be sent away with due respect.

tian Church in Acts ix. 37, and in the passages relating to the contribution now in question, it would seem that the community of property at Jerusalem must either have declined or failed of its object, and may even have contributed to occasion the great poverty which we thus find prevailing in the period of twenty or thirty years after its first mention. So pressing was the necessity at the time when St. Paul first parted from the church of Jerusalem, that an express stipulation was made on behalf of this very point (Gal. ii. 10).

Secondly. He assigns the reasons why they should carry it thus towards Timothy. 1. Because he was employed in the same work as Paul, and acted in it by the same authority, [the authority of Christ,] ver. 10. He did not come on Paul's errand amongst them, nor to do his work, but the work of the Lord. Though he was not an apostle, he was assistant to one, and was sent upon this very business by a Divine commission; and therefore to vex his spirit would be to grieve the Holy Spirit. To despise him would be to despise Him that sent him; that is, not Paul, but Paul's Lord and theirs. Note, Those that work the work of the Lord should be neither terrified nor despised, but treated with all tenderness and respect. Such are all the faithful ministers of the word, though not all in the same rank and degree, pastors and teachers as well as apostles and evangelists, and, whilst they are doing their duty, are to be treated with honour and respect. 2. Another reason is implied. As they were to esteem him for his work's sake, so also for Paul's sake, who had sent him to Corinth, not of his own errand indeed, but to work the work of the Lord. "Conduct him forth in peace, that he may come to me, for I look for him with the brethren," ver. 12. Or, "I with the brethren look for him;" the original will bear either, ἐκδέχομαι γὰρ αὐτὸν μετὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν, I am expecting his return, and his report concerning you; and shall judge by your conduct towards him what your regard and respect will be towards me. Look to it that you send him back with no evil report. Paul might expect from the Corinthians that a messenger from him, upon such an errand, should be regarded and well treated. His services and success among them, his authority with them as an apostle, would challenge this at their hands. They would hardly dare to send back Timothy with a report that would grieve or provoke the apostle. I and the brethren expect his return, wait for the report he is to make, and therefore do not use him ill, but respect him, regard his message, and let him return in peace.

Thirdly. He informs them of Apollos' purpose to see them. 1. He himself had greatly desired him to come to them, ver. 12. Though one party amongst them had declared for Apollos against Paul, [if that passage be to be understood literally, see ch. iv. 6,] yet Paul did not hinder Apollos from going to Corinth in his own absence, nay, he pressed him to go thither. He had no suspicions of Apollos, as if he would lessen Paul's interest and respect among them to the advancement of his own. Note, Faithful ministers are not apt to entertain jealousies of each other, or to suspect of selfish designs. True charity and brotherly love think no evil, and where should these reign if not in the breasts of the ministers of Christ? 2. Apollos could not be prevailed on for the present to come, but would at a more convenient season. Perhaps their feuds and factions might render the present season improper; he would not go to be set at the head of a party, and countenance the dividing and contentious humour. When this was subsided by Paul's epistle to them, and Timothy's ministry among them, he might conclude a visit would be more proper. Apostles did not vie with each other, but consulted each other's comfort and usefulness. Paul signifies his great regard to the church of Corinth, when they had used him ill, by entreating Apollos to go to them; and Apollos shews his respect to Paul, and his concern to keep up his character and authority, by declining the journey till the Corinthians were in better temper. Note, It is very becoming the ministers of the Gospel to have and manifest a concern for each other's reputation and usefulness.

13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong. 14 Let all your things be done with charity. 15 I beseech you, brethren, (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,) 16 That ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth. 17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied. 18 For they have refreshed my spirit and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

In this passage the apostle, First, Gives some general advice. As, 1. That they should watch, ver. 13; be wakeful, and upon their guard. A Christian is always in danger, and therefore should ever be on the watch; but the danger is greater at some times, and under some circumstances. The Corinthians were in manifest danger upon many accounts. Their feuds ran high, the irregularities among them were very great, there were deceivers got amongst them that endeavoured to corrupt their faith in the most important articles, those without which the practice of virtue and piety could never subsist; and sure in such dangerous circumstances it was their concern to watch. 2. If a Christian would be secure he must be on his guard [and pray much]. And the more his danger is, the greater vigilance is needful for his security. 2. He advises them to "stand fast in the faith," to keep their ground, adhere to the revelation of God, and not give it up for the wisdom of the world, nor suffer it to be corrupted by it. Stand for the faith of the Gospel, and maintain it even to death, and stand in it, so as to abide in the profession of it, and feel and yield to its influence. Note, A Christian should be fixed in the faith of the Gospel, and never desert or renounce it. [Wavering must be meant here, as no child of God can renounce his faith in Christ.] It is by this faith alone he will be able to keep his ground in an hour of temptation. It is by faith we stand, 2 Cor. i. 24. It is by this we must overcome the world, 1 Jno. v. 4, both when it fawns and when it frowns, when it tempts and when it terrifies. We must stand therefore in the faith of the Gospel if we would maintain our integrity. 3. He advises them to act like men, and be strong; act the manly, firm, and resolved part. Behave strenuously in opposition to the ill men that would divide and corrupt you—those who would split you into factions, or seduce you from the faith. Be not terrified nor inveigled by them; but shew yourselves men in Christ by your steadiness, by your sound judgment, and firm resolution. Note, Christians should be manly and firm in all their contests with their enemies, in defending their faith, and maintaining their integrity. They should in an especial manner be so in those points of faith that lie at the foundation of sound and practical religion, such as were attacked among the Corinthians: these must be maintained with solid judgment and strong resolution. 4. He advises them to do every thing in charity, ver. 14. Our zeal and

To 'remember the poor' was the one link by which the apostle of the Gentiles was still bound to the churches of Judea. The pledge was given probably before his second journey. But it was not till his third and last journey that the preparations were made for the great contribution of which he now speaks. From this passage, confirmed indirectly by Gal. ii. 10, vi. 10, it would appear that he had first given orders for the collection in the churches of Galatia. From 2 Cor. viii. 10, ix. 2, it also appears that the orders here given to the constancy must be consistent with charity. When the apostle would have us play the man for our faith and religion, he puts in a caution against playing the devil for it. We may defend our faith, but we must at the same time maintain our innocence, and not devour and destroy, and think with ourselves that the wrath of man will work the righteousness of God, Jas. i. 20. Note, Christians should be careful that charity not only reigns in their hearts but shines out in their lives, nay, in their most manly defences of the faith of the Gospel. There is a great difference between constancy and cruelty, between Christian firmness and feverish wrath and transport. Christianity never appears to so much advantage as when the charity of Christians is most conspicuous; when they can bear with their mistaken brethren, and oppose the open enemies of their holy faith, in love; when every thing is done in charity; when they carry it towards one another and towards all men with a spirit of meekness and good-will.

Secondly, He gives some particular directions how they should carry it towards some that had been eminently serviceable to the cause of Christ among them.

1. He gives us their character. 1st. The household of Stephanas is mentioned by him, and their character is that they were "the firstfruits of Achaia," the first converts to Christianity in that region of Greece in which Corinth was. Note, It is an honourable character to any man to be early a Christian, betimes in Christ. But they had moreover addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints, to serve the saints. They have disposed and devoted themselves, ἑαυτὰς ὑποτάξαντες, to serve the saints, to do service to the saints. It is not meant of the ministry of the word properly, but of serving them in other respects, supplying their wants, helping and assisting them upon all occasions, both in their temporal and spiritual concerns. The family of Stephanas seem to have been a family of rank and importance in those parts, and yet they willingly offered themselves to this service. Note, It is an honour to persons of the highest rank to devote themselves to the service of the saints. I do not mean to change ranks, and become proper servants to their inferiors, but freely and voluntarily to help them, and do good to them in all their concerns. 2nd. He mentions Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, as coming to him from the church of Corinth. The account he gives of them is that they supplied the deficiencies of the church towards him, and by so doing refreshed his spirit and theirs, ver. 17, 18; that is, they gave him a more perfect account of the state of the church by word of mouth than he could acquire by their letter, and by that means quieted his mind much, and upon their return from him would quiet the minds of the Corinthians. Report had made their case much worse than it was in fact, and their letters had not explained it enough to give the apostle satisfaction; but he had been made more easy by converse with them. It was a very good office they did, by truly stating facts, and removing the ill opinion Paul had received by common fame. They came to him with a truly Christian intention to set the apostle right, and gave him as favourable sentiments of the church as they could, as peacemakers. Note, It is a great refreshment to the spirit of a faithful minister, to hear better of a people by wise and good men of their own body than by common report; to find himself misinformed concerning them, that matters are not as bad as they had been represented. It is a grief to him to hear ill of those he loves; it gladdens his heart to hear the report is false. And the greater value he has for those who give him this information, and the more he can depend upon their truth, the greater is his joy.

2. Upon this account of the men, he directs how they should carry it towards them, and, 1st. He would have them acknowledged, ver. 18, that is, owned and respected. They deserve it for their good offices. Those who serve the saints, those who consult the honour and good esteem of the churches, and are concerned to wipe off reproaches from them, and take off from the ill opinion fame had propagated, are to be valued, and esteemed, and loved. Those who discover so good a spirit cannot easily be overvalued. 2nd. He advises that they should submit themselves to such, and to all who helped with the apostles, and laboured, ver. 16. This is not to be understood of subjection to proper superiors, but of a voluntary acknowledgment of their worth. They were persons to whom they owed peculiar respect, and whom they should have in veneration. Note, It is a venerable character they bear who serve the saints, and labour hard to help the success of the Gospel; who countenance and encourage the faithful ministers of Christ, and endeavour to promote their usefulness. Such should be had in honourable esteem.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house. 20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss. 21 The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand. 22 If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha. 23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. 24 My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

The apostle closes his epistle,

First, With salutations to the church of Corinth, from those of Asia, from Priscilla and Aquila, (who seem to have been at this time inhabitants of Ephesus, see Acts xviii. 26), "with the church in their house," ver. 19, and from "all the brethren," ver. 20, namely, at Ephesus, where it is highly probable, at least, Paul then was. All these saluted the church at Corinth, by Paul. Note, Christianity does by no means destroy civility and good manners. Paul could find room, in an epistle treating of very important matters, to send the salutations of friends. Religion should promote a courteous and obliging temper towards all. They misrepresent and reproach it who would take any encouragement from it to be sour and morose. Some of these "salute" them much in the Lord. Note, Christian salutations are not empty compliments; they carry in them the real expression of goodwill, and are attended with hearty recommendations to the Divine grace and blessing. Those who salute in the Lord wish their brethren all good from the Lord, and breathe out their good wishes in fervent prayers. We read also of a church in a private family, ver. 19. It is very probable that the family itself is called the church in their house. Note, Every Christian family should in some respects be a Christian church. In some cases (as, for instance, were they cast away on a foreign shore where there are no other Christians) they should be a church themselves, if large enough, and live in the use of all ordinances; but in common cases they should live under the direction of Christian rules, and daily offer up Christian worship. Wherever two or three are gathered together, and Christ is amongst them, there is a church. 1. To these salutations he subjoins an advice, that they should "greet one another with an holy kiss," [the token of brotherly love and spiritual equality, given before the sacrament was received,] ver. 20, or with sincere goodwill—a tacit reproof of their feuds and factions. When the churches of Asia, and the Christian brethren so remote, did so heartily salute them in the Lord, and own and love them as brethren, and expressed so much goodwill to them, it would be a shame for them not to own and love one another as brethren. Note, The love of the brethren should be a powerful incentive to mutual love. When the other churches of Christ love us all we are very culpable if we do not love one another. 2. He subjoins his own salutation; "The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand," ver. 21. His amanuensis, it is reasonable to think, wrote the rest of his epistle from his mouth, but at the close it was fit himself should sign it, that they might know it to be genuine; and, therefore, it is added, 2 Thes. iii. 17, "Which is my token in every epistle," the mark of its being genuine. So he wrote in every epistle which he did not wholly pen, as he did that to the Galatians, Gal. vi. 11. Note, Those churches to whom apostolical letters were sent were duly certified of their being authentic and Divine; nor would Paul be behind the rest of the brethren, in respect to the Corinthians, and therefore, after he has given their salutations, he adds his own.

Secondly, With a very solemn warning to them: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha," ver. 22. We sometimes need words of threatening, that we may fear. "Blessed is he," saith the wise man, "who feareth always." Holy fear is a very good friend, both to holy faith and holy living. And how much reason have all Christians to fear falling under this doom! "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." Whence observe, 1. The person described who is liable to this doom. He that loveth not the Lord Jesus Christ: Ἀπεχθώνος, as some think, he that blasphemes Christ, disowns his doctrine, slights and contemns his institutions, or through pride of human knowledge and learning despises his revelations. It stands here as a warning to the Corinthians, and a rebuke of their criminal behaviour; it is an admonition to them not to be led away from the simplicity of the Gospel, or those principles of it which were the great motives to purity of life, by pretenders to science, by the wisdom of the world which would call their religion folly, and its most important doctrines absurd and ridiculous. Those men had a spite at Christ, and if the Corinthians gave ear to their seducing speeches they were in danger of apostatizing from him. Against this he gives them here a very solemn caution: "Do not give into such a conduct, if you would escape the severest vengeance." Note, Professed Christians will, by contempt of Christ, and revolt from him, bring upon themselves the most dreadful destruction. Some understand the words as they lie, in their plain and obvious meaning, for such as are without holy and sincere affection for the Lord Jesus Christ. Many who have his name much in their mouths have no true love to him in their hearts, will not have him to rule over them, Luk. xix. 27; no, not though they [appear to] have very towering hopes of being saved by him. And none love him in truth that do not love his laws and keep his commandments. Note, There are many Christians in name that do not love Christ Jesus the Lord in sincerity. But can any thing be more criminal or provoking! What, not love the most glorious lover in the world! Him who loved us, and gave himself for us! [if we are his.] Who shed his blood for us, to testify his love to us, and that after heinous wrong and provocation! What had we a power of loving for, if we are unmoved with such love as this, and without affection to such a Saviour? But, 2. We have here their doom; "Let him be Anathema, Maran-atha," lie under the heaviest and most dreadful curse. Let him be separated from the people of God, from the favour of God, and delivered up to his final, irrevocable, and inexorable vengeance. Maran-atha is a Syriac phrase, and signifies, 'the Lord cometh.' That very Lord whom they do not love, to whom they are inwardly and really disaffected, whatever outward profession they may make, he is coming to execute judgment; and to be exposed to his wrath, to be divided to his left hand, to be condemned by him—how dreadful! If he will destroy, who can save? Those who fall under his condemning sentence must perish, and that for ever. Note, Those who love not the Lord Jesus Christ must perish without remedy. The wrath of God abides on every one who believes not on the Son, Jno. iii. 36, and true faith in Christ will evermore be productive of sincere love to him. Those who love him not cannot be believers in him.

Thirdly, The apostle closes all with his good wishes for them, and expressions of goodwill to them. 1. With his good wishes, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you," ver. 23. As much as if he had said, "Though I warn you against falling under his displeasure, I heartily wish you an interest in his dearest love and his eternal favour." The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ comprehends in it all that is good, for time or eternity. To wish our friends may have this grace with them is wishing them the utmost good, and this we should wish all our friends and brethren in Christ. We can wish them nothing more, and we should wish them nothing less. We should heartily pray that they may value, and seek, and obtain, and secure the grace and goodwill of their Lord and Judge. Note, The most solemn warnings are the result of the tenderest affection, and the greatest goodwill. We may tell our brethren and friends with great plainness and pathos, that if they love not the Lord Jesus Christ they must perish, whilst we heartily wish the grace of Christ may be with them. Nay, we may give them this warning that they may prize and lay hold of this grace. Note also, How much true Christianity enlarges our hearts. It makes us wish those whom we love the blessings of both worlds. For this is implied in wishing the grace of Christ to be with them; and therefore it is no wonder, 2. That the apostle should close all with the declaration of his love to them in Christ Jesus; "My love be with you all in Christ Jesus, Amen," ver. 24. He had dealt very plainly with them in this epistle, and told them of their faults with just severity; but, to shew that he was not transported with passion, he parts with them in love, makes solemn profession of his love to them, nay to them all in Christ Jesus, that is, for Christ's sake. He tells them that his heart was with them, that he truly loved them; but, lest this after all should be deemed flattery and insinuation, he adds, that his affection was the result of his religion, and would be guided by the rules of it. His heart would be with them, and he would bear them dear affection, as long as their hearts were with Christ, and they bore true affection to his cause and interest. Note, We should be cordial lovers of all that are in Christ and that love him in sincerity. Not but that we should love all men, and wish them well, and do them what good is in our power; but they must have our dearest affection who are dear to Christ, and lovers of him. May our love be with all them that are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

Corinthians had been received by them a year before the time of the second epistle, and therefore some months before this epistle" (Stanley).

xvi. 22. "Maranatha;" "the Lord comes:" the anathema being confirmed by an allusion to the judgment.

Additional Notes.—Chap. ix. 24. Paul has spoken of his aim in life, he now speaks of the spirit in which each ought to pursue his high calling. "The stadium, or race-course, was an almost sacred edifice, under the tutelage of the patron deity of the Ionian tribes, and surrounded by the most solemn recollections of Greece; its white marble seats rising like the foundation of a temple in the grassy slope, under the shadow of the huge Corinthian citadel which guards the entrance of the Peloponnesus. The race, in which all run; the pugilistic contests, in which they strove not 'to beat the air,' were solemn trials of the excellence of the competitors in the 'gymnastic art.' As the friends and relatives watched with breathless interest the issue of the contest, they knew that the victor would be handed down to posterity by having his name sung in triumphal odes, and his likeness placed in the long line of statues which formed the approach to the adjacent temple. The 'prize' was such as could awaken no mean or mercenary motives: it was a garland of the Grecian pine, which still clothes with its light green foliage the plains of the isthmus, and which was then consecrated to the sea-god around whose temple its groves were gathered" (Conybeare and Howson).

OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF

ST. PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

In his former epistle the apostle had signified his intention of coming to Corinth as he passed through Macedonia, ch. xvi. 6, but, being providentially hindered for some time, he writeth this second epistle to them about a year after the former; and there seem to be these two urgent occasions: 1. The case of the incestuous person that lay under censure required that with all speed he should be restored and received again into communion. This therefore he giveth directions about, ch. ii.; and afterwards, ch. vii., he declareth the satisfaction he had upon the intelligence he received of their good behaviour in that affair. 2. There was a contribution now making for the poor saints at Jerusalem, which he exhorteth the Corinthians to join in, ch. viii. and ix.

There are divers other things very observable in this epistle; for example, I. The account the apostle giveth of his labours and success in preaching the Gospel in several places, ch. ii. II. The comparison he maketh between the Old and New Testament dispensation, ch. iii. III. The manifold sufferings that he and his fellow labourers met with, and the motives and encouragements for their diligence and patience, ch. iv., v. IV. The caution he giveth the Corinthians against mingling themselves with unbelievers, ch. vi. V. The way and manner in which he justifieth himself, and his apostleship, from the opprobrious insinuations and accusations of false teachers, that endeavoured to ruin his reputation at Corinth, ch. x., xi., xii., and throughout the whole epistle.

[The epistle is substantially of the same character as the first. It was written to a church where great dissensions and other evils prevailed; it was designed to promote a reformation, and is a model of the manner in which evils are to be corrected in a church. In connection with the first epistle, it shews the manner in which offenders in the church are to be dealt with, and the spirit and design with which the work of discipline should be entered on and pursued. Though these were local evils, yet great principles are involved here, of use to the church in all ages; and to these epistles the church must refer at all times, as an illustration of the proper manner of administering discipline, and of silencing the calumnies of enemies. As to the time and place in which the epistle was written, it is manifest that this epistle was written from Macedonia, (see ch. viii. 1—14, and ix. 2.) and was sent by Titus to the church of Corinth. If so, it was written probably about a year after the former epistle. Paul was on his way to Corinth, and was expecting to go there soon. He had left Ephesus, where he was when he wrote the first epistle, and had gone to Troas, and from thence to Macedonia, where he had met with Titus, and had from him learned what was the effect of his first epistle. In the overflowing of his heart with gratitude for the success of that letter, and with a desire to carry forward the work of reformation in the church, and completely to remove all the objections which had been made to his apostolic authority, and to prepare for his own welcome reception when he went there, he wrote this letter—a letter which we cannot doubt was as kindly received as the former, and which, like that, accomplished the objects which he had in view.—A. CHAPTER I.

After the introduction, ver. 1, 2, the apostle begins with the narrative of his troubles and God's goodness, which he had met with in Asia, by way of thanksgiving to God, ver. 3—6; and for the edification of the Corinthians, ver. 7—11. Then he attests his and his fellow labourers' integrity, ver. 12—14; and afterwards vindicateth himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy, ver. 15—24.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia: 2 Grace be to you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the introduction to this epistle, in which we have, First. The inscription; and therein, 1. The person from whom it was sent; namely, Paul, who calls himself "an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God." The apostleship itself was ordained by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God; and Paul was called to it by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God. He joins Timotheus with himself in writing this epistle; not because he needed his assistance, but that out of the mouth of two witnesses the word might be established; and his dignifying Timothy with the title of brother (either in the common faith, or in the work of the ministry) shews the humility of this great apostle, and his desire to recommend Timothy (though he was then a young man) to the esteem of the Corinthians, and give him a reputation among the churches. 2. The persons to whom this epistle was sent, namely, "the church of God at Corinth;" and not only to them, but also to "all the saints in all Achaia," that is, to all the Christians who lived in the region round about. Note, In Christ Jesus no distinction is made between the inhabitants of city and country; all Achaia stands upon a level in his account.

Secondly. The salutation or apostolical benediction, which is the same as in his former epistle; and therein the apostle desires the two great and comprehensive blessings, grace and peace, for those Corinthians. These two benefits are fitly joined together, because there is no good and lasting peace without true grace; and both of them come "from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ," who is the procurer and dispenser of those benefits to fallen man, and is prayed to as God.

3 Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort; 4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. 5 For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ. 6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

After the foregoing preface, the apostle begins with the narrative of God's goodness to him and his fellow-labourers in their manifold tribulations, which he speaks of by way of thanksgiving to God, and to advance the Divine glory, ver. 3—6; and it is fit that in all things, and in the first place, God be glorified. Observe,

First. The object of the apostle's thanksgiving, to whom he offereth up blessing and praise, namely, the blessed God, who only is to be praised, whom he describeth by several glorious and amiable titles. 1. "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" ὁ Θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. God is the Father of Christ's Divine nature by eternal generation—of his human nature by miraculous conception in the womb of the Virgin—and of Christ, as God-man, and our Redeemer, by covenant relation—ad in and through him as i. 1. This epistle was most probably written in Macedonia, in the autumn A.D. 57. Paul had written the first epistle at Ephesus in the spring, and had quitted that place during the summer. This was on his third missionary journey. On his way to Macedonia he stayed at Troas, expecting Titus, who had been sent to Corinth to make the collection for the poor Christians at Jerusalem, to report on the state of the Corinthian church, and enforce the admonitions of St. Paul. Titus was delayed, and the uncertainty respecting the Corinthians caused Paul deep anxiety. After a stay of some weeks at Troas he started for Macedonia, and it is not unlikely that Philippi was the place where he wrote this second epistle. The arrival of Titus brought comfort to the apostle (see chap. vii. 6). The majority of the Corinthian church had submitted to his injunctions, and had excommunicated the incestuous person; a minority, however, maintained an opposition, even charging the apostle with selfish and mercenary motives, and with not venturing to come amongst them.

* Note by Rev. Daniel Mayo.

Mediator our God and our Father, Jno. xx. 17. In the Old Testament we often meet with this title, "The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob," to denote God's covenant relation to them and their seed; and in the New Testament God is styled "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," to denote his covenant relation to the Mediator and his spiritual seed, Gal. iii. 16. 2. "The Father of mercies." There are a multitude of tender mercies in God essentially, and all mercies are from God originally. Mercy is his genuine offspring and his delight; "He delighteth in mercy," Mic. vii. 18. 3. The God of all comfort. From him proceedeth the Comforter, Jno. xv. 26. He giveth "the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts," ver. 22. All our comforts come from God, and our sweetest comforts are in him.

Secondly. The reasons of the apostle's thanksgiving, which are these. 1. The benefits that he himself and his companions had received from God; for God had comforted them in all their tribulation, ver. 4. In the world they had trouble, but in Christ they had peace. The apostles met with many tribulations, but they found comfort in them all. Their sufferings (which are called the sufferings of Christ, ver. 5. because Christ sympathised with his members when suffering for his sake) did abound, but their consolation by Christ did abound also. Note, 1st. Then are we qualified to receive the comfort of God's mercies when we set ourselves to give him the glory of them. 2nd. Then we speak best of God and his goodness when we speak from our own experience, and in telling others tell God also what he hath done for our souls. 2. The advantage which others might receive; for God intended that they should be able to comfort others in trouble, ver. 4. by communicating to them their experiences of the Divine goodness and mercy; and the sufferings of good men have a tendency to this good end, ver. 6. when they are endured with faith and patience. Note, 1st. What favours God bestoweth on us are intended not only to make us cheerful ourselves, but also that we may be useful to others. 2nd. If we do imitate the faith and patience of good men in their afflictions, we may hope to partake of their consolations here and their salvation hereafter.

7 And our hope of you is stedfast, knowing, that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation. 8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life: 9 But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead: 10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us; 11 Ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

In these verses the apostle speaketh for the encouragement and edification of the Corinthians, and tells them (ver. 7.) of his persuasion or stedfast hope that they should receive benefit by the troubles he and his companions in labour and travel had met with; that their faith should not be weakened, but their consolations increased. In order to this he tells them,

First. What their sufferings had been; ver. 8. "We would not have you ignorant of our trouble." It was convenient for the churches to know what were the sufferings of their ministers. It is not certain what particular troubles in Asia are here referred to; whether the tumult raised by Demetrius at Ephesus, mentioned Acts xix.; or the fight with beasts at Ephesus, mentioned in the former epistle, ch. xv.; or some other trouble, for the apostle was in deaths often. This however is evident, they were great tribulations. They "were pressed out of measure," to a very extraordinary degree, above the common strength of men, or of ordinary Christians, to bear up under them, insomuch that they "despaired even of life," ver. 8. and thought they should have been killed, or have fainted away and expired.

Secondly. What they did in their distress. They trusted in God; and therefore they were brought to that extremity, "that they should not trust in themselves, but in God," ver. 9. Note, God often bringeth his people into great straits that they may apprehend their own insufficiency to help themselves, and may be induced to place their trust and hope in his all-sufficiency. Our extremity is God's opportunity; "In the mount will the Lord be seen;" and we may safely trust in "God which raiseth the dead," ver. 9. God's raising the dead is a proof of his almighty power. He that can do that can do any thing, can do all things, and is worthy to be trusted in at all times. Abraham's faith fastened upon this instance of the Divine power. "He believed God who quickeneth the dead," Rom. iv. 17. If we should be brought so low as to despair even of life, yet we may then trust in God, who can bring back not only from the gates, but from the jaws of death.

Thirdly. What the deliverance was they had obtained, and this was seasonable and continued. Their hope and trust was not in vain, nor shall any that trust in him be ashamed. God had delivered them, and did still deliver them, ver. 10. "Having obtained help of God, they continued to that day," Acts xxvi. 22.

Fourthly. What use they made of this deliverance. "We trust that he will yet deliver us," ver. 10. that God will deliver to the end, and preserve to his heavenly kingdom. Note, Past experiences are great encouragements to faith and hope, and they lay great obligations to trust in God for time to come. We reproach our experiences if we distrust God in future straits, who hath delivered us in former troubles. David, even when a young man, and had but a small stock of experiences, argued after the manner the apostle here argueth, 1 Sam. xvii. 37.

Fifthly. What was desired of the Corinthians upon this account, namely, that they would help together by prayer for them, ver. 11. by social prayer, agreeing and joining together in prayer on their behalf. Note, Our trusting in God must not supersede the use of any proper and appointed means; and prayer is one of those means. We should pray for ourselves, and for one another. The apostle had himself a great interest in the throne of grace, yet he desireth the help of others' prayers. And if we thus help one another by our prayers we may hope for an occasion of giving thanks by many for answer of prayer. And it is our duty not only to help one another with prayer, but in praise and thanksgiving, and thereby to make suitable returns for benefits received.

12 For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward. 13 For we write none other things unto you, than what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end; 14 As also ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are our's in the day of the Lord Jesus.

The apostle in these verses attests their integrity by the sincerity of their conversation. This he doth not in a way of boasting and vain glory, but as one good reason the more comfortably to trust in God, and for desiring the help of prayer, Heb. xiii. 18.; and for the necessary vindication of himself from the aspersions of some persons at Corinth, who reproached his person, and questioned his apostleship. And here consider,

First. He appealeth to the testimony of conscience with rejoicing, ver. 12. In which observe, 1. The witness appealed to; namely, conscience, which is instead of a thousand witnesses. This is God's deputy in the soul, and the voice of conscience is the voice of God. They rejoiced in the testimony of conscience when their enemies reproached them, and were enraged against them. Note, The testimony of conscience for us, if that be right and upon good grounds, will be matter of rejoicing at all times, and in all conditions. 2. The testimony this witness gave. And here take notice, conscience witnessed, 1st. Concerning their conversation, that is, their constant course and tenor of life; and by that we may judge of ourselves, and not by this or that single act. 2nd. Concerning the nature or manner of their conversation, that it was in "simplicity and godly sincerity." This blessed apostle was a true Israelite, a man of plain dealing, you might know where to have him. He was not a man that seemed to be one thing and was another, but a man of sincerity. 3rd. Concerning the principle they acted upon in all their conversation, both in the world and towards these Corinthians; and that was not fleshly wisdom, or carnal politics and worldly views, but it was the grace of God, a vital gracious principle in the heart, that cometh from God, and tendeth to God. And then will our conversation be well ordered when we live and act under the influence and command of such a gracious principle in the heart.

Secondly. He appealeth to the knowledge of the Corinthians with hope and confidence, ver. 13, 14. Their conversation did in part fall under the observation of the Corinthians, and these knew how they behaved themselves, how holily, and justly, and unblameably; they never found any thing in them unbecoming an honest man. This they had acknowledged in part already, and he doubted not but they would still do so to the end; that is, that they should never have any good reason to think or say otherwise of him, but that he was an honest man, and so there would be mutual rejoicing in one another. "We are your rejoicing, even as ye also are ours in the day of the Lord Jesus." Note, It is happy when ministers and people do rejoice in each other here; and this joy will be complete in that day when the Great Shepherd of the sheep shall appear.

15 And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit; 16 And to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judæa. 17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea yea, and nay nay? 18 But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay. 19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea. 20 For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us. 21 Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; 22 Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. 23 Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth. 24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

The apostle vindicateth himself from the imputation of levity and inconsistency in that he did not hold his purpose of coming to them at Corinth. His adversaries there sought all occasions to blemish his character, and reflect

i. 8. By the "trouble" here spoken of many think St. Paul means the uproar which took place at Ephesus (Acts xix.). Alford, however, thinks that he refers to some bodily sickness.

i. 9. "Sentence;" rather decree, or answer. "We had in ourselves the answer of death"—i.e., "To the question whether we should escape death or die, we could only answer die."

i. 11. "Gift;" the deliverance (whether from external danger or sickness) graciously bestowed by God. "By the means;" i.e., by the intercession. Kling remarks, "Christians enjoy a threefold fellowship—in suffering, in consolation, and in prayer."

i. 15. "Before;" i.e., before he visited Macedonia, where he now was. "Second benefit;" the benefit would be the imparting of grace and spiritual gifts. He says a "second" benefit, because he had purposed twice (verse 16.) visiting them.

i. 18. "Our word was not yea and nay;" rather, "our doctrine is not yea and nay." He appeals to his preaching as a witness against upon his conduct; and it seemed they took hold of this handle to reproach his person and discredit his ministry. Now, for his justification,

First. He avers the sincerity of his intention, ver. 15-17, and he doth this in confidence of their good opinion of him, and that they would believe him when he assured them he was minded, or did really intend, to come to them; and that with design, not that he might receive, but that they might receive, a second benefit, that is, some farther advantage by his ministry. He tells them he had not herein used lightness, ver. 17; that, as he aimed not at any secular advantage to himself, for his purpose was not "according to the flesh," that is, with carnal views and aims, so it was not a rash and inconsiderate resolution he had taken up, for he had laid his measures thus of passing by them to Macedonia, and coming again to them from Macedonia in his way to Judæa, ver. 16; and, therefore, they might conclude it was for some weighty reasons that he had altered his purpose, and that with him there was not yea yea, and nay nay, ver. 17; that is, he was not to be accused of levity and inconstancy, or a contradiction between his words and intentions.

[It seems more probable, however, that the phrase is designed to denote the ready compliance which an inconstant and unsettled man is accustomed to make with the wishes of others; his expressing a ready assent to what they propose; falling in with their views; readily making promises; and instantly, through some whim, or caprice, or wish of others, saying, "Yea, Nay," to the same thing; that is, changing his mind, and altering his purpose without any good reason, or in accordance with any fixed principle or settled rule of action. Paul says that this was not his character. He did not affirm a thing at one time and deny it at another—he did not promise to do a thing one moment and refuse to do it the next.—A. B.]

Note, Good men should be careful to preserve the reputation of sincerity and constancy; they should not resolve but upon mature deliberation, and they will not change their resolves but for weighty reasons.

Secondly. He would not have the Corinthians to infer that his Gospel was false or uncertain, or that it was contradictory in itself, or unto truth, ver. 18, 19. For if it had been so, that he had been fickle in his purposes, or even false in the promises he made of coming to them, (which he was not justly to be accused of, and so some understand this expression, ver. 18, "Our word toward you was not yea and nay,") yet it would not follow that the Gospel preached not only by him, but also by others in full agreement with him, was either false or doubtful.

[By us," &c. Silvanus, here mentioned, is the same person who in the Acts of the Apostles is called Silas. He was with Paul at Philippi, and was imprisoned there with him, Acts xvi., and was afterwards with Paul and Timothy at Corinth when he first visited that city, Acts xviii. 5. Paul was so much attached to him, and had so much confidence in him, that he joined his name with his own in several of his epistles, 1 Thes. i. 1; 2 Thes. i. 1.—A. B.]

For "God is true," and "the Son of God, Jesus Christ," is true. The true God and eternal life. Jesus Christ whom the apostle preached is not yea and nay, but in him was yea, ver. 19; nothing but infallible truth. And the promises of God in Christ are not yea and nay, but yea and Amen, ver. 20. There is an inviolable constancy and unquestionable sincerity and certainty in all the parts of the Gospel of Christ. If in the promises that the ministers of the Gospel do make as common men, and about their own affairs, they see cause sometimes to vary from them, yet the promises of the Gospel covenant which they preach stand firm and inviolable. Bad men are false, good men are fickle; but "God is true," neither fickle nor false.

[It is agreed, says Bloomfield, by the best commentators, ancient and modern, that by Jesus Christ is here meant his doctrine. The sense is, that the preaching respecting Jesus Christ did not represent him as fickle and changeable—as unsettled, and as unfaithful—but as true, consistent, and faithful. As that had been the regular and constant representation of Paul and his fellow-labourers in regard to the master whom they served, it was to be inferred that they felt themselves bound sacredly to observe the strictest constancy and veracity.—A. B.]

The apostle, having mentioned the stability of the Divine promises, maketh a digression to illustrate this great and sweet truth, that all the promises of God are yea and Amen. For, 1. They are the promises of the God of truth, ver. 20, of him that cannot lie, whose truth as well as mercy endureth for ever. 2. They are made in Christ Jesus, ver. 20, the Amen, the true and faithful witness. He hath purchased and ratified the covenant of promises, and is the "Surety of the covenant," Heb. vii. 22. 3. They are confirmed by the Holy Spirit. He doth establish Christians in the faith of the Gospel; he hath anointed them with his sanctifying grace, which in Scripture is often compared to oil; he hath sealed them for their security and confirmation; and he is given as an earnest in their hearts, ver. 21, 22. An earnest doth secure the promise, and is part of the payment. The illumination of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting light, the quickening of the Spirit is an earnest of everlasting life, and the comforts of the Spirit are an earnest of everlasting joy. Note, The veracity of God, the mediation of Christ, and the operation of the Spirit, are all engaged that the promises shall be sure to all the seed, and the accomplishment of them shall be to the glory of God, ver. 20, for the glory of his rich and sovereign grace, and never-failing truth and faithfulness.

Thirdly. The apostle giveth a good reason why he did not come to Corinth as was expected, ver. 23. It was that he might spare them. They ought therefore to own his kindness and tenderness. He knew there were things amiss among them, and such as deserved censure, but was desirous to shew tenderness. He assureth them this was the true reason, after this very solemn manner, "I call God for a record upon my soul;" a way of speaking not justifiable where used in trivial matters, but this was very justifiable in the apostle for his necessary vindication, and for the credit and usefulness of his ministry, which was struck at by his opposers. He addeth, to prevent mistakes, that he did not pretend to "any dominion over their faith," ver. 24. Christ only is the Lord of our faith, he is the "author and finisher of our faith," Heb. xii. 2. He doth reveal to us what we must believe. Paul and Apollos, and the rest of the apostles, were but "ministers by whom they believed," 1 Cor. iii. 5, and so the helpers of their joy, even the joy of faith; for by faith we stand firm, and live safely and comfortably. Our strength and ability is owing to faith, and our comfort and joy must flow from faith.

1. God is the only true and real source of comfort in times of trial, ver. 3. It is from him that all real consolation must come, and he only can meet and sustain the soul when it is borne down by calamity. 2. It is possible to bless God in the midst of trials, and as the result of trial. It is possible so clearly to see his hand, and to be so fully satisfied with the wisdom and goodness of his dealings, even when we are severely afflicted, as to see that he is worthy of our highest confidence and most exalted praise, ver. 3. God may be seen then to be the "Father of mercies," and he may impart, even then, a consolation which we never experienced in the days of prosperity. 3. Ministers of the Gospel may expect to be peculiarly tried and afflicted, ver. 5. So it was with Paul and his fellow-apostles, and so it has been since. 4. If we suffer much in the cause of the Redeemer, we may also expect much consolation, ver. 5. Christ will take care that our hearts shall be filled with joy and peace. As our trials in his cause are, so shall our consolations be. 5. In this chapter we have a case of a near contemplation of death, ver. 8, 9. Paul expected soon to die. He had the sentence of death in himself. It is interesting, then, to inquire how Paul felt when he looked at death, how we should feel, and how we actually shall feel when we come to die. Now, a contemplation of death as near and certain is fitted to lead us to trust in God. This was the effect in the case of Paul, ver. 9. He had learned in health to put his trust in him; and now, when the trial was apparently near, he had nowhere else to go, and he confided in him alone. He felt that, if he was rescued, it could be only by the interposition of God, and that there was none but God who could sustain him if he should die. And what event can there be that is so well fitted to lead us to trust in God as death? And where else can we go in view of that dark hour? 6. We should regard our own restoration, or that of our friends, from dangerous sickness, and from imminent peril of death, as a kind of resurrection. So Paul regarded it, ver. 9. We should remember how easy it would have been for God to have removed us—how rapidly we were tending to the grave—how certainly we should have descended there, but for his interposition. We should feel that lives thus preserved, and thus recovered from danger, belong to God. He has preserved them. In the most absolute sense they belong to him, and to him they should be consecrated. So Paul felt; and his whole life shews how entirely he regarded himself as bound to devote a life often preserved in the midst of peril to the service of his kind benefactor. 7. All Christians should regard themselves as consecrated to God, ver. 21. They have been anointed, or set apart to his service. They should feel that they are as really set apart to his service as the ancient prophets, priests, and kings were to their appropriate offices by the ceremony of anointing. They belong to God, and are under every sacred and solemn obligation to live to him, and him alone. It is an inestimable privilege to be a Christian, ver. 21, 22. It is regarded as a privilege to be an heir to an estate, and to have an assurance that it will be ours. But the Christian has an "earnest," a pledge, that heaven is his. He is anointed of God, he is sealed for heaven. Heaven is his home; and God is giving to him daily evidence in his own experience that he will soon be admitted to its pure and blissful abodes. The joys of the Christian on earth are of the same nature as the joys of heaven. These comforts are an "earnest" of the future inheritance, a part of that which the Christian is to enjoy for ever. His joys on earth are "heaven begun;" and all that is needful to constitute heaven is that these joys should be expanded and perpetuated. There will be no other heaven than that which would be constituted by the expanded joys of a Christian. 8. Christians should be careful not to grieve the Holy Spirit; compare Eph. iv. 30. It is by that Spirit that they are "anointed" and "sealed," and it is by him that they have the earnest of their future inheritance. All good influences on their minds proceed from that Spirit, and it should be their high and constant aim not to grieve him. By no course of conduct, by no conversation, by no impure thought, should they drive that Spirit from their minds. All their peace and joy is dependent on their cherishing his sacred presence, and by all the means in their power they should strive to secure his constant agency on their souls.—A. B.]

CHAPTER II.

In this chapter the apostle proceedeth in the account of the reasons why he did not come to Corinth, ver. 1-4. Then he writeth concerning the incestuous person that lay under censure, and giveth direction for the restoring him, together with the reasons for their so doing, ver. 5-11. And afterwards informeth them of his labours and success in preaching the Gospel in several places, ver. 12-17.

UT I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness. 2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me? 3 And I wrote this same unto you, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all. 4 For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

In these verses,

First. The apostle proceedeth in giving an account of the reason why he did not come to Corinth as was expected, namely, because he was unwilling to grieve them or be grieved by them, ver. 1, 2; he hath determined not to come to them in heaviness, which yet he would have done had he come and found scandal among them not duly animadverted upon. This would have been cause of grief both to him and them, for their sorrow or joy at meeting would have been mutual. If he had made them sorry, that would have been a sorrow to himself, for there would have been none to have made him glad. But his desire was to have a cheerful meeting with them, and not have it embittered by any unhappy occasion of disagreeing.

Secondly. He tells them it was to the same intent that he wrote his former epistle, ver. 3, 4; namely, 1. That he might not have sorrow from them, of whom he ought to rejoice; and that he had written to them in confidence of their doing what was requisite in order to their benefit and his comfort. The particular thing referred to, as appeareth by the following verses, was the case of the incestuous person about whom he had written in the first epistle, ch. v. Nor was the apostle disappointed in his expectation. 2. He assureth them that he did not design to grieve them, but to testify his love to them, and that he wrote to them with much anguish and affliction in his own heart, and with great affection to them. He had written with tears, that they might know his abundant love to them. Note, 1st. That even in reproofs, admonitions, and any fickleness. It was and is not now one thing and now another, but the same. He uses the present tense "is" because of the unchangeable character of the doctrine.

i. 23. His reason for not coming. Had he carried out his first purpose, he would have been obliged to have come with censure rather than praise.

i. 24. "He means that by their own faith—their belief and trust in the common objects of faith—they maintained their spiritual position and character. Their reception of the truth was independent of any personal authority claimed by the apostle, nor was the exercise of any such authority required for their maintenance of it."

ii. 1. "Again:" implying that he had already paid a visit in grief. This was not his first visit, but was probably a short one paid during his stay at Ephesus, of which we have no account. The "grief" is not his grief alone, but theirs as well as his, he grieving them and they him.

acts of discipline, faithful ministers shew their love. 2nd. That needful censures, and the exercise of church discipline towards offenders, is a grief to tender-spirited ministers, and are administered with regret.

5 But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all. 6 Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many. 7 So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow. 8 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him. 9 For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things. 10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I for-give also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ; 11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

In these verses the apostle treateth concerning the incestuous person that had been excommunicated, which seemeth to be one principal cause of his writing this epistle. Here observe,

First. He tells them the crime of that person had grieved him in part; and that he was grieved also with a part of them, who, notwithstanding this scandal, had been found among them, were "puffed up, and had not mourned," 1 Cor. v. 2. However, he was unwilling to lay too heavy a charge upon the whole church, especially seeing they had cleared themselves in that matter, by observing the directions he had formerly given them.

Secondly. He tells them that the punishment which had been inflicted upon this offender was sufficient, ver. 6. The desired effect was obtained; for the man was humbled, and they had shewn the proof of their obedience to his directions.

Thirdly. He therefore directeth them with all speed to restore the excommunicated person, or to receive him again to their communion, ver. 7, 8. This is expressed several ways: he beseecheth them to forgive him, that is, to release him from church censures,—for they could not remit the guilt or offence against God,—and also to comfort him; for in many cases the comfort of penitents dependeth not only upon their reconciliation with God but with men also, whom they have scandalized or injured. They must also confirm their love to him; that is, they should shew their reproofs and censures did proceed from love to his person as well as hatred to his sin, and that their design was to reform, not to ruin him. Or, thus, if his fall had weakened their love to him, that they could not take that satisfaction in him as formerly, yet, now that he was recovered by repentance, they must renew and confirm their love to him.

Fourthly. He useth several weighty arguments to persuade them to do thus: for example, 1. The case of the penitent called for this, for he was in danger of being "swallowed up with overmuch sorrow," ver. 7. He was so sensible of his fault, and so much afflicted under his punishment, that he was in danger of falling into despair; and when sorrow is excessive it doth hurt. Even sorrow for sin is too great when it unfits for other duties, and driveth men to despair. 2. They had shewn obedience to his directions in passing a censure upon him, and now he would have them comply with his desire to restore him, ver. 9. 3. He mentions his readiness to forgive this penitent, and concur with them in this matter; "To whom ye forgive, I forgive also," ver. 10; that is, I will readily concur with you in forgiving him. And this he would do for their sakes, for love to them, and for their advantage; and for Christ's sake, or in his name, as his apostle, and in conformity to his doctrine and example, which is so full of kindness and tender mercy towards all them that truly repent. 4. He giveth another weighty reason; ver. 11, "Lest Satan get an advantage against us." Not only was there danger lest Satan should get an advantage of the penitent, by driving him to despair, but against the churches also, and the apostles or ministers of Christ, by representing them as too rigid and severe, and so frightening people from coming among them.

In this, as in other things, wisdom is profitable to direct, so to manage, according as the case may be, that the ministry may not be blamed for indulging sin on the one hand, or for too great severity towards sinners on the other. Note, Satan is a subtle enemy, and useth many stratagems to deceive us, and we should not be ignorant of his devices; and he is a watchful adversary, ready to take all advantages against us, and we should be very cautious lest we give him any occasion so to do.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, 13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia. 14 Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place. 15 For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: 16 To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things? 17 For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ.

PORT OF TROAS.

After these directions concerning the excommunicated person, the apostle maketh a long digression to give the Corinthians an account of his travels and labours for the furtherance of the Gospel, and what success he had had therein; declaring at the same time how much he was concerned for them and their affairs; how he had no rest in his spirit, when he found not Titus at Troas, ver. 13, as he did expect, from whom he hoped to have understood more perfectly how it fared with them. And we find afterwards, ch. vii. 6, 7, that when the apostle was come into Macedonia he was comforted by the coming of Titus, and the information he gave him concerning them. So that we may look upon all that we read from this second chapter, ver. 12, to ch. vii. 5, as a kind of parenthesis. Observe here,

First. Paul's unwearied labour and diligence in his work, ver. 12, 13. He travelled from place to place to preach the Gospel. He went to Troas from Philippi by sea, Acts xx. 6; from thence he went to Macedonia, so that he was prevented from passing by Corinth, as he designed, ch. i. 16. But, though he was prevented in his design, as to the place of working, yet he was unwearied in his work.

Secondly. His success in his work. A great "door was opened to him of the Lord," ver. 12. He had a great deal of work to do wherever he came, and had good success in his work, for God made manifest the savour of his knowledge by him in every place where he came. He had an opportunity to open the door of his mouth freely, and God opened the hearts of his hearers, as the heart of Lydia, Acts xvi. 14; and the apostle speaketh of this as a matter of thankfulness to God, and of rejoicing to his soul; "Thanks be to God," saith he, "which always causeth us to triumph in Christ." Note, 1. A believer's triumphs are all in Christ. In ourselves we are weak, and have neither joy nor victory, but in Christ we may rejoice and triumph. 2. True believers have constant cause of triumph in Christ, for they are more than conquerors through him that hath loved them, Rom. viii. 37. 3. God causeth them to triumph in Christ. It is God that hath given us matter for triumph, and hearts to triumph. To him, therefore, be the praise and glory of all. 4. The good success of the Gospel is a good reason for a Christian's joy and rejoicing.

[The word which is here rendered "triumph," (θριαμβέοντι, from θριαμβεύειν) occurs in no other place in the New Testament, except in Col. ii. 15. It is there rendered "triumphing over them in it," that is, triumphing over the principalities and powers which he had spoiled or plundered, and it there means, that Christ led them in triumph after the manner of a conqueror. It was particularly applied, among both the Greeks and the Romans, to a public and solemn honour conferred on a victorious general on a return from a successful war, in which he was allowed a magnificent entrance into the capital. In these triumphs the victorious commander was usually preceded or attended by the spoils of war,—by the most valuable and magnificent articles which he had captured,—and by the princes, nobles, generals, or people whom he had subdued. Paul refers here to a victory which he had, and a triumph with which he was favoured by the Redeemer. It was a victory over the enemies of the Gospel—it was success in advancing the interests of the kingdom of Christ; and he rejoiced in that victory, and in that success, with more solid and substantial joy than a Roman victor ever felt on returning from his conquests over nations, even when attended with the richest spoils of victory, and by humble princes and kings in chains, and when the assembled thousands shouted, Te triumphe.—A. B.]

Thirdly. The comfort that the apostle and his companions in labour did find, when the Gospel was not successful to the salvation of some that heard it, ver. 15–17. Here observe,

1. The different success of the Gospel, and its different effects upon several sorts of persons to whom it is preached. The success is different; for some are saved by it, whilst others perish under it. Nor is this to be wondered at, considering the different effects the Gospel hath; for, 1. Unto some it is a "savour of death unto death." Those that are willingly ignorant, and wilfully obstinate, do disrelish the Gospel, as men dislike an ill savour, and therefore they are blinded and hardened by it. It stirs up their corruptions and exasperateth their spirits. They reject the Gospel to their ruin, even to spiritual and eternal death. 2. Unto others the Gospel is a "savour of life unto life." To humble and gracious souls the preaching of the word is most delightful and profitable. As it is sweeter than honey to the taste so it is more grateful than the most precious odours to the senses, and much more profitable; for as it quickened them at first, when they were dead in trespasses and sins, so it maketh them more lively, and will end in eternal life.

["The savour,"—doxas. The smell, the fragrance. The word in the New Testament is used to denote a pleasant or fragrant odour, as of incense or aromatics, Jno. xii. 3; see Eph. v. 2; Phil. iv. 18. There is an allusion here, doubtless, to the fact that in the triumphal processions fragrant odours were diffused around. So Paul speaks of knowledge—the knowledge of Christ. In his triumphings the knowledge of the Redeemer was diffused abroad, like the odours which were diffused in the triumphal march of the conqueror.—A. B.]

2. The awful impressions this matter made upon the mind of the apostle, and should also make upon our spirits; "Who is sufficient for these things?"

i. 2. He had no pleasure in their sorrow, nay, their sorrow removed his source of joy.

ii. 5. Alford renders, "Now if any one hath occasioned sorrow (a delicate way of pointing out the one who had occasioned it), he hath grieved not me (not 'not only me,' which destroys the meaning; 'I am not the aggrieved person, but you'), but, more or less (partially), that I be not too heavy on him, all of you."

ii. 6–12. The injunctions of St. Paul in his first epistle had been acted upon, and the incestuous person had been brought to penitence by the punishment inflicted. Now St. Paul counsels kindness, lest "Satan get an advantage over us"—i.e., lest, by the despair of the penitent one, Satan rob us of him altogether.

ii. 13. He expected Titus to bring news of the state of the Corinthian church, and his anxiety caused him restlessness.

ii. 15. "The odour was Christ, who to the unbelieving is death—a mere announcement of a man crucified, and working death by un-

ver. 16. Is he who is worthy to be employed in such weighty work,—a work of such vast importance, because of so great consequence? Who is able to perform such a difficult work, that requireth so much skill and industry? The work is great, and our strength is small, yea, of ourselves we have no strength at all; all our sufficiency is of God. Note, If men did seriously consider what great things depend upon the preaching of the Gospel, and how difficult the work of the ministry is, they would be very cautious how they enter upon it, and very careful to perform it well.

3. The comfort which the apostle had under this serious consideration. 1st. Because faithful ministers shall be accepted of God, whatever their success be. "We are," if faithful, "unto God a sweet savour of Christ," ver. 15, in them that are saved, and in them also that perish. God will accept of sincere intentions and honest endeavours, though with many they are not successful. Ministers shall be accepted, and recompensed, not according to their success, but according to their fidelity. "Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord," Isa. xlix. 5. 2nd. Because his conscience witnessed to his faithfulness, ver. 17. Though many did corrupt the word of God, ver. 17, yet the apostle's conscience witnessed to his fidelity. He did not mix his own notions with the doctrines and institutions of Christ; he durst not add to, nor diminish from, the word of God; he was faithful in dispensing the Gospel as he received it from the Lord, and had no secular turn to serve. His aim was to approve himself to God, remembering his eye was always upon him; he therefore spake and acted always as in the sight of God, and therefore in sincerity. Note, What we do in religion is not of God, doth not come from God, will not reach to God, unless it be done in sincerity, as in the sight of God.

[1. In this chapter, and in the management of the whole case to which Paul here refers, we have an instance of his tenderness in administering discipline. 2. Churches should be careful that Satan should not get an advantage over them, ver. 11. In every way possible he will attempt it, and perhaps in few modes is it more often done than in administering discipline. In such a case, Satan gains an advantage over a church in the following ways: 1st. In inducing it to neglect discipline. 2nd. Satan gains an advantage in discipline, sometimes by too great severity of discipline. 3rd. Satan gains an advantage in cases of discipline when the church is unwilling to re-admit to fellowship an offending but a penitent member. His spirit is broken, his usefulness is destroyed. The world usually takes side with him against the church, and the cause of religion bleeds. 3. Individual Christians, as well as churches, should be careful that Satan does not get any advantage over them, ver. 11. Among the ways in which he does this are the following: 1st. By inducing them to conform to the world. 2nd. By producing laxity of opinion in regard to doctrine. 3rd. By producing among Christians despondency, melancholy, and despair. 4th. By fanaticism. 5th. By contentions and strifes. 4. Ministers of the Gospel may have occasion to triumph in the success of their work. 5. The Gospel may be so preached as to be successful, ver. 14. In the hands of Paul it was successful; so it was with the other apostles; so it was with Luther, Knox, Calvin; so it was with Whitefield, Edwards, Wesley, and Payson. If ministers are not successful it is not the fault of the Gospel. 6. Much of the work of the ministry is pleasant and delightful. It is the savour of life unto life, ver. 15, 16. There is no joy on earth of a higher and purer character than that which the ministers of the Gospel have in the success of their work. 7. Let all ministers be careful that they do not corrupt the word of God, ver. 17. As they desire acceptance with God, and success in the work, let them preach the pure Gospel; not adulterating it with foreign admixtures; not endeavouring to change it so as to be palatable to the carnal mind; not substituting philosophy for the Gospel; and not withholding any thing in the Gospel because men do not love it; and let the people of God everywhere sustain the ministry by their prayers, and aid them in their work by daily commending them to the God of grace. So shall they be able to perform the solemn functions of their office to Divine acceptance, and so shall ministers and people find the Gospel to be "a savour of life unto life."—A. B.]

CHAPTER III.

The apostle maketh an apology for his seeming to commend himself, and is careful not to assume too much to himself, but to ascribe all praise unto God, ver. 1—5. He then runs a comparison between the Old Testament and the New, and sheweth the excellency of the latter above the former, ver. 6—11. From whence he infers what is the duty of gospel ministers, and the advantage of those who live under the Gospel above those who lived under the law, ver. 12—18.

O we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you? 2 Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men: 3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart. 4 And such trust have we through Christ to Godward: 5 Not that we are sufficient of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God;

In these verses,

First. The apostle maketh an apology for his seeming to commend himself. He thought it convenient to protest his sincerity to them, because there were some at Corinth who endeavoured to blast his reputation; yet he was not desirous of vain glory. And he tells them, 1. They neither needed nor desired any verbal commendation to them, nor letters testimonial from him, as some others did, meaning the false apostles or teachers, ver. 1. Their ministry among them had, without controversy, been truly great and honourable, how little soever their persons were in reality, or how contemptible soever some would have them thought to be. 2. The Corinthians themselves were their real commendation, and a good testimonial for them that God was with them of a truth, that they were sent of God. "Ye are our epistle," ver. 2. This was the testimonial they most delighted in, and what was most dear to them; they were written in their hearts. And this they could appeal to upon occasion, for it was, or might be, "known and read of all men." Note, There is nothing more delightful to faithful ministers, nor more to their commendation, than the success of their ministry, evidenced in the hearts and lives of those among whom they labour.

Secondly. The apostle is careful not to assume too much to himself, but to ascribe all the praise to God. Therefore, 1. He saith they were the epistle of Christ, ver. 3. The apostle and others were but instruments, Christ was the author of all the good that was in them. The law of Christ was written in their hearts, and the love of Christ shed abroad in their hearts. This epistle was not written with ink, "but with the Spirit of the living God;" nor was it written in tables of stone, as the law of God given to Moses, but on the heart, and that heart not a stony one, but a heart of flesh, upon the "fleshy" (not fleshly, as fleshliness denoteth sensuality) "tables of the heart," that is, upon hearts that are softened and renewed by Divine grace, according to that gracious promise, "I will take away the stony heart, and I will give you an heart of flesh," Eze. xxxvi. 26. This was the good hope the apostle had concerning these Corinthians, ver. 4, that their hearts were like the ark of the covenant, containing the tables of the law and the Gospel, written with the finger, that is, by the Spirit of the living God. 2. He utterly disclaimed the taking any praise to themselves, and ascribeth all the glory to God; "We are not sufficient of ourselves," ver. 5. We could never have made such good impressions on your hearts, nor upon our own. Such is our weakness and inability, that we cannot of ourselves think a good thought, much less raise any good thoughts or affections in other men. All "our sufficiency is of God;" to him therefore is owing all the praise and glory of that good which is done, and from him we must receive grace and strength to do more. This is true concerning ministers and all Christians; the best are no more than what the grace of God maketh them. Our hands are not sufficient for us, but our sufficiency is of God; and his grace is sufficient for us, to furnish us for every good word and work.

6 Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. 7 But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance; which glory was to be done away: 8 How shall not the ministration of the spirit be rather glorious? 9 For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. 10 For even that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth. 11 For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

Here the apostle runs a comparison between the Old Testament and the New, the law of Moses and the Gospel of Jesus Christ; and valueth himself and his fellow-labourers by this, that "they were able ministers of the New Testament," that God had made them so, ver. 6. And this he doth in answer to the accusations of false teachers, who magnify greatly the law of Moses.

"Who also hath made us able ministers." This refers properly to his sense of the responsibility and difficulty of the work of the ministry, and to the fact that he did not esteem himself to be sufficient for this work in his own strength, ch. ii. 16; iii. 5; and he here says that God had made him sufficient—not able, talented, learned, but sufficient, (ικανωμεν ημεις); he has supplied our deficiency; he has rendered us competent, or fit: if a word may be coined after the manner of the Greek here, 'he has sufficienced us for this work.' There is no assertion therefore here that they were men of talents, or peculiar ability, but only that God had qualified them for their work, and made them by his grace sufficient to meet the toils and responsibilities of this arduous office.—A. B.]

First. He distinguisheth between the letter and the spirit, even of the New Testament, ver. 6. And, as able ministers of the New Testament, they were ministers not merely of the letter, to read the written word, or to preach the letter of the Gospel only, but they were ministers of the Spirit also, that is, the Spirit of God did accompany their ministrations. The letter killeth; this is the letter of the law doth, for that is the ministration of death; and if we rest only in the letter of the Gospel we shall be never the better for so doing, for even that will be a savour of death unto death. But the Spirit of the Gospel, going along with the ministry of the Gospel, giveth life spiritual and life eternal.

Secondly. He sheweth the difference between the Old Testament and the New, and the excellency of the Gospel above the law; for, 1. The Old Testament dispensation was the "ministration of death," ver. 7, whereas that of the New Testament is the ministration of life. The law discovered sin, and the wrath and curse of God: that shewed us a God above us, and a God against us; but the Gospel discovereth grace and Immanuel, 'God with us.' Upon this account the Gospel is more glorious than the law, and yet that had a glory in it, witness the shining of Moses' face, an indication thereof, when he came down from the mount, with the tables in his hand, that reflected rays of brightness upon his countenance. 2. The law was the "ministration of condemnation," for that condemned and cursed every one that continued not in all things written therein to do them; but the Gospel is the "ministration of righteousness." Therein the righteousness of God by faith is revealed. This sheweth us the just shall live by his faith; this revealeth the grace and mercy of God through Jesus Christ, for the obtaining the remission of sins and belief; but to the believing, life—an announcement of his resurrection and life, and working in them life eternal by faith in him. The double working of the Gospel is set forth in Matt. xxi. 44; Luke ii. 34; John ix. 39.

iii. 1. "Again:" some had probably charged Paul with self-recommendation in his former letter. The letters of recommendation were those which members took with them when journeying from church to church. (See Acts xviii. 27.) Some who had come to Corinth, and now opposed Paul, had brought and requested such letters, and the practice prevailed largely afterwards. St. Paul asks ironically if they thought he needed to be recommended to them, and shows that his recommendation was the work of Christ done by his means in their midst—a letter which he bore upon his heart (so great was his love for them), and was patent to all men.

iii. 7. "Written:" rather, "in letters," alluding to the literal precepts of the law bringing the knowledge of sin and death.

eternal life. The Gospel therefore doth so much exceed in glory, that in a manner it doth eclipse the glory of the legal dispensation, ver. 10. As the shining of a burning lamp is lost, or not regarded, when the sun riseth and goeth forth in his strength, so there was no glory in the Old Testament in comparison with that of the New. 3. The law is done away, but the Gospel doth and shall remain, ver. 11. Not only did the glory of Moses' face go away, but the glory of Moses' law is done away also; yea, the law of Moses itself is now abolished; that dispensation was only to continue for a time, and then to vanish away, whereas the Gospel shall remain to the end of the world, and is always fresh and flourishing, and remaineth glorious.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech: 13 And not as Moses, which put a vail over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that which is abolished: 14 But their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the same vail untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which vail is done away in Christ. 15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the vail is upon their heart.

READING THE LAW OF MOSES VEILED.

16 Nevertheless when it shall turn to the Lord, the vail shall be taken away. 17 Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. 18 But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord.

In these verses the apostle draweth two inferences from what he had said about the Old and New Testament.

First. Concerning the duty of the ministers of the Gospel to use great plainness or clearness of speech. They ought not, like Moses, to put a veil upon their faces, or obscure and darken those things they should make plain. The Gospel is a more clear dispensation than the law; the things of God are revealed in the New Testament, not in types and shadows, and ministers are much to blame if they do not set spiritual things, and Gospel truth and grace, in the clearest light that is possible. Though the Israelites could not, yet we may, look stedfastly to the end of what was commanded, but is now abolished. We may see the meaning of those types and shadows by the accomplishment, seeing the veil is done away in Christ, and he is come who was the end of the law for righteousness to all them that believe, and whom Moses and all the prophets pointed to and wrote of.

Secondly. Concerning the privilege and advantage of those who enjoy the Gospel above those who lived under the law; for,

1. Those who lived under the legal dispensation had their "minds blinded," ver. 14, and there was a "veil upon their heart," ver. 15. Thus it was formerly, and so it was especially as to them who remained in Judaism, after the coming of the Messiah and the publication of his Gospel. Nevertheless, the apostle tells us there is a time coming when this "veil also shall be taken away," and "when it" (the body of that people) "shall turn to the Lord," ver. 16. Or, when any particular person is converted to God, then the veil of ignorance is taken away—the blindness of the mind, and hardness of heart, is cured.

[This verse teaches, 1. That the time will come when the Jews shall be converted to Christianity, expressed here by their turning unto the Lord, that is, the Lord Jesus. 2. It seems to be implied that their conversion will be a conversion of the people at large—a conversion that shall be nearly simultaneous, a conversion en masse. Such a conversion we have reason to anticipate of the Jewish nation. 3. The effect of this will be to make them acquainted with the

iii. 10. The glory of the ministration of the Spirit is so surpassing, that "that which has been glorified (the law) has lost its glory in this respect."

iii. 13. "A mistake has been made with regard to the history in Exod. xxiv. 33—35, which has considerably obscured the understanding of this verse. It is commonly assumed that Moses spoke to the Israelites having the veil on his face, and this is implied in our version. But the LXX. and Hebrew give a different account. He true sense of their own Script ~~res~~, and the light and beauty of the sayings of their own prophets. Now they are in deep darkness on the subject; then they will see how entirely they meet and harmonize in the Lord Jesus. 4. The true and only way of having a correct and full meaning of the Bible is by turning unto God. Love to him, and a disposition to do his will, are the best means of interpreting the Bible.—A. B.]

2. The condition of those who enjoy and believe the Gospel is much more happy; for, 1st. They have liberty. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is," and where he worketh, as he doth under the Gospel dispensation, "there is liberty," ver. 17; freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and from the servitude of corruption; liberty of access to God, and freedom of speech in prayer. The heart is set at liberty, and enlarged to run the ways of God's commandments. 2nd. They have light. For with "open face we behold the glory of the Lord," ver. 18. The Israelites saw the glory of God in a cloud, which was dark and dreadful; but Christians see the glory of the Lord as in a glass, more clearly and comfortably. It was the peculiar privilege of Moses for God to converse with him face to face in a friendly manner; but now all true Christians do see him more clearly with open face, he sheweth them his glory. 3rd. This light and liberty is transforming. We "are changed into the same image, from glory to glory," ver. 18, from one degree of glorious grace unto another, till grace here be consummated in glory for ever. How much therefore should Christians prize and improve these privileges! We should not rest contented without an experimental knowledge of the transforming power of the Gospel, by the operation of the Spirit, bringing us into a conformity to the temper and tendency of the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

[1. The best of all evidences of a call to the office of the ministry is the Divine blessing resting on our labours, ver. 1, 2. 2. The office of the ministers of the Gospel is glorious, and most honourable, ver. 7—9. 3. The responsibility and solemnity of the work of the ministry. It was a solemn and responsible work for Moses to give the law amidst the thunders of Sinai to the children of Israel. It is much more solemn to be the medium by which the eternal truths of the Gospel are made known to men. 4. We see the folly of attempting to be justified by the law, ver. 7, 9. It is the ministration of death and of condemnation. It speaks only to condemn. Law knows nothing of pardon. If pardoned, it must be by some other system than by the regular operation of law. So with the sinner against God. If the law is violated, it speaks only to condemn. If he is pardoned, it can be only by the Gospel of Jesus Christ. 5. The danger of grieving the Holy Spirit, ver. 8. The Gospel is the field of the operations of the Holy Spirit in our world. It is the ministration of the Spirit. It is the channel by which his influences descend on man. To reject that Gospel is to reject him, and to cut off the soul from all possibility of being brought under his saving influence and power for ever. He strives with men only in connexion with the Gospel; and all hope, therefore, of being brought under his saving power is in attending to that Gospel, and embracing its provisions. The multitudes, therefore, who are rejecting or neglecting that Gospel, are throwing themselves beyond his saving influences, and placing themselves beyond the possibility of salvation. 6. The Gospel is to spread around the world, and endure to the end of time, ver. 11. It is not like the institutions of Moses, to endure for a limited period and then to be done away. It abides. It is the last dispensation—the permanent economy—that under which the affairs of the world are to be brought to an end. It is, therefore, to be the fixed principle on which all Christians are to act, that the Gospel is to be permanent, and is to spread over all lands, and yet fill all nations with joy. And if so, how fervent and unceasing should be their prayers and efforts to accomplish this great and glorious result! 7. In reading the Old Testament, we see the importance of suffering the reflected light of the New Testament to be thrown upon it, in order correctly to understand it, ver. 13, 14. Thus read, the Old Testament will be to us of inestimable value, ver. 14. It is of value not only as introducing the Gospel; as furnishing the predictions whose fulfilment are full of demonstration of the truth of religion; as containing specimens of the sublimest and purest poetry in the world; but it is of value as embodying, though amidst many types and shadows and much obscurity, all the great doctrines of the true religion. It is no mark of piety or of wisdom to disparage the Jewish Scriptures; but the higher the attainments in Christian feeling the more will the writings of Moses and the prophets be loved.—A. B.]

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter we have an account, 1. Of the constancy of the apostle and his fellow-labourers in their work. Their constancy is declared, ver. 1; their sincerity is vouched, ver. 2; an objection is obviated, ver. 3, 4; and their integrity proved, ver. 5—7. 11. Of their courage and patience under their sufferings; where see what their sufferings were, together with their allays, ver. 8—12; and what it was that kept them from sinking and fainting under them, ver. 13—18.

HEREFORE seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not; 2 But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. 3 But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: 4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them. 5 For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord;

spoke to them without the veil, with his face shining and glorified; when he had done speaking he placed the veil on his face, and that not because they were afraid to look on him, but, as here, 'that they might not look on the end or the fading of that transitory glory.' Thus the declaration of God's will to them was not with 'plainness,' but was interrupted and broken by intervals of concealment."

iii. 15. St. Paul, in speaking of the Israelites who are still under the law, regards the veil as now laid on their hearts.

and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. 6 For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. 7 But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

The apostle had in the foregoing chapter been magnifying his office, upon the consideration of the excellency or glory of that Gospel about which he did officiate; and now in this chapter his design is to vindicate their ministry from the accusation of false teachers, who charged them as deceitful workers, or endeavoured to prejudice the minds of the people against them on account of their sufferings. He tells them therefore how they did believe, and how they shewed their value for their office as ministers of the Gospel. They were not puffed up with pride, but spurred on to great diligence. Seeing we have this ministry, are so much distinguished and dignified, we do not take state upon ourselves, nor indulge in idleness, but are excited to the better performance of our duty. Two things in general we have an account of, namely,

I. Their constancy and sincerity in their work and labour. Concerning which, observe,

First, Their constancy and perseverance in their work is declared. "We faint not," ver. 1, under the difficulty of our work, nor do we desist from our labour. And this their steadfastness was owing to the mercy of God. From the same mercy and grace that they received the apostleship, Rom. i. 5, they received strength to persevere in the work of that office. Note, That as it is great mercy and grace to be called to be saints, and especially to be counted faithful, and be put into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 12, so it is owing to the mercy and grace of God if we continue faithful, and persevere in our work with diligence. The best men in the world would faint in their work, and under their burthens, if they did not receive mercy from God. "By the grace of God I am what I am," said this great apostle in his former epistle to these Corinthians, ch. xv. 10. And that mercy which hath helped us out, and helped us on hitherto, we may rely upon to help us even to the end.

Secondly, Their sincerity in their work is avouched, ver. 2, in several expressions. "We have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty." The things of dishonesty are hidden things, that will not bear the light; and those that practise them are, or should be, ashamed of them, especially when they are known. Such things the apostle did not allow of, but did renounce and avoid with indignation. "Not walking in craftiness," or in disguise, acting with art and cunning, but in great simplicity and with open freedom. They had no base and wicked designs covered with fair and specious pretences of something that was good. Nor did they in their preaching handle "the word of God deceitfully." But, as he said before, they used great plainness of speech, and did not make their ministry to serve a turn, or to truckle to base designs. They had not cheated the people with falsehood instead of truth. Some think the apostle alludeth to the deceit which treacherous gamblers use, or that of hucksters in the market, that mix bad wares with good. The apostles acted not like such persons, but they "manifested the truth to every man's conscience," declaring nothing but what, in their own conscience, they believed to be true, and might serve for the conviction of their consciences who heard them, who were to judge for themselves, and to give an account for themselves. And all this they did as in the sight of God, desiring thus to commend themselves unto God, and to the consciences of men, by their undisguised sincerity. Note, That a steadfast adherence to the truths of the Gospel will commend ministers and people; and sincerity or uprightness will preserve a man's reputation, and the good opinion of wise and good men concerning him.

Thirdly, An objection is obviated, which might be thus formed: If it be thus, how then doth it come to pass that the Gospel is hid, and proveth ineffectual as to some that hear it? To which the apostle answereth by shewing this was not the fault of the Gospel, nor of the preachers thereof. But the true reasons of this were, 1. They are lost souls, to whom the Gospel is hid, or is ineffectual, ver. 3. Christ came to "save that which was lost," Mat. xviii. 11, and the Gospel of Christ is sent to save such, and if that do not find and save them they are lost for ever; they must never expect any thing else to save them, for there is no other method or means of salvation. The hiding of the Gospel therefore from souls is both an evidence and cause of their ruin. 2. "The god of this world hath blinded their minds," ver. 4. They are under the influence and power of the devil, who is here called the god of this world, and elsewhere the prince of this world, because of the great interest he hath in this world, and the homage that is paid to him by multitudes in this world, and the great sway that by Divine permission he beareth in the world, and in the hearts of his subjects, or rather slaves. And as he is the prince of darkness, and ruler of the darkness of this world, so he darkeneth the understandings of men, and increaseth their prejudices, and supporteth his interest by keeping them in the dark, blinding their minds with ignorance, and error, and prejudices, that they should not "behold the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ." [Greek, 'the Gospel of the glory of Christ,'—a Hebraism for the glorious Gospel. Mr. Locke renders it, 'the glorious brightness of the light of the Gospel of Christ,' and supposes it means the brightness, or clearness, of the doctrine wherein Christ is manifested in the Gospel. It is all light, and splendour, and beauty, compared with the dark systems of philosophy and heathenism. It is glorious, for it is full of splendour, makes known the glorious God, discloses a glorious plan of salvation, and conducts ignorant, weak, and degraded man to a world of light. No two words in our language are so full of rich and precious meaning as the phrase, "glorious Gospel."—A. B.] "Who is the image of God," [Christ is called the image of God, 1. In respect to his Divine nature, his exact resemblance to God in his Divine attributes and perfections, (see Col. i. 15, and Heb. i. 3); and, 2. In his moral attributes as Mediator, as shewing forth the glory of the Father to men. He resembles God, and in him we see the Divine glory and perfections embodied, and shine forth.—A. B.] Observe, 1. Christ's design by his Gospel is to make a glorious discovery of God to the minds of men. Thus, as the image of God, he demonstrateth the power and wisdom of God, and the grace and mercy of God for their salvation. But, 2. The design of the devil is to keep men in ignorance; and, when he could not keep the light of the Gospel out of the world, he maketh it his great business to keep it out of the hearts of men.

[Satan will practise every device and art possible to prevent the Gospel from shining upon the hearts of men. That light is painful and hateful to his eyes, and he will do all that can be done to prevent its being diffused. Every art which long-tried ingenuity and skill can devise will be resorted to, every power which he can put forth will be exerted. If he can blind the minds of men he will do it. If men can be hoodwinked, and ruled, it will be done.

If error can be made to spread, and be embraced—error smooth, plausible, cunning—it will be diffused. Ministers will be raised up to preach it, and the press will be employed to accomplish it. If sinners can be deceived, and made to remain at ease in their sins, by novels and seductive poetry—by books false in sentiments and perverse in morals—the press will be made to groan under works of fiction. If theatres are necessary to cheat and beguile men, they will be reared; and the song and the dance, the ball and the splendid party, will alike contribute to divert the attention from the cross of Christ, the worth of the soul, and the importance of a preparation to die. No art has been spared, or will be spared, to deceive men, and the world is full of the devices of Satan to hoodwink and blind the perishing, and lead them down to hell. Yet Satan is not alone to blame for this. He does all he can, and he has consummate skill and art. Yet let not the deluded sinner take comfort to himself because Satan is the tempter, and because he is deluded. The sinner is, after all, voluntary in his delusions. He does, or he might, know the truth. Who is to blame if he is lost? Who but himself?—A. B.]

Fourthly, A proof of their integrity is given, ver. 5. They made it their business to preach Christ and not themselves. "We preach not ourselves." Self was not the matter nor the end of the apostles' preaching. They did not give out their own notions and private opinions, nor their passions and prejudices, for the word and will of God; nor did they seek themselves to advance their own secular interest or glory; but they preached "Christ Jesus the Lord," and thus it did become them and behoove them to do, as being Christ's servants. Their business was to make their Master known to the world as the Messiah, or the Christ of God, and as Jesus, the only Saviour of men, and as the rightful Lord, and to advance his honour and glory. Note, All the lines of Christian doctrine centre in Christ, and in preaching Christ we preach all we should preach. As to ourselves, saith the apostle, We preach, or declare, that we are your servants for Jesus' sake. This was no compliment, but a real profession of a readiness to do good to their souls, and to promote their spiritual and eternal interests, and that for Jesus' sake, not for their own sake, or their own advantage, but for Christ's sake, that they might imitate his great example, and advance his glory. Note, Ministers should not be of proud spirits, lording it over God's heritage, who are servants to the souls of men.

[This implies the following things: 1. That the time of ministers belongs to the church, and should be employed in its welfare. 2. Their talents belong to the church. 3. Their best efforts and plans, the avails of their best thoughts and purposes, belong to the church, and should be honestly devoted to it. Their strength, and vigour, and influence should be devoted to it, as the vigour, and strength, and talent, and skill of a servant belong to his master: see Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6. The language of the ministry, as of every Christian, should be—

I love thy church, O God,
Her walls before thee stand,
Dear as the apple of thine eye,
And graven on thy hand.
If e'er to bless thy sons
My voice or hands deny,
These hands let useful folk forsake,
This voice in silence die.
If e'er my heart forget
Her welfare or her woe, Let every joy this heart forsake,
And every grief o'erflow.
For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend,
To her my cares and toils be given,
Till toils and cares shall end.—A. B.]

Yet, at the same time, they must avoid the meanness of spirit to become the servants of the humours or the lusts of men; if they should thus "seek to please men," they would not be the servants of Christ, Gal. i. 10. And there was good reason,

1. Why they should preach Christ. For by gospel light we have the "knowledge of the glory of God," which shineth in the "face of Jesus Christ," ver. 6; and the light of this Sun of righteousness is more glorious than that light which God commanded to shine out of darkness. It is a pleasant thing for the eye to behold the sun in the firmament, but it is more pleasant and profitable when the Gospel shineth in the heart. Note, As light was the first-born of the first creation, so it is in the new creation. The illumination of the Spirit is his first work upon the soul. The grace of God createth such a light in the soul that those who "were sometimes darkness are made light in the Lord," Eph. v. 8.

2. Why they should not preach themselves. Because they were but earthen vessels, things of little or no worth or value. Here seemeth to be an allusion to the lamps which Gideon's soldiers carried in earthen pitchers, Jud. vii. 16. The treasure of Gospel light and grace is put into earthen vessels; that is, the ministers of the Gospel are weak and frail creatures, and subject to like passions and infirmities as other men; they are mortal, and soon broken in pieces. And God hath so ordered it, that the weaker the vessels are the stronger his power may appear to be, that the treasure itself should be valued the more. Note, There is an excellency of power in the Gospel of Christ to enlighten the mind, to convince the conscience, to convert the soul, and to rejoice the heart; but, as all this power is from God the Author, and not from men, who are but instruments, so that God in all things must be glorified.

8 We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; 9 Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; 10 Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. 11 For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh. 12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you. 13 We having the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also

iv. 1. Paul "now resumes the thread of the general argument, which he had twice taken up (chap. iii. 4, 12), but with the difference that from the confidence which he possesses in the greatness of his task, he now draws a new conclusion; not 'we use great plainness of speech,' as in chap. iii. 12, but 'we faint not'—a conclusion which, as it is more directly an answer to the question, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' in chap. ii. 16, so is it the basis of the ensuing chapters, iv. 7—v. 10. But with one of the inversions peculiar to this epistle, he has hardly entered on this new topic before he drops it again. The charge of insincerity which had occasioned the digression in chap. iii. still lingers in his recollection, and accordingly he turns round upon it as if to give it one parting blow before he finally dismisses it from his mind. Hence chap. iv. 2—6 are still closely connected with chap. iii., while the new subject begun in verse 1 is not resumed till verse 7, where it is expanded in all its parts, so that the true close of the sentence commenced here does not occur till verse 16, believe, and therefore speak; 14 Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. 15 For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God. 16 For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. 17 For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; 18 While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.

II. In these verses the apostle giveth an account of their courage and patience under all their sufferings. Whence observe, 1st. How their sufferings and patience under them is declared, ver. 8—12. The apostles were great sufferers; therein they followed their Master. Christ had told them "that in the world they should have tribulation," and so they had; yet they met with wonderful support, great relief, and many allays of their sorrows. "We are," saith the apostle, "troubled on every side," afflicted many ways, and meet with almost all sorts of troubles, "yet not distressed," ver. 8. We are not hedged in, or cooped up, because we can see help in God, and help from God, and have liberty of access to God. Again, we are perplexed, oftentimes uncertain, and in doubt what will become of us, and not always without anxiety in our mind on this account, yet "not in despair," ver. 8, even in our greatest perplexities, knowing that God is able to support us, and to deliver us, and in him we always place our trust and hope. Again, we are persecuted by men, pursued with hatred and violence from place to place, as men not worthy to live, yet "not forsaken" of God, ver. 9. Good men may be sometimes forsaken of their friends, as well as persecuted by their enemies; but God will never leave them nor forsake them. Again, we are sometimes dejected, or cast down; the enemy may in great measure prevail, and our spirits begin to fail us; there may be fears within as well as fightings without, yet we are not destroyed, ver. 8. Still they were preserved, and kept their heads above water. Note, Whatever condition the children of God may be in, in this world, they have a "but not" to comfort themselves with; their case sometimes is bad, yea very bad, but not so bad as it might be. The apostle speaketh of their sufferings as constant, and as a counterpart of the sufferings of Christ, ver. 10. The sufferings of Christ were after a sort reacted in the sufferings of Christians; thus did they "bear about the dying of the Lord Jesus" in their body, setting before the world the great example of a suffering Christ, "that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest;" that is, that people might see the power of Christ's resurrection, and efficacy of grace in and from the living Jesus, manifested in and towards them, who did yet live, though they were always delivered to death, ver. 11, and though death worked in them, ver. 12, they being exposed to death, and ready to be swallowed up by death continually. Thus great were the sufferings of the apostles, that in comparison with them other Christians were even at that time in prosperous circumstances. "Death worketh in us, but life in you," ver. 12.

Secondly. What it was that kept them from sinking and fainting under their sufferings, ver. 13—18. Whatever the burthens and troubles of good men may be, they have cause enough not to faint.

1. Faith kept them from fainting. "We have the same spirit of faith," ver. 13. That faith which is of the operation of the Spirit, the same faith by which the saints of old did and suffered such great things. Note, The grace of faith is a sovereign cordial and effectual antidote against fainting fits in troublous times. The spirit of faith will go far to bear up the spirit of a man under his infirmities; and as the apostle had David's example to imitate, who said, Ps. cxvi. 10, "I have believed, and therefore have I spoken," so he leaveth us his example to imitate; "We also believe," saith he, "and therefore speak." Note, As we receive help and encouragement from the good words and examples of others, so we should be careful to give a good example to others.

[No man should attempt to preach the Gospel who has not a firm belief of its truths, and he who does believe its truths will be prompted to make them known to his fellow-men. All successful preaching is the result of a firm and settled conviction of the truth of the Gospel, and when such a conviction exists it is natural to give utterance to the belief, and such an expression will be attended with happy influences on the minds of other men.—A. B.]

2. Hope of the resurrection kept them from sinking, ver. 14. They knew that Christ was raised, and that his resurrection was an earnest and assurance of theirs. This he had treated of largely in his former epistle to these Corinthians, ch. xv.; and therefore their hope was firm, being well-grounded, that he which raised up Christ the Head will raise up all his members. Note, The hope of the resurrection will encourage us in a suffering day, and set us above the fear of death; for what reason hath a good Christian to fear death, that dieth in hope of a joyful resurrection?

3. The consideration of the glory of God, and the benefit of the church, by means of their sufferings, kept them from fainting, ver. 15. Their sufferings were for the church's advantage: see ch. i. 6; and this did redound to God's glory; for when the church is edified then God is glorified, and we may well afford to bear sufferings patiently and cheerfully when we see others are the better for them,—if they are instructed and edified, if they are confirmed and comforted. Note, The sufferings of Christ's ministers, as well as their preaching and conversation, are intended for the good of the church and the glory of God.

4. The thoughts of the advantage their own souls would reap by the sufferings of their bodies kept them from fainting; "Though our outward man perish, our inward man is renewed day by day," ver. 16. Where note, 1st. We have every one of us an outward and an inward man, that is, a body and a soul. 2nd. If the outward man perish there is no remedy—it must and will be so, it was made to perish. 3rd. It is our happiness if the decays of the outward man do contribute to the renewing of the inward man, if afflictions outwardly are gain to us inwardly, if when the body is sick, and weak, and perishing, the soul is vigorous and prosperous. 4th. The best of men have need of farther renewing of the inward man, even day by day. Where the good work is begun, there is more work to be done for the carrying it forward; and as in wicked men things grow every day worse and worse, so in godly men they grow better and better.

5. The prospect of eternal life and happiness kept them from fainting, and was a mighty support and comfort; as to which observe, 1st. The apostle and his fellow-sufferers saw these afflictions working towards heaven, and that there they would end at last, ver. 17; whereupon they weighed things aright in the balance of the sanctuary; they did, as it were, put the heavenly glory in one scale and their earthly sufferings in the other, and, pondering things in their thought, they found afflictions to be light, and the glory of heaven to be "a far more exceeding weight." That which sense was ready to pronounce heavy and long, grievous and tedious, faith perceived to be light, and short,—but for a moment. On the other hand the worth and weight of the crown of glory, as it is exceeding great in itself, so it is esteemed to be by the believing soul, it far exceeds all his expressions and thought; and it will be a special support in our sufferings when we can perceive them appointed as the way, and preparing us for the enjoyment of the future glory.

[In this exceedingly interesting passage, which is worthy of the deepest study of Christians, Paul has set in most beautiful and emphatic contrast the trials of this life and the glories of heaven. It may be profitable to contemplate at a single glance the view which he had of them, that they may be brought distinctly before the mind.

THE ONE IS.

1. Affliction, θλιψις.
2. Light, ελαφύς.

3. For a moment, παρῑτῑκα.

THE OTHER IS, (BY CONTRAST.)

1. Glory, δόξα.
2. Weight, βάρος.
3. Eternal, αἰώνιον.

4. Eminent, or excellent, καθ' ὑπερβολήν.
5. Infinitely excellent, eminent in the highest degree, εἰς ὑπερβολήν.

So the account stands in the view of Paul; and, with this balance in favour of the eternal glory, he regarded afflictions as mere trifles, and made it the favour purpose of his life to gain the glory of the heavens. What wise man, looking at the account, would not do likewise? A. B.]

2nd. Their faith enabled them to make this right judgment of things; "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen," ver. 18. It is by faith we see God, who is invisible, Heb. xi. 27, and by that we look to an unseen heaven and hell, and faith is the evidence of things not seen. Note, 1st. There are unseen things as well as things that are seen. 2nd. There is this vast difference between them—unseen things are eternal, seen things but temporal, or temporary only. 3rd. It is by faith that we not only discern these things, and the great difference between them, but by that also we take our aim at unseen things, and chiefly regard them, and make it our end and scope not to escape present evils and obtain present good, both of which are temporal and transitory, but to escape future evil and obtain future good things, which, though unseen, are real, and certain, and eternal; and faith is "the substance of things hoped for," as well as the evidence of things not seen, Heb. xi. 1.

[It becomes us, then, as rational creatures, to look to that world, to act with reference to it, to feel and act as if we felt that all our interests were there. Were this life all, every thing in relation to us would be trifling. But when we remember that there is an eternity, that we are near it, and that our conduct here is to determine our character and destiny there, life becomes invested with infinite importance. Who can estimate the magnitude of the interests at stake? Who can appreciate aright the importance of every step we take, and every plan we form?—A. B.]

CHAPTER V.

The apostle proceedeth in shewing the reasons why they did not faint under their afflictions; viz. their expectation, desire, and assurance of happiness after death, ver. 1—5; and maketh an inference for the comfort of believers in their present state, ver. 6—8; and another to quicken them in their duty, ver. 9—11. Then he maketh an apology for seeming to commend himself, and giveth a good reason for his zeal and diligence, ver. 12—15; and mentions two things that are necessary, in order to our living to Christ, viz., regeneration and reconciliation, ver. 16—21.

OR we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. 2 For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: 3 If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked. 4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. 5 Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. 6 Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: 7 (For we walk by faith, not by sight:) 8 We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, was the tabernacle or tent. The word here employed was frequently used by the Greeks for the earthly habitation or covering of the soul, and always with a temporary notion. "Of God:" rather, "from God." St. Paul does not mean to assert that the earthly body was not also from God, but that the resurrection body is "in an especial manner prepared by God." "Not made with hands:" the figure of a house is still in the apostle's mind, hence this mode of expression, by which he means the lower human origin of the earthly body.

where the same words are repeated—"for which cause we faint not" (Stanley.)

iv. 10. From his fellowship with Jesus, St. Paul regards his exposure to death in his cause as an exemplification of and sharing in the dying of Jesus.

iv. 12. We share specially in the trials and exposure to death, while you are full sharers in the life.

v. 1. "Tabernacle:" genitive of apposition to house; the house and to be present with the Lord. 9 Wherefore we labour, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him. 10 For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. 11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

The apostle, in these verses, pursueth the argument of the former chapter, concerning the grounds of their courage and patience under afflictions; and,

First. He mentioneth their expectation, and desire, and assurance of eternal happiness after death, ver. 1—5. Observe particularly,

1. The believer's expectation of eternal happiness after death, ver. 1. He doth not only know, or is well assured by faith of the truth and reality of the thing itself, that there is another and a happy life after this present life is ended, but he hath good hope, through grace, of his interest in that everlasting blessedness of the unseen world—we know we have a building of God, we have a firm and well-grounded expectation of the future felicity. Let us take notice, 1st. What heaven is in the eye and hope of a believer. He looketh upon it as "an house," or habitation, a dwelling-place, a resting-place, a hiding-place, our Father's house where there are many mansions, and our everlasting home. It is a house in the heavens, in that high and holy place, which doth as far excel all the palaces of this earth as the heavens are high above the earth. It is a building of God, whose Builder and Maker is God, and therefore is worthy of its Author; the happiness of the future state is what God hath prepared for them that love him. It is "eternal in the heavens," everlasting habitations, not like the earthly tabernacles, the poor cottages of clay, in which our souls now dwell, that are mouldering and decaying, whose foundations are in the dust. 2nd. When it is expected this happiness shall be enjoyed; namely, immediately after death, as soon as "our earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved." Note, First. That the body, this earthly house, is but a tabernacle, that must be dissolved shortly; the nails or pins will be drawn, and the cords be loosed, and then the body return to dust as it was. Secondly. When this comes to pass then cometh the "house not made with hands." The spirit returneth to God who gave it, and such as have walked with God here shall dwell with God for ever.

2. The believer's earnest desires after this future blessedness, which is expressed by this word, στενάζουεν,—"we groan;" which denoteth, 1st. A groaning of sorrow under a heavy load. So do believers groan under the burden of life; "In this we groan earnestly," ver. 2, that is, we that are in this tabernacle do groan, "being burdened," ver. 4. The body of flesh is a heavy burthen, the calamities of life are a heavy load. But believers do groan because burdened with a body of sin, and the many corruptions that are still remaining and raging in them. This maketh them complain, "O wretched man that I am!" Rom. vii. 24. 2nd. There is a groaning of desire after the happiness of another life, and thus believers do groan, earnestly desiring "to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven," ver. 2; to obtain a blessed immortality, "that mortality might be swallowed up of life," ver. 4; "That being clothed we shall not be found naked," ver. 3; that if it were the will of God we might not sleep, but be changed, for it is not desirable in itself to be unclothed. Death, considered merely as a separation of soul and body, is not to be desired, but dreaded rather; but, considered as a passage to glory, the believer is willing rather to die than live, "to be absent from the body, that he may be present with the Lord," ver. 8; to leave this body that he may go to Christ, and to put off these rags of mortality that he may put on the robes of glory. Note, First. Death will strip us of the clothing of flesh and all the comforts of life, as well as put an end to all our troubles here below; naked we came into this world, and naked shall we go out of it. But, Secondly. Gracious souls are not found naked in the other world; no, they are clothed with garments of praise, with robes of righteousness and glory. They shall be delivered out of all their troubles, and shall have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, Rev. vii. 14.

3. The believers' assurance of their interest in this future blessedness, on a double account: 1st. From the experience of the grace of God in preparing and making them meet for this blessedness. He that hath "wrought us for the selfsame thing is God," ver. 5. Note, All that are designed for heaven hereafter are wrought or prepared for heaven while they are here; the stones of that spiritual building and temple above are squared and fashioned here below; and he that hath wrought us for this "is God," because nothing less than a Divine power can make a soul partaker of a Divine nature, no hand less than the hand of God can work us for this thing. A great deal is to be done to prepare our souls for heaven, and that preparation of the heart is from the Lord. 2nd. The "earnest of the Spirit" gave them this assurance, for an earnest is part of payment, and secureth the full payment. The present graces and comforts of the Spirit are earnest of everlasting grace and comfort.

Secondly. The apostle maketh an inference for the comfort of believers in their present state and condition in this world, ver. 6—8; whence observe,

1. What their present state and condition is; they "are absent from the Lord," ver. 6. They are pilgrims and strangers in this world, they do but sojourn here in their earthly home or in this tabernacle; and though God is with us here, by his Spirit and in his ordinances, yet we are not with him as we hope to be; we cannot see his face whilst we live, "for we walk by faith, not by sight," ver. 7; that is, we have not that vision and fruition of God, as of an object that is present with us, and as we hope for hereafter, when we shall see as we are seen. Note, Faith is for this world, and sight is reserved for the other world; and it is our duty, and will be our interest, to walk by faith till we come to live by sight.

2. How comfortable and courageous we ought to be in all the troubles of life and in the hour of death; "Therefore we are," or ought to be, "always confident," ver. 6. And again, ver. 8, "We are confident and willing," rather to be absent from the body. True Christians, if they duly consider the prospect faith giveth them of another world, and the good reasons of their hope of blessedness after death, should be comforted under the troubles of life, and supported in the hour of death. They should take courage when they are encountering the last enemy, and be willing rather to die than live, when it is the will of God they should put off this tabernacle. Note, As those who are in from above do long to be there, so it is but being absent from the body, and we shall very soon be present with the Lord—but to die and be with Christ—but to close our eyes to all things in this world, and we shall open them in a world of glory: faith will be turned into sight.

[Why should I shrink at pain or woe,
Or feel at death dismay?
I've Canaan's goodly land in view,
And realms of endless day.
Apostles, martyrs, prophets there,
Around my Saviour stand;
And soon my friends in Christ below
Will join the glorious band.
Jerusalem, my happy home,
My soul still pants for thee!
When shall my labours have an end
In joy, and peace, and thee!—C. Wesley.]

Thirdly. He proceedeth to make an inference to excite and quicken himself and others to duty, ver. 9—11. And so it is that well-grounded hopes of heaven will be far from giving the least encouragement to sloth and sinful security; but, on the contrary, they should stir us up to use the greatest care and diligence in religion. "Wherefore," or because we hope to be present with the Lord, "we labour," and take pains, ver. 9. Φιλοτιμούμεθα, 'we are ambitious,' and labour as industriously as the most ambitious men do to obtain what they aim at. Here observe,

1. What it was the apostle was thus ambitious of, and that was, acceptance with God. We labour that living and dying, "whether present" in the body "or absent" from the body, "we may be accepted of him," that is, the Lord, ver. 9; that we may please him who hath chosen us—that our great Lord may say to us, Well done. This they coveted as the greatest favour and the highest honour; it was the top of their ambition.

2. What farther quickening motives they had to excite their diligence, from the consideration of the judgment to come, ver. 10, 11. And there are many things relating to this great matter that should awe the best of men into the utmost care and diligence in religion; for example, the certainty of this judgment, for we must appear; the universality of it, for we must all appear; the great Judge, before whose judgment-seat we must appear, namely, the Lord Jesus Christ, who himself will appear in flaming fire; the recompense to be then received for things done in the body, which will be very particular unto every one, and very just, according to what we have done, whether good or bad. The apostle calls this awful judgment "the terror of the Lord," ver. 11; and by the consideration thereof was excited to persuade men to repent and live a holy life, that, when Christ shall appear terribly, they may appear before him comfortably. And concerning his fidelity and diligence he comfortably appealeth unto God and the consciences of them he wrote unto; "We are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences."

[If we have ourselves any just views of the awful terrors of the day of judgment, and if we have any just views of the wrath of God, we should endeavour "to persuade" others to flee from the wrath to come. We should plead with them; we should entreat them; we should weep over them; we should pray for them, that they may be saved from going up to meet the awful wrath of God.—A. B.]

12 For we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart. 13 For whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause. 14 For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: 15 And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

Here observe, First. The apostle maketh an apology for seeming to commend himself, ver. 12, and tells them, 1. It was not to commend themselves, or for their own sakes, that he had spoken of their fidelity and diligence in the former verses; nor was he willing to suspect their good opinion of him. But, 2. The true reason was this, to put an argument into their mouths wherewith to answer his accusers, who made vain boastings, and gloried in appearances only; that he might give them an "occasion to glory on their behalf," or to defend them against the reproaches of their adversaries. And if the people can say the word hath been manifested to their consciences, and been effectual to their conversion and edification, this is the best defence they can make for the ministry of the word when they are vilified and reproached.

Secondly. He giveth good reasons for their zeal and diligence. Some of Paul's adversaries had, it is likely, reproached him for his zeal and fervour, as if he had been a madman, or, in the language of our days, a fanatic; they imputed all to enthusiasm, as the Roman governor told him, "Much learning had made him mad," Acts xxvi. 24. But the apostle tells them,

1. It was for the glory of God and the good of the church he was thus zealous and industrious. "Whether we be beside ourselves, or whether we be sober," that is, whether you or others do think the one or the other, it is to God and for his glory; and it is for your cause, or to promote your good, ver. 13. If they manifested the greatest ardour and vehemency at some times, and used the greatest calmness in strong reasonings at other times, it was for the best ends, and in both methods they had good reason for what they did; for,

2. The love of Christ constrained them, ver. 14. They were under the sweetest and strongest constraints to do what they did. Love hath a constraining virtue to excite ministers and private Christians in their duty. Our love to Christ will have this virtue, and Christ's love to us, which was manifested in this great instance of his dying for us, will have this effect upon us if it be duly considered and rightly judged of; for observe how the apostle argued for the reasonableness of love's constraints, and declareth, 1st. What we were before, and must have continued to be, had not Christ died for us. We were dead; ver. 14, "If one died for all, then were all dead," dead in law, under sentence of death, and in sins and trespasses, spiritually dead. Note, This was the deplorable condition of all those that Christ died for; they were lost and undone, dead and ruined, and must have remained thus miserable for ever if Christ had not died for them. 2nd. What such should do for whom Christ died, namely, that they should live to him. This is what Christ

v. 4. "Not for that," &c.: rather, "because we are not willing to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon." The feeling expressed in these verses was one most natural to those who, as the apostles, regarded the coming of the Lord as near, and conceived the possibility of their living to behold it. It was "no terror of death as to its consequence, but a natural reluctance to undergo the mere act of death as such, when it was within possibility that this mortal might be superseded by the immortal, without it" (Alford).

vi. 1. St. Paul is describing generally his ministry as one of exhortation, and after a parenthesis resumes the description in verse 3, pointing out (verses 3—10) various characteristics of life and conversation which accompanied his exhortation.

vi. 3. Resumed from verse 1; showing (verses 3—10) "the pains and caution used by him to enforce this exhortation by his example as well as his precept."

vi. 11—13. "I use openness and freedom of speech to you, I pour designed, that they which live, which are made alive unto God by means of his death, should live to "him that died for them, and rose again" for their sakes also, that they should not live to themselves, ver. 15. Note, We should not make ourselves, but Christ, the end of our livings and actings; and it was one end of Christ's death to cure us of this self-love, and to excite us always to act under the commanding influence of his love. A Christian's life should be consecrated to Christ, and then do we live as we ought to live when we live to Christ, who died for us.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more. 17 Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. 18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; 19 To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. 20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. 21 For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

In these verses the apostle mentioneth two things that are necessary in order to our living to Christ, both of which are the consequences of Christ's dying for us, namely, regeneration and reconciliation.

First, Regeneration, which consisteth in two things, namely, 1. Weanedness from the world. "Henceforth know we no man after the flesh," ver. 16; that is, We do not own or affect any person or thing in this world for carnal ends and outward advantage; we are enabled, by Divine grace, not to mind or regard this world, or the things of the world, but to live above it; the love of Christ is in our hearts, and the world is under our feet. Note, Good Christians must enjoy the comforts of this life and their relations in this world with a holy indifference; "Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet" (saith the apostle,) "we know him no more." It is questioned whether Paul had seen Christ in the flesh; however, the rest of the apostles had, and so might some amongst those he wrote unto. However, he would not have them value themselves upon that account, for even the bodily presence of Christ is not to be desired or doated upon by his disciples: we must live upon his spiritual presence, and the comfort of that. Note, Those who make images of Christ, and use them in their worship, do not take the way that God hath appointed for the strengthening their faith and quickening their affections; for it is the will of God we should not know Christ any more after the flesh.

[It does not mean that he had seen him in the flesh, but that he had formed, so to speak, carnal views of him, and such as men of this world regard as grand and magnificent in a monarch and conqueror. He had had no correct views of his spiritual character, and of the pure and holy purposes for which he would come into the world. "Yet now henceforth know we him no more." We know him no more in this manner. Our conceptions and views of him are changed. We no more regard him according to the flesh, we no longer esteem the Messiah who was to come as a temporal prince and warrior; but we look on him as a spiritual Saviour, a Redeemer from sin. The idea is, that his views of him had been entirely changed.—A. B.]

2. A thorough change of the heart. For "if any man be in Christ," that is, if any man be a Christian indeed, and will approve himself such, he is, or he must be, "a new creature," ver. 17. Some read it, Let him be a new creature. This ought to be the care of all who profess the Christian faith, that they be new creatures; not only that they have a new name, and wear a new livery, but that they have a new heart, and new nature. And so great is the change the grace of God makes in the soul, that, as it followeth, old things are passed away—old thoughts, old principles, and old practices are passed away, and all these things must become new. Note, Regenerating grace creates a new world in the soul—all things are new. The renewed man acteth from new principles, by new rules, with new ends, and in new company.

1. As an unquestionable privilege, ver. 15, 19. Reconciliation supposeth a quarrel or breach of friendship; and sin hath made a breach, it hath broken the friendship between God and man. The heart of the sinner is filled with enmity against God, and God is justly offended with the sinner. Yet, behold, there may be a reconciliation; the offended majesty of heaven is willing to be reconciled. And observe, 1st. He hath appointed the Mediator of reconciliation, Jesus Christ. He hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, ver. 18. God is to be owned from first to last in the undertaking and performance of the Mediator. All things relating to our reconciliation by Jesus Christ are of God, who, by the mediation of Jesus Christ, hath reconciled the world to himself, and out himself into a capacity of being actually reconciled to offenders, without any wrong or injury to his justice or holiness; and doth not impute to men their trespasses, but recedeth from the rigour of the first covenant which was broken, and doth not insist upon the advantage he might justly take against us for the breach of that covenant, but is willing to enter upon a new treaty, and into a new covenant of grace, and, according to the tenor thereof, freely to forgive us all our sins, and justify freely by his grace all those who do believe. 2nd. He hath appointed the "ministry of reconciliation," ver. 18. By the inspiration of God the Scriptures were written, which contain the word of reconciliation, shewing us that peace was made by the blood of the cross, that reconciliation is wrought, and directing us how we may be interested therein. And he hath appointed the office of the ministry, which is a ministry of reconciliation; that is, ministers are to open and proclaim to sinners the terms of mercy and reconciliation, and persuade them to comply therewith. For, out my heart to you:" perhaps better, "my heart is wide enough to take you all in." And so he adds that any constraint or narrowness of heart they may feel towards him is not from any want of largeness of heart on his part, but on theirs, and so exhorts them (verse 13), as a return for his largeness of heart, to show like affection towards him.

vi. 14. "The following exhortations are general, and regard all possible connection and participation—all leanings towards a return

2. Reconciliation is here spoken of as our indispensable duty, ver. 20. As God is willing to be reconciled to us, we ought to be reconciled to God. And it is the great end and design of the Gospel, that word of reconciliation, to prevail upon sinners to lay aside their enmity against God; and faithful ministers are Christ's ambassadors sent to treat with sinners on peace and reconciliation. They come in God's name with his entreaties, and act in Christ's stead, doing the very thing he did when he was upon this earth, and what it is his will to be done now that he is in heaven. Wonderful condescension! Though God can be no loser by the quarrel, nor gainer by the peace, yet by his ministers he doth beseech sinners to lay aside their enmity, and accept of the terms he offereth, that they would be reconciled to him, to all his attributes, to all his laws, and to all his providences, to believe in the Mediator, to accept the atonement, and comply with his Gospel in all the parts of it, and in the whole design of it. And, for our encouragement so to do, the apostle subjoineth what should be well known and duly considered by us, ver. 20, namely, 1st. The purity of the Mediator, that he knew no sin. 2nd. The sacrifice he offered. He was made sin—not a sinner, but sin; that is, a sin-offering, a sacrifice for sin. 3rd. The end and design of all this. "That we might be made the righteousness of God in him;" that is, might be justified freely by the grace of God through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. Note, First, As Christ that knew no sin of his own was made sin for us, so we that have no righteousness of our own are made the righteousness of God in him. Secondly, Our reconciliation to God is only through Jesus Christ, and for the sake of his merit; on him, therefore, we must rely, and make mention of his righteousness, and his only.

[Let us then, in view of this whole chapter, seek to be reconciled to God. Let us lay aside all our opposition to him. Let us embrace his plans. Let us be willing to submit to him, and to become his eternal friends. Let us seek that heaven to which he would raise us; and, though our earthly house of this tabernacle must be dissolved, let us be prepared, as we may be, for that eternal habitation which he has fitted up for all who love him in the heavens.—A. B.]

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter the apostle giveth an account of his general errand to all that he preached unto; with the several arguments and methods he used, ver. 1–10. Then he doth address himself particularly to the Corinthians, giving them good cautions with great affection and strong arguments, ver. 11–18.

E then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain. 2 (For he saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed: 4 But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, 5 In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings; 6 By pureness, by knowledge by, long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, 7 By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the to heathenism which might be bred by too great familiarity with heathens" (Alford).

vii. 1. To be connected with the previous chapter.

vii. 2. "Receive us:" the original word signifies "give us room in your hearts;" and the words are probably a resumption of the idea contained in the "be ye also enlarged" of chap. vi. 13. "Have wronged," &c.: omit "have" in the three places where it occurs in this verse. St. Paul is speaking generally of his residence right hand and on the left, 8 By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true; 9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; 10 As sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.

In these verses we have an account of the apostle's general errand and exhortation to all that he preached to in every place where he came, with the several arguments and methods he used. Observe,

First. The errand or exhortation itself, namely, to comply with the Gospel offers of reconciliation—that, being favoured with the Gospel, they would not receive this “grace of God in vain,” ver. 1. The Gospel is a word of grace sounding in our ears, but it will be in vain for us to hear it unless we believe it, and comply with the end and design of it; and, as it is the duty of the ministers of the Gospel to exhort and persuade their hearers to accept of grace and mercy that is offered to them, so they are honoured with this high title of co-workers with God. Note, 1. They must work, and must work for God and his glory, for souls, and their good; and they are workers with God, yet under him, as instruments only: however, if they are faithful, they may hope to find God working with them, and their labour will be effectual. 2. Observe the language and way of the spirit of the Gospel. It is not with roughness and severity, but with all mildness and gentleness to beseech and entreat, to use exhortations and arguments, in order to prevail with sinners and overcome their natural unwillingness to be reconciled to God, and to be happy for ever.

Secondly. The arguments and method which the apostle used.

“For he saith.” See Isa. xlix. 8. In that passage the declaration refers to the Messiah, and the design is there to shew that God would be favourable to him; that he would hear him when he prayed, and would make him the medium of establishing a covenant with his own people, and of spreading the true religion around the earth. This is the main idea of the passage as used by Paul. Under the Messiah, it is said by Isaiah, God would be willing to shew mercy. That would be an acceptable time. That time, says Paul, has arrived. The Messiah has come, and now God is willing to pardon and save. And the doctrine in this verse is, that, under the Messiah, or in the time of Christ, God is willing to shew mercy unto men. In him alone is the throne of grace accessible; and now that he has come God is willing to pardon, and men should avail themselves of the offers of mercy.—A. B.

And here he tells them,

1. The present time is the only proper season to accept of grace that is offered, and improve that grace which is afforded. “Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation,” ver. 2. The gospel day is a day of salvation, and the means of grace the means of salvation, and the offers of the Gospel the offers of salvation, and the present time the only proper time to accept of these offers; “To-day, while it is called to-day.” The morrow is none of ours; we know not what will be on the morrow, nor where we shall be; and we should remember that present seasons of grace are short and uncertain, and cannot be recalled when they are past. It is therefore our duty and interest to improve them whilst we enjoy them, and no less than our salvation depends upon our so doing.

“Behold now is the accepted time,” &c. The meaning of this passage is, ‘The Messiah is come. The time referred to by Isaiah has arrived. It is now a time when God is ready to shew compassion, to hear prayer, and to have mercy on mankind. Only through the Messiah, the Lord Jesus, does he shew mercy, and men should therefore now embrace the offers of pardon.’ The general sentiment of this passage may be thus expressed: 1. Under the Gospel it is an acceptable time, a day of mercy, a time when God is willing to shew mercy to men. 2. It is taught here, that the time will come when it will not be an accepted time. Now is the accepted time—at some future period it will not be. If men grieve away the Holy Spirit, if they continue to reject the Gospel, if they go unprepared to eternity, no mercy can be found. God does not design to pardon beyond the grave. He has made no provision for forgiveness there; and those who are not pardoned in this life must be unpardoned for ever.—A. B.

2. What caution they used not to give offence that might hinder the success of their preaching. “Giving no offence in any thing,” ver. 3. And the apostle had great difficulty to behave prudently and inoffensively towards the Jews and Gentiles, for many of both sorts watched for his halting, and sought occasion to blame him and his ministry, or his conversation; therefore he was very cautious not to give offence to those who were so apt to take offence, that he might not offend the Jews by unnecessary zeal against the law, nor the Gentiles by unnecessary compliances with such as were zealous for the law. He was careful in all his words and actions not to give offence, or occasion of guilt or grief. Note, When others are too apt to take offence, we should be cautious lest we give offence; and ministers especially should be careful lest they do any thing that may bring blame on their ministry, or render that unsuccessful.

3. Their constant aim and endeavour in all things to approve themselves faithful, as became the ministers of God, ver. 4. We see how much stress the apostle upon all occasions layeth on fidelity in our work, because much of our success doth depend upon that. His eye was single, and his heart upright in all his ministrations, and his great desire was to be the servant of God, and to approve himself so. Note, Ministers of the Gospel should look upon themselves as God's servants, or ministers, and act in every thing suitably to that character. So did the apostle.

1st. By much patience in afflictions. He was a great sufferer and met with many afflictions, oftentimes in necessities, and wanting the conveniences, if not the necessities, of life; in distresses, being straitened on every side, hardly knowing what to do; in stripes often, ch. xi. 24; in imprisonments; in tumults raised by the Jews and Gentiles against him; in labours, not only preaching the Gospel, but in travelling from place to place for that end, and working with his hands to supply his necessities; in watchings and in fastings, either voluntary upon a religious account, or involuntary for the sake of religion; but he exercised much patience in all, ver. 4, 5. Note, 1. It is the lot of faithful ministers often to be reduced to great difficulties, and to stand in need of much patience. 2. Those who would approve themselves to God must approve themselves faithful in trouble as well as in peace, not only in doing the work of God diligently but also in bearing the will of God patiently.

2nd. By acting from good principles. The apostle went by a good principle in all he did, and tells them what his principles were, ver. 6, 7; namely, pureness; and there is no piety without purity. A care to keep ourselves unspotted from the world is necessary in order to our acceptance with God; and, it may be added, with man also, [for wicked men can resist any thing else better than they can a holy example. They can make a mock of preaching; they can deride exhortation; they can throw away a tract; they can burn the Bible; but what can they do against a holy example? No more than they can against the vivifying and enlightening beams of the sun; and a man who leads a holy life cannot help doing good, and cannot be prevented from doing good.—A. B.] Knowledge was another principle, and zeal without this is but madness. He also acted with long-suffering and kindness, being not easily provoked, but bearing with the hardness of men's hearts, and hard treatment from their hands, whom he kindly endeavoured to do good unto. He acted under the influence of the Holy Ghost, from the noble principle of unfeigned love, according to the rule of the word of truth, under the support and assistance of the power of God, having on the “armour of righteousness,” a consciousness of universal righteousness and holiness, which is the best defence against the temptations of prosperity on the right hand and of adversity on the left.

3rd. By a due temper and behaviour under all the variety of conditions in this world, ver. 8—10. We must expect to meet with many alterations of our circumstances and conditions in this world; and it will be a great evidence of our integrity, if we preserve a right temper of mind, and duly behave ourselves under them all. The apostles met with honour and dishonour, good report and bad report; and good men in this world must expect to meet with some dishonour and reproaches to balance their honour and esteem; and we stand in need of the grace of God to arm us against the temptations of honour on the one hand, and to bear good report without pride; and of dishonour on the other hand, and to bear reproaches without impatience or recrimination. It should seem that persons differently represented the apostles in their reports, that some represented them as the best, and others as the worst of men. By some they were counted deceivers, and run down as such—by others as true, preaching the Gospel of truth, and men that were true to the rest reposed in them. They were slighted by the men of the world as unknown, men of no figure or account, not worth the taking notice of; yet in all the churches of Christ they were well known, and of great account; they were looked upon as dying, being killed all the day long, and their interest was thought to be a dying interest; and yet, Behold, saith the apostle, we live, and live comfortably, and bear up cheerfully under all our hardships, and go on conquering and to conquer. They were chastened, and often fell under the lash of the law, yet not killed; and though it was thought they were sorrowful, a company of morose and melancholy men, always sighing and mourning, yet they were always rejoicing in God, and had the greatest reason to rejoice always. They were despised as poor upon the account of their poverty in this world; and yet they made many rich, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. They were thought to have nothing, and silver and gold they had none, houses and lands they had none, yet they possessed all things; they had nothing in this world, but they had a treasure in heaven. Their effects lay in another country, in another world. They had nothing in themselves, but possessed all things in Christ. Such a paradox is a Christian's life, and through such variety of conditions and reports lieth our way to heaven, and we should be careful in all these things to approve ourselves to God.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. 12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. 13 Now for a recompence in the same, (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged. 14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? 15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? 16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. 17 Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, 18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

The apostle proceedeth to address himself more particularly to the Corinthians, and cautions them against mingling themselves with unbelievers. Whence observe,

First. How the caution is introduced with a profession, in a very pathetic manner, of the most tender affection to them, even like that of a father to his children, ver. 11—13. Though the apostle was happy in a great fluency of expressions, yet he seemed to want words how to signify the warm affection he had for these Corinthians, as if he had said, ‘O ye Corinthians, to whom I am now writing, I would fain convince you how well I love you. We are desirous to promote the spiritual and eternal welfare of all that we preach unto, yet “our mouth is open” unto you, and “our heart is enlarged” unto you, in a special manner.’ And because his heart was thus enlarged with love to them, therefore he opened his mouth so freely to them, in kind admonitions and exhortations. “Ye are not,” saith he, “straitened in us;” we would gladly do you all the service we can, and promote your comfort as helpers of your faith and your joy; and if it be otherwise the fault is in yourselves, it is because you are straitened in yourselves, and fail in suitable returns to us, through some misapprehensions concerning us; and all we desire as a recompence is only that you would be proportionably affected to us, as children should love their father. Note, It is desirable that there should be a mutual good affection between ministers and their people, and this would greatly tend to their mutual comfort and advantage.

“But ye are straitened in your own bowels;” that is, in the affection of your hearts. The word here used (σπλῆγχους) commonly means gentler emotions among them at Corinth, probably meeting at the same time certain charges made by his opponents.

vii. 4. The former epistle had produced the desired results, and intelligence of this had caused the apostle comfort.

vii. 5. “The real weight which pressed upon him was the ‘care of all the churches;’ the real cause of his grief was the danger which now threatened the souls of his converts, not in Corinth only or in Galatia, but everywhere throughout the empire. . . . The struggle at Corinth, the result of which he was now anxiously waiting, was only one out of many similar struggles between Judaism and Christianity.” (There was also a free-thinking party at Corinth.) “These were the ‘fightings without’ which filled him with ‘fears within;’ these were the agitations which ‘gave his flesh no rest’ and ‘troubled him on every side.’ At length the long-expected Titus arrived at Philippi, and relieved the anxiety of his master by better tidings than he had hoped to hear” (Conybeare and Howson).

the tender affections. The Greek word properly denotes the upper viscera—the heart, the lungs, the liver. It is applied by Greek writers to denote those parts of the victims which were eaten during or after the sacrifice.—Robinson, (Lex.) Hence it is applied to the heart, as the seat of the emotions and passions, and especially the gentler emotions, the tender affections,—compassion, pity, love, &c. Our word 'bowels' is applied usually to the lower viscera, and by no means expresses the idea of the word which is used in Greek. The idea here is, that they were straitened or were confined in their affections for him. It is the language of reproof, meaning that he had a right to expect, and which was a fair and proportionate return for the love bestowed on them. Probably he refers to the fact that they had formed parties, had admitted false teachers, and had not received his instructions as implicitly and as kindly as they ought to have done.—A. B.]

Secondly. The caution or exhortation itself, not to mingle themselves with unbelievers, not to be unequally yoked with them, ver. 14. Either,

1. In stated relations. It is an ill thing for good people to join in affinity with the wicked and profane; these will draw different ways, and that will be galling and grievous. Those relations that are our choice must be chosen by rule; and it is good for those that are themselves the children of God to join with those that are so likewise, for there is more danger that the bad will damage the good than hope that the good will benefit the bad.

2. In common conversation. We should not yoke ourselves in friendship and acquaintance with wicked men and unbelievers. Though we cannot wholly avoid seeing, and hearing, and being with such, yet we should never choose them for our bosom friends.

3. Much less should we join in religious communion with them. We must not join with them in their idolatrous services, nor concur with them in their false worship, nor any abominations; we must not confound together the table of the Lord and the table of devils, for the house of God and the house of Rimmon. The apostle giveth several good reasons against this corrupt mixture. 1st. It is a very great absurdity, ver. 14, 15. It is an unequal yoking of things together that will not agree together, as bad as for the Jews to have ploughed with an ox and an ass, or to have sown divers sorts of grain intermixed. What an absurdity is it to think of joining righteousness and unrighteousness, or mingling light and darkness, fire and water, together! Believers are and should be righteous, but unbelievers are unrighteous; believers are made light in the Lord, but unbelievers are in darkness, and what comfortable communion can these have together? Christ and Belial are contrary one to the other, they have opposite interests and designs, so that it is impossible there should be any concord or agreement between them. It is absurd, therefore, to think of listing under both; and if the believer hath part with an infidel, he doth what in him lieth to bring Christ and Belial together. 2nd. It is a dishonour to the Christian's profession, ver. 16; for Christians are by profession, and should be in reality, the "temples of the living God;" that is, dedicated to, and employed for, the service of God, who hath promised to reside in them, to dwell and walk in them, and stand in a special relation to them, and take a special care of them, that he will be their God, and they shall be his people. Now there can be no agreement between the temple of God and idols. Idols are rivals with God for his honour, and God is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another. 3rd. There is a great deal of danger in communicating with unbelievers and idolaters, danger of being defiled and of being rejected; therefore the exhortation is, ver. 17, to "come out from among them," and keep at a due distance; to be separate, as one would avoid the society of them that have the leprosy or the plague, for fear of taking infection, and not to "touch the unclean thing," lest we be defiled. And who can touch pitch and not be defiled by it? We must take care not to defile ourselves by converse with those who defile themselves with sin—so is the will of God, as we ever hope to be received, and not rejected, by him. 4th. It is base ingratitude to God for all the favours he hath bestowed upon believers, and promised to them, ver. 18. God hath promised to be a father to them, and that they shall be his sons and his daughters; and is there a greater honour or happiness than this? How ungrateful a thing then must it be if such who have this dignity and felicity should degrade and debase themselves by mingling with unbelievers? "Do we thus requite the Lord, O foolish and unwise?"

[Oh! if men could as easily be permitted to call themselves the sons of monarchs and princes—if they could as easily be admitted to the palaces of the great, and sit down at their tables, as they can enter heaven, how greedily would they embrace it! And yet how poor and paltry would be such honour and pleasure compared with that of feeling that we are the adopted children of the great and the eternal God!—A. B.]

CHAPTER VII.

This chapter begins with an exhortation to progressive holiness, and a due regard to the ministers of the Gospel, ver. 1–4. Then the apostle returns from a long digression to speak farther of the affair concerning the incestuous person, and tells them what comfort he received in his distress about that matter, upon his meeting with Titus, ver. 5–7, and how he rejoiced in their repentance, with the evidences thereof, ver. 8–11. And, lastly, he concludeth with endeavouring to comfort the Corinthians, upon whom his admonitions had had so good an effect, ver. 12–16.

AVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. 2 Receive us; we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man. 3 I speak not this to condemn you: for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you. 4 Great is my boldness of speech toward you, great is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

These verses contain a double exhortation, First. To make progress in holiness, or to "perfect holiness in the fear of God," ver. 1. This exhortation is given with most tender affection to them that were dearly beloved, and enforced by strong arguments, even the consideration of those exceeding great and precious promises which were mentioned in the former chapter, and which the Corinthians had an interest in, and a title to. And the promises of God are strong inducements to sanctification in both the branches thereof; namely,

1. The dying unto sin, or mortifying our lusts and corruptions. We must "cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit." Sin is filthiness, and there are defilements of body and mind; there are sins of the flesh, that are committed with the body, and sins of the spirit, spiritual wickednesses; and we must cleanse ourselves from the filthiness of both, for God is to be glorified both with body and soul.

2. The living unto righteousness and holiness. If we hope God is our Father, we must endeavour to be partakers of his holiness, to be holy, as he is holy, and perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect. We must be still perfecting holiness, and not be contented with sincerity, which is our gospel perfection, without aiming at sinless perfection, though we shall always come short of it whilst we are in this world; and this we must do in the fear of God, which is the root and principle of all religion, and there is no holiness without it. Note, Faith and hope in the promises of God must not destroy our fear of God, "who taketh pleasure in them that fear him, and hope in his mercy."

Secondly. To shew a due regard to the ministers of the Gospel. "Receive us," ver. 2. Those that labour in the word and doctrine should be had in reputation, and be highly esteemed for their works' sake; and this would be a help to making progress in holiness. If the ministers of the Gospel are thought contemptible because of their office, there is danger lest the Gospel itself should be contemned also. The apostle did not think it any disparagement to court the favour of the Corinthians; and, though we must flatter none, yet we must be gentle towards all. He tells them,

1. He had done nothing to forfeit their esteem and good-will, but was cautious not to do any thing to deserve their ill-will; ver. 2, "We have wronged no man." We have done you no harm, but always designed you good. "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel," said he to the elders of Ephesus, Acts xx. 33. "We have corrupted no man;" by false doctrines, or flattering speeches. "We have defrauded no man;" that is, we have not sought ourselves, nor to promote our own secular interests by crafty and greedy measures, to the damage of any persons. This is an appeal like that of Samuel, 1 Sam. xii. Note, Then may ministers the more confidently expect esteem and favour from the people when they can safely appeal to them that they are guilty of nothing that deserveth disesteem or displeasure.

2. He did not herein reflect upon them for want of affection to him, ver. 3, 4. So tenderly and cautiously did the apostle deal with the Corinthians, among whom there were some that would be glad of any occasion to reproach him, and prejudice the minds of others against him. To prevent any insinuations against him on account of what he had said, as if he intended to charge them with wronging him, or unjust accusations of him for having wronged them, he assureth them again of his great affection to them, inasmuch that he could spend his last breath at Corinth, and live and die with them, if his business with other churches, and his work as an apostle, which was not to be confined to one place only, would permit him to do so. And he addeth, it was his great affection to them that made him use such boldness or freedom of speech towards them, and caused him to glory, or make his boast of them in all places and upon all occasions, being "filled with comfort, and exceeding joyful in all their tribulations."

5 For, when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side; without we were fightings, within were fears. 6 Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus; 7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more. 8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season. 9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing. 10 For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death. 11 For behold this selfsame thing, that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge! In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

viii. 1. "Grace;" St. Paul here ascribes the readiness of the Macedonian churches to contribute for the poor Christians at Jerusalem to the grace of God working in them and animating them to deeds of liberality. (See Gal. ii. 10.) In addition to what is there stated, no doubt the liberality of the Gentile churches would have a conciliatory effect upon the Jewish Christians.

viii. 3–5. "For according to their power I testify, and beyond their power, voluntarily, with much exhortation beseeching of us the grace and fellowship of the ministry to the saints (i.e., to allow them a share in that grace and fellowship), and not as we expected (i.e., far beyond our expectation), but themselves they gave first (i.e., above all, as the inducing motive; not first in point of time, but in point of importance, Rom. ii. 9, 10) to the Lord, and to us by the will of God (the giver of grace, who made them willing to do this)" (Alford).

viii. 15. Quoted from the Septuagint (Exod. xvi. 18). Bishop Wordsworth says that the manna which the several members of the

There seemeth to be a connexion between ch. ii. 13 (where the apostle said he had "no rest in his spirit" when he found not Titus at Troas,) and the fifth verse of this chapter: and so great was his affection to the Corinthians, and his concern about their behaviour in relation to the incestuous person, that in his farther travels he still had no rest till he heard from them. And now he tells them,

First. How he was distressed, ver. 5. He was troubled when he did not meet with Titus at Troas, and afterwards when for some time he did not meet with him in Macedonia; this was a grief to him, because he could not hear what reception he met with at Corinth, or how their affairs went forward. And besides this they met with other troubles, with incessant storms of persecutions: there were fightings without, or continual contentions with, and opposition from, Jews and Gentiles; and there were fears within, and great concern for such as had embraced the Christian faith, lest they should be corrupted or seduced, and give scandal to others, or be scandalized.

Secondly. How he was comforted, ver. 6, 7. Whence observe, 1. The very coming of Titus was some comfort to him. It was matter of joy to see him, whom he long desired and expected to meet with. The very coming of Titus, and his company, who was dear to him as his "own son in the common faith," Tit. i. 4, was a great comfort to the apostle in his travels and troubles. But, 2. The good news which Titus brought concerning the Corinthians was matter of greater consolation. He found Titus to be comforted in them, and this filled the apostle with comfort, especially when he acquainted him with their earnest desire to give good satisfaction in the things about which the apostle had written to them; and of their mourning for the scandal that was found among them, and the great grief they had caused to others; and their fervent mind or great affection towards the apostle, who had dealt so faithfully with them in reproving their faults. So true is the observation of Solomon, Pr. xxviii. 23, "He that rebuketh a man afterwards shall find more favour than he that flattereth with his tongue." 3. He ascribeth all his comfort to God as the author. It was God that comforted him by the coming of Titus, even the God of all comfort, "God that comforteth those that are cast down," ver. 6. Note, We should look above and beyond all means and instruments unto God, as the author of all our consolation and the good we enjoy.

Thirdly. How greatly he was rejoiced at their repentance, and the evidences thereof. The apostle was sorry that he had grieved them, that some pious persons among them laid to heart very greatly what he said in his former epistle, or that it was needful he should make them sorry, whom he had rather have made glad, ver. 8. But now he rejoiced when he found they had "sorrowed to repentance," ver. 9. Their sorrow in itself was not the cause of his rejoicing; but the nature of it, and the effect of it, viz., "repentance unto salvation," ver. 13, made him rejoice; for now it appeared that they had received damage by him in nothing; their sorrow was but for a season, it was turned into joy, and that joy was durable. Observe here,

1. The antecedent of true repentance is godly sorrow, that worketh repentance. It is not repentance itself, but it is a good preparation for repentance, and in some sense the cause that produceth repentance. The offender had great sorrow, he was in danger of being "swallowed up with overmuch sorrow;" and the society was greatly sorrowful, which before was puffed up; and this sorrow of theirs was after a godly manner, or according to God, (as it is in the original), that is, it was according to the will of God, and tending to the glory of God, and wrought by the Spirit of God. It was a godly sorrow, because a sorrow for sin, as an offence against God, an instance of ingratitude, and a forfeiture of God's favour. There is a great difference between this sorrow of a godly sort and the sorrow of this world. Godly sorrow produceth repentance and reformation, and will end in salvation; but worldly sorrow worketh death. The sorrows of worldly men for worldly things will bring down grey hairs the sooner to the grave; and such a sorrow even for sin as Judas had will have fatal consequences, as his had, which wrought death. Now, 1st. That repentance will be attended with salvation. Therefore, 2nd. True penitents will never repent that they have repented, nor of any thing that was conducive thereto. 3rd. Humiliation and godly sorrow are previously necessary in order to repentance, and both of them are from God, the giver of all grace.

2. The happy fruits and consequences of true repentance are mentioned, ver. 11, and those fruits that are meet for repentance are the best evidences of it; and where the heart is changed the life and actions will be changed too. The Corinthians made it evident their sorrow was a godly sorrow, and such as wrought repentance, because it wrought in them great carefulness about their souls, and to avoid sin, and please God; it wrought also a clearing of themselves, not by insisting upon their own justification before God, especially whilst they persisted in their sin, but by endeavours to put away the accursed thing, and so free themselves from the just imputation of approving the evil that had been done. It wrought indignation at sin, at themselves, at the tempter and his instruments; it wrought fear, a fear of reverence, a fear of watchfulness, and a fear of distrust—not a distrust of God, but of themselves; an awful fear of God, a cautious fear of sin, and a jealous fear of themselves. It wrought vehement desire after a thorough reformation of what had been amiss, and of reconciliation with God whom they had offended. It wrought zeal, a mixture of love and anger, a zeal for duty, and against sin. It wrought, lastly, revenge against sin and their own folly, by endeavours to make all due satisfaction for injuries that might be done thereby. And thus "in all things had they approved themselves to be clear in that matter." Not that they were innocent, but that they were penitent, and therefore clear of guilt before God, who would pardon and not punish them; and they ought no longer to be reproved, much less to be reproached, by men, for what they had truly repented of.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you. 13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all. 14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth. 15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling ye received him. 16 I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

In these verses the apostle endeavoureth to comfort the Corinthians, upon whom his admonitions had had such good effect. And in order thereto,

First. He tells them, he had a good design in his former epistle, which might be thought severe, ver. 12. It was not chiefly "for his cause that did the wrong," that is, not only for his benefit, much less merely that he should be punished; nor yet was it only "for his cause that suffered wrong," namely, the injured father, and that he might have what satisfaction could be given him; but it was also to manifest his great and sincere concern and care for them, that is, the whole church, lest that should suffer by letting such a crime, and the scandal thereof, remain among them without due remark and resentment.

Secondly. He acquaints them with the joy of Titus as well as of himself, upon the account of their repentance and good behaviour. Titus was rejoiced, and his spirit refreshed with their comfort, and this comforted and rejoiced the apostle also, ver. 13; and as Titus was comforted whilst he was with them, so when he remembered his reception among them, expressing their obedience to the apostolical directions, and their fear and trembling at the reproofs that were given them, the thoughts of these things inflamed and increased his affections to them, ver. 15.

"And his inward affection," &c. He has become deeply and tenderly attached to you. His affectionate regard for you has been greatly increased by his visit. On the meaning of the word here rendered "inward affection," (σπλάγχνα, margin, "bowels,") see Note, ch. vi. 12. It denotes here deep, tender attachment, or love.—A. B.]

Note, There is great comfort and joy that followeth upon godly sorrow. As sin occasions general grief, so repentance and reformation occasion general joy. Paul was glad, and Titus was glad, and the Corinthians were comforted, and the penitent ought to be comforted; and well may all this joy be on earth, when there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.

Thirdly. He concludeth this whole matter with expressing the entire confidence he had in them. He was not ashamed of his boasting concerning them to Titus, ver. 14. For he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning them, which he signified to Titus; and he could now with great joy declare what confidence he still had in them as to all things, that he did not doubt of their good behaviour for the time to come. Note, It is a great comfort and joy to a faithful minister to have to do with a people that he can confide in, and that he hath reason to hope will comply with every thing he propoeth to them that is for the glory of God, the credit of the Gospel, and their advantage.

CHAPTER VIII.

In this and the following chapter Paul is exhorting and directing the Corinthians about a particular work of charity, to relieve the necessities of the poor saints at Jerusalem and in Judea, according to the good example of the churches in Macedonia, Rom. xv. 26. The Christians at Jerusalem, through war, famine, and persecution, were grown poor, many of them fallen into decay, and perhaps most of them were but poor when they first embraced Christianity, for Christ said, The poor receive the Gospel. Now Paul, though he was the apostle of the Gentiles, had a tender regard and kind concern for those among the Jews that were converted to the Christian faith; and though many of them had not so much affection to the Gentile converts as they ought to have, yet the apostle would have the Gentiles to be kind to them, and stirred them up to contribute liberally for their relief. Upon this subject he is very large and copious, and writeth very affectingly. In this eighth chapter he acquainteth the Corinthians with, and commendeth the good example of, the Macedonians in this work of charity, and that Titus was sent to Corinth to collect their bounty, ver. 1-6. He then proceedeth to urge this duty with several cogent arguments, ver. 7-15; and commendeth the persons that were employed in this affair, ver. 16-24.

Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia; 2 How that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. 3 For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves; 4 Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints. 5 And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God. 6 Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also.

Observe here, First. The apostle taketh occasion from the good example of the churches of Macedonia, that is, of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and others in the region of Macedonia, to exhort the Corinthians and the Christians in Achaia to the good work of charity. And,

1. He acquainteth them with their great liberality, which he calleth "the grace of God bestowed on the churches," ver. 1. Some think the words should be rendered, the gift of God given in or by the churches. He certainly meaneth the charitable gifts of these churches, which are called the grace or gifts of God, same tent had gathered was put together into one common stock, and then meted out with an omer, so that each person had exactly an omer, neither more nor less. This St. Paul uses as an illustration of the abundance of one supplying the deficiency of another.

viii. 19. "Grace:" gift. "To the glory:" not to be joined with "administered by us," but referring to "the union of this brother with Paul in the matter of the alms, which was done to avoid suspicious detrimental to Christ's glory and to the zeal of the apostle." The brother spoken of is generally believed to have been Luke, but the word "gospel" can hardly refer to his written gospel.

ix. 2. "Forwardness:" readiness. "Provoked:" stirred up.

ix. 4. "Unprepared:" i.e., with their collection, of which he had boasted as being ready.

ix. 5. "Your bounty, whereof ye had notice before:" literally, "your long-promised or long-announced blessing"—i.e., their beneficence, which had long been announced by the apostle to the either because they were very large, or rather because their charity to the poor saints did proceed from God as the Author, and was accompanied with true love to God, which also was manifested this way. And the grace of God must be owned as the root and fountain of all the good that is in us, or done by us at any time; and it is great grace and favour from God, and bestowed on us, if we are made useful to others, and are forward to any good work.

2. He commendeth the charity of the Macedonians, and sets it forth with good advantage. He tells them, 1st. They were but in a low condition, and themselves in distress, yet they contributed to the relief of others. They were in great tribulation and deep poverty, ver. 2. It was a time of great affliction with them, as may be seen, Acts xvi. and xvii. The Christians in these parts met with ill treatment, which had reduced them to deep poverty; yet, as they had abundance of joy in the midst of tribulation, they abounded in their liberality; they gave out of a little, trusting in God to provide for them, and make it up to them. 2nd. They gave very largely, with "the riches of liberality," ver. 2; that is, as liberally as if they had been rich. It was a large contribution they made, all things considered; it was according to, yea beyond, their power, (ver. 3,) as much if not more than could well be expected from them. Note, That, though men may condemn the indiscretion, yet God will accept the pious zeal of those that in real works of piety and charity do rather beyond their power. 3rd. They were very ready and forward to this good work. "They were willing of themselves," ver. 3; and were so far from needing that Paul should urge and press them with many arguments, that they prayed him "with much intreaty to receive the gift," ver. 4. It seemeth that Paul was backward to undertake this trust, for he would give himself to the word and prayer; or it may be he was apprehensive how ready his enemies would be to reproach and blacken him upon all occasions, and might take a handle against him, upon account of so large a sum deposited in his hands, to suspect or accuse him of indiscretion and partiality in the distribution, if not of some injustice. Note, How cautious ministers should be, especially in money matters, not to give occasion to them that seek occasion to speak reproachfully. 4th. Their charity was founded in true piety, and this was the great commendation of it. They performed this good work in a right method; "First they gave themselves to the Lord, and then they gave 'unto us' their contributions 'by the will of God,'" ver. 5; that is, according as it was the will of God they should do, or to be disposed of as the will of God should be, and for his glory. This it seemeth exceeded the expectation of the apostle; it was more than he hoped for, to see such warm and pious affections shining in these Macedonians, and this good work performed with so much devotion and solemnity. They solemnly, jointly, and unanimously made a fresh surrender of themselves, and all they had, unto the Lord Jesus Christ. They had done this before, and now they do it again upon this occasion, sanctifying their contributions to God's honour by first giving themselves to the Lord. Note, 1st. We should give ourselves to God. We cannot bestow ourselves better. 2nd. When we give ourselves to the Lord, we then give him all we have, to be called for and disposed of according to his will. 3rd. Whatever we use or lay out for God, it is only giving to him what is his own. 4th. All we give or bestow for charitable uses will not be accepted of God, or turn to our advantage, unless we first give ourselves to the Lord.

Secondly, The apostle tells them Titus was desired to go and make a collection among them, ver. 6; and Titus he knew would be an acceptable person to them. He had met with a kind reception among them formerly; they had shewn good affection to him, and he had a great love for them. Besides, Titus had already begun this work among them, therefore he was desired to finish it. So that he was on all accounts a proper person to be employed; and when so good a work had already prospered in so good a hand, it would be pity if it should not proceed and be finished. Note, It is an instance of wisdom to use proper instruments in a work we desire to do well; and the work of charity will often succeed the best when the most proper persons are employed to ask for it, and dispose of it.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also. 8 I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love. 9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. 10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago. 11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. 12 For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. 13 For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened: 14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality: 15 As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

In these verses the apostle useth several cogent arguments to stir up the Corinthians to this good work of charity.

Macedonians. "Not as of covetousness:" literally, "not as covetousness"—i.e., not of a covetous, niggardly spirit.

ix. 6. "Bountifully;" rather, "with blessings"—i.e., with a beneficent, charitable spirit. "He which soweth with blessings shall reap also with blessings." He that soweth in a beneficent, charitable spirit shall reap in the midst of blessings poured out upon him.

ix. 8. "God can bestow upon us abundantly not only the grace which makes us rejoice in the Lord, and so prepares us to give with

First. He urgeth upon them the consideration of their eminence in other gifts and graces, and would have them excel in this of charity also, ver. 7. There is great address and holy art here used by the apostle, when he would persuade the Corinthians to this good thing. He commendeth them for other good things that were found in them. Most people love to be spoken fair, especially when we ask a gift of them for ourselves or others; and it is a justice we owe to those in whom God's grace doth shine to give them their due commendation. Observe here what it was the Corinthians abounded in. Faith is mentioned first, for that is the root; and as without faith it is impossible to please God, Heb. xi. 6, so they that do abound in faith will abound in other graces and good works also, and this will work and shew itself by love. To their faith was added utterance, which is an excellent gift, and redounds much to the glory of God and the good of the church. Many have faith that want utterance. But these Corinthians excelled most churches in spiritual gifts, and particularly in utterance; and yet this was not in them, as in too many, both the effect and evidence of ignorance; for with their utterance there appeared knowledge, abundance of knowledge. They had a treasury of things new and old, and in their utterance they brought out of this treasury. They abounded also in all diligence. Oftentimes those who have great knowledge and ready utterance are not the most diligent Christians. Great talkers are not always the best doers; but these Corinthians were diligent to do, as well as know and talk, well. And farther, they had abundant love to their ministers; and were not like too many, that, having gifts of their own, are but too apt to slight their ministers, and neglect them. Now to all these good things the apostle desireth them to add this grace also, to abound in charity to the poor; that, where so much good was found, there should be found yet more good.

Before the apostle proceedeth to another argument he taketh care to prevent any misapprehensions of his design to impose on them, or to bind heavy burthens upon them by his authority; and tells them, (ver. 2) he did not speak by commandment, or in a way of authority: "I give my advice," ver. 10. He took occasion from the forwardness of others to propose what would be expedient for them, and would prove the sincerity of their love, or be the genuine effect and evidence thereof. Note, A great difference should be made between plain and positive duty and the improvement of a present opportunity of doing or getting good. Many a thing which is good for us to do, yet cannot be said to be, by express and indispensable commandment, our duty at this or that time.

Secondly, Another argument is taken from the consideration of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. And the best arguments for Christian duties are those that are taken from the love of Christ, that constraineth us. The example of the churches of Macedonia was such as the Corinthians should imitate; but the example of our Lord Jesus should have much greater influence. And "ye know," saith the apostle, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," ver. 9; that "though he was rich," as being God, equal in power and glory with the Father, rich in all the glory and blessedness of the upper world, "yet for your sakes he became poor." [It implies, 1. His pre-existence, for he became poor. He had been rich, yet not in this world. He did not lay aside wealth here on earth after he had possessed it, for he had none. He was not first rich and then poor on earth, for he had no earthly wealth. The Socinian interpretation is, that he was "rich in power and in the Holy Ghost;" but it was not true that he laid these aside, and that he became poor in either of them. He had power, even in his poverty, to still the waves, and to raise the dead, and he was always full of the Holy Ghost. His family was poor, and his parents were poor, and he was himself poor all his life. This, then, must refer to a state of antecedent riches before his assumption of human nature, and the expression is strikingly parallel to that in Phil. ii. 6, seq.: "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation," &c. 2. He was rich as the Lord and Proprietor of all things. He was the Creator of all, Jno. i. 3; Col. i. 16; and as Creator he had a right to all things, and the disposal of all things.—A.B.] Not only did he become man for us, but he became poor also. He was born in poor circumstances, lived a poor life, and died in poverty; and this was for our sakes, that we thereby might be made rich—rich in the love and favour of God; rich in the blessings and promises of the new covenant; rich in the hopes of eternal life, being heirs of the kingdom. This is a good reason why we should be charitable to the poor out of that we have, because we ourselves live upon the charity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Thirdly, Another argument is taken from their good purposes, and their forwardness to begin this good work. As to this, he telleth them,

1. It was expedient for them to perform what they purposed, and finish what they had begun, ver. 10, 11. What else did their good purposes and good beginnings signify? Good purposes indeed are good things; they are like buds and blossoms, pleasant to behold, and give hopes of good fruit, but they are lost, and signify nothing, without performances. So good beginnings are amiable, but we shall lose the benefit unless there be perseverance, and we bring forth fruit to perfection. Seeing, therefore, the Corinthians had shewed a readiness to will, he would have them be careful also in the performance, according to their ability. For,

2. This would be acceptable to God. This willing mind is accepted, ver. 12, when accompanied with sincere endeavours. When men do purpose that which is good, and endeavour according to their ability to perform also, God will accept of what they have, or can do, and not reject them for what they have not, and is not in their power to do; and this is true as to other things besides the work of charity. But let us note here, this Scripture will by no means justify those that think good meanings are enough, or that good purposes and the profession of a willing mind are sufficient to save them. It is accepted indeed where there is a performance as far as we are able, and when providence doth hinder the performance, as in David's case, concerning building a house for the Lord, 2 Sam. vii.

Fourthly, Another argument is taken from the discrimination which Divine providence doth make in the distribution of the things of this world, and the mutability of human affairs, ver. 13—15. The force of the arguing seemeth to be this: providence giveth to some more of the good things of this world and to some less; and that with this design, that those who have a greater abundance might supply them that are in want, that there might be room for charity. And farther, considering the mutability of human affairs, and how soon there may be an alteration, so that those who now have an abundance may stand in need of being supplied themselves in their wants, this should induce them to be charitable whilst they are able. It is the will of God, by our mutually supplying one another, there should be some sort of equality; not an absolute equality indeed, or such a levelling as would destroy property, for in such a case there could be no exercise of charity. But as in works of charity there should be an equitable proportion observed, that the burthen should not lie too heavy on some, while others are wholly eased, so all should think themselves concerned to supply them that are in want. This is illustrated by the instance of gathering and distributing manna in the wilderness, concerning which, as we may read, Ex. xvi., it was the duty of every family, and all in the family, to gather what they could; which, when it was gathered, was put into some common receptacle for each family, from whence the master of the family distributed to every one as he had occasion; to some more than they were able, through age and joyful hearts (chap. viii. 2), but the grace which bestows on us that abundance of earthly blessings and that prosperity which enables us to give so liberally."

ix. 10. Rather, "He that supplieth seed to the sower and bread for eating, shall supply and multiply your seed (i.e., your means of liberality), and will increase the fruits of your righteousness."

firmity, to gather up; to others less than they gathered, because they did not need so much. And thus "he that had gathered much," that is, more than he had occasion for, had nothing over, when a communication was made to him "that had gathered little," who by this method had no lack. Note, Such is the condition of men in this world that we mutually depend on one another, and should help one another; and those who have never so much of this world have no more than food and raiment, and they who have but a little of this world seldom want that; nor, indeed, should those who have abundance suffer others to want, but be ready to afford supply.

[The Christian character is incomplete, unless there is a spirit of large and liberal beneficence. This is indispensable to the proper symmetry of the Christian graces, and this should be cultivated in order to give beauty and completeness to the whole. Yet it cannot be denied that there are true Christians, whose life is wanting. There are those who give every other evidence of piety, who are men of prayer, and who evince humility, and who are submissive in trials, and whose conversation is that of Christians, who are yet sadly deficient in this grace.—A. B.]

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. 17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you. 18 And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches; 19 And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind: 20 Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us: 21 Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. 22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you. 23 Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellowhelper concerning you: or our brethren be enquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. 24 Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf.

In these verses the apostle commendeth the brethren that were sent to them to collect their charity, and, as it were, giveth them letters credential, that if they were inquired after, (ver. 23.) that is, if any should be inquisitive, or suspicious concerning them, it might be known who they were, and how safely they might be trusted.

First. He commendeth Titus. 1. For his earnest care and great concern of heart for them, and desire in all things to promote their welfare. This is mentioned with thankfulness to God, ver. 16; and it is cause of thankfulness if God hath put into the hearts of any to do us or others any good. 2. For his readiness to this present service. He accepted of the office, and was forward to go upon this good errand, ver. 17. Asking of charity for the relief of others is by many looked upon as a thankless office, yet it is a good office, and what we should not be shy of when we are called to it.

Secondly. He commendeth another brother, who was sent with Titus. It is generally thought this was Luke. He is commended, 1. As a man whose praise was "in the Gospel throughout all the churches," ver. 18. His ministerial services of several kinds were well known, and he had approved himself praiseworthy in what he had done. 2. As one chosen of the churches, (ver. 19.) and joined with the apostle in his ministration. This was done, it is most likely, at the motion and request of Paul himself, for this reason, "that no man might blame him in that abundance which was administered by him," ver. 20: so cautious was the apostle to avoid all occasions that evil-minded men might lay hold on to blacken him. He would not give occasion to any to accuse him of injustice or partiality in this affair; and thought it to be his duty, as it is the duty of all Christians, "to provide for things honest, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men;" that is, to act so prudently as to prevent, as far as we can, all unjust suspicions concerning us, and all occasions of scandalous imputations. Note, We live in a censorious world, and should cut off occasion from them that seek occasion to speak reproachfully. It is the crime of others if they reproach or censure us without occasion; and it is our imprudence, at least, if we give them any occasion, when there may not be a just cause for them so to do.

Thirdly. He commendeth also another brother that was joined with the two former in this affair. This brother is thought to be Apollos. Whoever he was he had approved himself diligent in many things, and therefore was fit to be employed in this affair; moreover, he had a great desire to this work, because of the confidence or good opinion he had of the Corinthians, ver. 22. And it is a great comfort to see those employed in good works that have formerly approved themselves diligent.

Fourthly. He concludeth this point with a general good character of them all, ver. 23; as fellow-labourers with him for their welfare, as "the messengers of the churches," as "the glory of Christ;" that is, who were to him for a name and a praise, who brought glory to Christ as instruments, and had obtained honour from Christ to be counted faithful, and employed in his service. Wherefore, upon the whole, he exhorteth them to shew their liberality, answerable to the great expectation of "us" had concerning them at this time; that these messengers of the churches, and the churches themselves, might see a full proof of their love to God, and to their afflicted brethren, and that it was with good reason the apostle had even boasted on their behalf, ver. 24. Note, "That others" good opinion of us should be an argument with us to do well.

[The churches should bear their just proportion in the cause of Christian beneficence, ver. 13—15. There are great interests of charity which must be sustained. The world cannot do without them. Not only must the poor be provided for, but the cause of temperance, and of Sabbath schools, and of missions, must be sustained. Bibles must be distributed, and men must be educated for the ministry, and the widow and the fatherless must be the objects of Christian benevolence. These burthens, if they are burthens, should be equally distributed. The rich should furnish their fair proportion in sustaining them; and those in more moderate circumstances must do their fair proportion also in sustaining them. If this were done, all the objects of Christian benevolence could be sustained, and they would in fact not be burthensome to the churches. With infinite ease all might be contributed that is necessary to send the Gospel around the world. Let all Christians, therefore, so live that it may be honestly said of them, they are "the glory of Christ," ver. 23. Let them aim so to live that it will be esteemed to be an honour to the Redeemer that he called them into his kingdom, and that he so richly endowed them by his grace. This would be a commendation to all men wherever they might go; to say this is enough to say of any men. None can have a higher character than to have it said with truth of him, "He is the glory of Christ; he is an honour to his Redeemer and to his cause."—A. B.]

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter the apostle seemeth to excuse his earnestness in pressing the Corinthians to the duty of charity, ver. 1—5; and proceedeth to give directions about the acceptable way and manner of performing it, namely, bountifully, deliberately, and freely; and giveth good encouragement for so doing, ver. 6—15.

OR as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you: 2 For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many. 3

Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready: 4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting. 5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

In these verses the apostle speaketh very respectfully to the Corinthians, and with great skill; and, while he seemeth to excuse his urging them so earnestly to charity, doth still press them thereto, and sheweth how much his heart was set upon this matter.

First. He tells them it was needless to press them with farther arguments to afford relief to their poor brethren, ver. 1, being satisfied he had said enough already to prevail with them of whom he had so good an opinion. For, 1. He knew their forwardness to every good work, and how they had begun this good work a year ago. Inasmuch, that, 2. He had boasted of their zeal to the Macedonians, and this had provoked many of them to do as they had done. Wherefore he was persuaded that, as they had begun well, they would go on well; and so, commending them for what they had done, he lays an obligation on them to proceed and persevere.

Secondly. He seemeth to apologize for sending Titus and the other brethren to them. He is unwilling they should be offended at him for this, as if he was too earnest, and pressed too hard upon them, and tells the true reasons why he sent them, namely, 1. That having this timely notice they might be fully ready, ver. 3, and not surprised with hasty demands when he should come to them. And when we would have others do that which is good we must act towards them prudently and tenderly, and give them time. 2. That he might not be ashamed of his boasting concerning them, if they should be found unready, ver. 3, 4. He intimateth that some from Macedonia might haply come with him; and if the collection should not then be made, this would make him, not to say them, ashamed, considering the boasting of the apostle concerning them. Thus careful was he to preserve their reputation and his own. Note, Christians should consult the reputation of their profession, and endeavour to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.

6 But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bounti-

ix. 13. "By the experiment," &c.: rather, "by the proof or experience of (afforded by) this ministration." "Your professed subjection," &c.: the subjection of your confession—i.e., "that you who confess Christ are really and truly subject in holy obedience" (Alford).

x. 1. "Meekness:" internal disposition. "Gentleness:" external behaviour towards others. St. Paul appropriates ironically the imputation cast upon him by his opponents (see verse 10).

x. 2. "According to the flesh," influenced by fleshly motives, probably with idea of weakness.

x. 3. "For:" reason for "I beseech," &c. "War:" "They who accuse us of walking after the flesh shall find (to their cost) that we do not war after the flesh; therefore compel us not to use our weapons" (Alford).

x. 6. "Fulfilled:" rather, "completed." When the number of those obeying is complete, then those remaining in disobedience fully shall reap also bountifully. 7 Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver. 8 And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work: 9 (As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever. 10 Now he that ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness;) 11 Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God. 12 For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God; 13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men; 14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you. 15 Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

Here we have,

First. Proper directions to be observed about the right and acceptable manner of bestowing charity; and it is of great concernment that we do what is required so as is commanded. Now, as to the manner in which the apostle would have the Corinthians give, observe,

1. It should be bountifully. This was intimated, ver. 5, that a liberal contribution was expected, a matter of bounty, not what savoured of covetousness; and he offereth to their consideration that men who expect a good return at harvest do not use to pinch and spare in sowing their seed, for the return usually is proportionable to what they sow, ver. 6.

2. It should be deliberately. "Every man, according as he purposeth in his heart," ver. 7. Works of charity, like other good works, should be done with thought and design, whereas some do good only by accident; they comply, it may be hastily, with the importunity of others, without any good design, and give more than they intended, and then repent of it afterwards, or possibly, had they duly considered all things, they would have given more. Due deliberation as to this matter of our own circumstances, and those of them we are about to relieve, will be very helpful to direct us how liberal we should be in our contributions for charitable uses.

3. It should be freely, whatever we give, be it more or less; "not grudgingly, or of necessity," but cheerfully, ver. 7. Persons sometimes will give merely to satisfy the importunity of those that ask their charity, and what they give is in a manner squeezed or forced from them, and this unwillingness spoileth all they do. We ought to give more freely than the modesty of some necessitous persons will allow them to ask. We should not only deal out bread, but "draw out our souls" to the hungry, Isa. lvi. 10. We should give liberally with an open hand, and cheerfully with an open countenance, being glad we have ability and an opportunity to be charitable.

Secondly. Good encouragement to perform this work of charity in the manner thus directed; for example, here the apostle tells the Corinthians,

1. They themselves would be no losers by what they gave in charity. This may serve to obviate a secret objection in the minds of many against this good work, who are ready to think they may want what they give away; but such should consider what is given to the poor in a right manner is far from being lost. As the precious seed which is cast into the ground is not lost, though it is buried there for a time, for it will spring up and bear fruit, the sower shall receive it again with increase, ver. 6, such good returns may they expect that give freely and liberally in charity. For,

1st. God loveth a cheerful giver, ver. 7. And what may not they hope to receive who are the objects of the Divine love? Can a man be a loser by doing that with which God is pleased? May not such a one be sure he shall some way or other be a gainer? Nay, is not the love and favour of God better than all other things, better than life itself?

2nd. God is able to make our charity redound to our advantage, ver. 8. We have no reason to distrust the goodness of God, and to be sure we have no reason to question his power; he is "able to make all grace abound" towards us, and to abound in us, to give a large increase of spiritual and temporal good things. He can make us to have a sufficiency in all things, to be content with what we have, to make up what we give, to make us able to give yet more, as it is written, Ps. cxii. 9, concerning the charitable man, "He hath dispersed abroad; he hath given to the poor; his righteousness" that is, his almsgiving, "endureth for ever." The honour of it is lasting, the reward of it eternal, and he is still able to live comfortably himself, and give liberally to others.

3rd. The apostle puts up a prayer to God on their behalf, that they might be gainers and not losers, ver. 10, 11; where observe, First. To whom the prayer is made, namely, unto God, who "ministereth seed to the sower;" that is, who by his providence giveth such an increase of the fruits of the earth, that we have not only bread sufficient to eat for one year, but enough to sow again for a future supply. Or thus, it is God that giveth us not only a competency for ourselves, but that also wherewith we may supply the wants of others, and so should be as seed to be sown. Secondly. For what he prayeth; and there shall be punished. "We should notice in verses 3 to 6 the completeness of the military allegory. The image is that of a campaign against rebels. Rock-forts (such as those on St. Paul's own Cilician coast) must be cast down, and when the general obedience of the country is secured, those who are still rebellious must be summarily punished" (Howson).

x. 9. Supply "I say this." "I say this lest I should seem to be terrifying with empty threats."

are several things he desireth for them, namely, that they may have "bread for their food," that is, always a good competency for themselves, food convenient; that God would "multiply their seed sown," that is, that they might still be able to do more good; and that there might be "an increase of the fruits of righteousness, that is, that they might reap plentifully, and have the best and most ample returns of their charity, so as to be "enriched in every thing to all bountifulness," ver. 11; that upon the whole they may find it true they shall be no losers, but great gainers. Note, Works of charity are so far from impoverishing us that they are the proper means truly to enrich us, or make us truly rich.

2. The poor distressed saints would be gainers, as they would be no losers, for this service would supply their wants, ver. 12. If we have reason to think them to be saints whom we believe to be of the household of faith, whose wants are great, how ready should we be to do them good? Our goodness cannot extend unto God, but we should freely extend it to these excellent ones of the earth, and thus shew that we delight in them.

3. This would redound to the praise and glory of God. Many thanksgivings would be given to God on this account, by the apostle, and by them that were employed in this ministration, ver. 11; these would bless God who had made them happy instruments in so good a work, and made them successful in it. Besides these, others also would be thankful: the poor that were supplied in their wants would not fail to be very thankful to God, and bless God for them; and all that wished well to the Gospel would glorify God for this experiment, or proof of subjection to the Gospel of Christ, and true love to all men, ver. 11. Note, 1. True Christianity is a subjection to the Gospel, a yielding ourselves to the commanding influence of its truths and laws. 2. We must evidence the sincerity of our subjection to the Gospel by works of charity. 3. This will be for the credit of our profession, and to the praise and glory of God. 4. Those whose wants were supplied would make the best returns they were able, by sending up many prayers to God for those who had relieved them, ver. 14. And thus should we recompense the kindnesses we receive when we are not in a capacity of recompensing them any other way; and, as this is the only recompense the poor can make, so it is many times greatly for the advantage of the rich.

Thirdly. The apostle concludeth this whole matter with this doxology, "Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift," ver. 15. Some think by this unspeakable gift he meaneth the gift of grace bestowed on the churches, in making them able and willing to supply the necessities of the saints, which would be attended with unspeakable benefits both to the givers and receivers. It should seem rather that he meaneth Jesus Christ, who is indeed the unspeakable gift of God unto this world; a gift we have all reason to be very thankful for.

"Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift." This is one of the most striking instances which occur in the New Testament, shewing that the mind of Paul was full of this subject; and that wherever he began, he was sure to end with a reference to the Redeemer. The invaluable gift of a Saviour was so familiar to his mind, and he was so accustomed to dwell on that in his private thoughts, that the mind naturally and easily glanced on that whenever anything occurred that by the remotest allusion would suggest it. The idea is, "Your benefactions are indeed valuable; and for them, for the disposition which you have manifested, and for all the good which you will be enabled thus to accomplish, we are bound to give thanks to God. All this will excite the gratitude of those who shall be benefited. But how small is all this compared with the great gift which God has imparted in bestowing a Saviour! That is unspeakable." The word here used (ἀνεκδιμήτῃ) means, what cannot be related, unutterable. It occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. The idea is, that no words can properly express the greatness of the gift thus bestowed on man. It is higher than the mind can conceive, higher than language can express. On this verse we may observe, 1. That the Saviour is a gift to men. So he is uniformly represented: see Jno. iii. 16; Gal. i. 4; ii. 20; Eph. i. 22; 1 Tim. ii. 6; Tit. ii. 14. Man had no claim on God. He could not compel him to provide a plan of salvation; and the whole arrangement, the selection of the Saviour, the sending him into the world, and all the benefits resulting from his work, are all an undeserved gift to man. 2. This is a gift unspeakably great, whose value no language can express, no heart fully conceive. It is so because, 1st. Of his own greatness and glory. 2nd. Because of the inexpressible love which he evinced. 3rd. Because of the unutterable sufferings which he endured. 4th. Because of the inexpressibly great benefits which result from his work. No language can do justice to this work in either of these respects; no heart in this world fully conceives the obligation which rests upon man in virtue of his work. 3. Thanks should be rendered to God for this. We owe him our highest praises for this. This appears, 1st. Because it was mere benevolence in God. We had no claim; we could not compel him to grant us a Saviour. The gift might have been withheld, and his throne would have been spotless. We owe no thanks where we have a claim; where we deserve nothing, then he who benefits us has a claim on our thanks. 2nd. Because of the benefits which we have received from him. Who can express this? All our peace and hope, all our comfort and joy in this life, all our prospect of pardon and salvation, all the offers of eternal glory are to be traced to him. Man has no prospect of being happy when he dies but in virtue of the "unspeakable gift" of God. And when he thinks of his sins, which may now be freely pardoned; when he thinks of an agitated and troubled conscience, which may now be at peace; when he thinks of his soul, which may now be unspeakably and eternally happy; when he thinks of the hell from which he is delivered, and of the heaven to whose eternal glories he may now be raised up by the gift of a Saviour, his heart should overflow with gratitude, and the language should be continually on his lips and in his heart, "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." Every other mercy should seem small compared with this; and every manifestation of right feeling in the heart should lead us to contemplate the source of it, and to feel, as Paul did, that all is to be traced to the unspeakable gift of God.—A. B.]

CHAPTER X.

There was no place in which the apostle Paul met with more opposition from false apostles than at Corinth; he had many enemies there. Let not any of the ministers of Christ think it strange if they meet with perils, not only from enemies, but from false brethren, for blessed Paul himself did so. Though he was so blameless and inoffensive in all his carriage, so condescending and useful to all, yet there were those that bore him ill-will, that envied him, and did all they could to undermine him, and lessen his interest and reputation; therefore he vindicated himself from their imputations, and armeth the Corinthians against their insinuations. In this chapter the apostle, in a mild and humble manner, asserteth the power of his preaching, and to punish offenders, ver. 1-6. He then proceedeth to reason the case with the Corinthians, asserting his relation to Christ, and his authority as an apostle of Christ, ver. 7-11; and refuseth to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false teachers did, but according to better rules he had fixed for himself, ver. 12-18.

x. 13. "Without measure:" there is no measure or standard for the man who measures himself by himself. "To reach:" "that we should reach as far as even you." St. Paul's measure was one which God had appointed.

x. 15. "Our success in your case will give us an important step towards further progress beyond you, according to our divinely-assigned apportionment of the area or sphere of our work."

xi. 1. Through fear for the Corinthians, who were disposed to lend OW I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you: 2 But I beseech you, that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think to be bold against some, which think of us as if we walked according to the flesh. 3 For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh: 4 (For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds;) 5 Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ; 6 And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

Here we may observe,

First. The mild and humble manner in which the blessed apostle addresseth the Corinthians, and how desirous he is that no occasion might be given him to use severity.

1. He addresseth them in a very mild and humble manner: "I, Paul, myself beseech you," ver. 1. We find in the introduction to this epistle he joined Timothy with himself, but now he speaketh only for himself, against whom the false apostles had particularly levelled their reproaches; yet in the midst of the greatest provocations he shewed humility and mildness, from the consideration of the "meekness and gentleness of Christ," and desireth this great example might have the same influence on the Corinthians. Note, When we find ourselves tempted, or inclined to be rough and severe towards anybody, we should think on the meekness and gentleness of Christ, that appeared in him in the days of his flesh, in the design of his undertaking, and in all the acts of his grace towards poor souls. How humbly also doth this great apostle speak of himself, as one "in presence base among them!" So his enemies spake of him with contempt, and this he seemeth to acknowledge; whilst others thought meanly and spake scornfully of him, he had low thoughts of himself, and spake humbly of himself. Note, We should be sensible of our own infirmities, and think humbly of ourselves, even when men reproach us for them.

2. He is desirous that no occasion might be given to use severity, ver. 2. He beseecheth them to give no occasion for him to be bold, or exercise his authority against them in general, as he had resolved to do against some that unjustly charged him as "walking according to the flesh;" that is, of regulating his conduct, even in his ministerial actings, according to carnal policy, or with worldly views. This was what the apostle had renounced, and this is contrary to the spirit and design of the Gospel, and was far from being the aim and design of the apostle. Hereupon, Secondly. He asserteth the power of his preaching, and to punish offenders.

1. The power of his preaching, ver. 3-5. Where observe, 1st. The work of the ministry is a warfare, not after the flesh indeed, for it is a spiritual warfare, with spiritual enemies, and for spiritual purposes. And though ministers do walk in the flesh, or live in the body, and in the common affairs of life do act as other men, yet in their work and warfare they must not go by the maxims of the flesh, nor should they design to please the flesh. That must be crucified with its affections and lusts; it must be mortified and kept under. 2nd. The doctrines of the Gospel and discipline of the church are the weapons of this warfare, and these are not carnal. Outward force therefore is not the method of the Gospel, but strong persuasion by the power of truth and the meekness of wisdom. A good argument this is against persecution for conscience' sake. Conscience is accountable to God only; and people must be persuaded to God and their duty, not driven by force of arms. And so the weapons of our warfare are mighty, or very powerful: the evidence of truth is convincing and cogent. This indeed is through God, or owing unto him, because they are his institutions, and accompanied with his blessing, which maketh all opposition to fall before his victorious Gospel. Where we may observe, First. What opposition is made against the Gospel by the powers of sin and Satan in the hearts of men. Ignorance, prejudices, beloved lusts, are Satan's strongholds in the souls of some; vain imaginations, carnal reasonings, and high thoughts or proud conceits in others, do exalt themselves "against the knowledge of God;" that is, by these ways the devil endeavours to keep men from faith and obedience to the Gospel, and secureth his possession of the hearts of men as his own house or property. But then observe, Secondly. The conquest which the word of God doth gain. These strong-holds are pulled down, by the Gospel as the means, through the grace and power of God accompanying it as the principal efficient cause. Note, The conversion of the soul is the conquest of Satan in that soul.

[All Christians and all Christian ministers are engaged in a warfare, ver. 3. They are at war with sin in their own hearts, and with sin wherever it exists on earth, and with the powers of darkness. With foes so numerous and so vigilant they should not expect to live a life of ease or quietness. Peace, perfect peace, they may expect in heaven, not on earth. Here they are to fight the good fight of faith, and thus to lay hold on eternal life. It has been the common lot of all the children of God to maintain such a war, and shall we expect to be exempt?

' Shall I be carried to the skies a more willing ear to false apostles than to himself, Paul is compelled to commend himself, and remind them of his disinterestedness, sufferings, and conflicts, in contrast to the self-seeking of his opponents. "Folly:" "The 'folly' by which the apostle describes the information concerning himself can only be taken in the sense of his opponents. The whole passage hereby acquires an ironical tinge, and a tendency towards reproach. Paul considers his readers as entering into the views of his antagonists, and thus entreats them to

Are there no foes for me to face;
Must I not stem the flood?
Is this vile world a friend to grace,
To help me on to God?—A. B.]

2. The apostle's power to punish offenders (and that in an extraordinary manner) is asserted in ver. 6. The apostle was a prime minister in the kingdom of Christ, and chief officer in his army, and had in readiness; that is, he had power and authority at hand "to revenge all disobedience," that is, to punish offenders in a most exemplary and extraordinary manner. The apostle speaketh not of personal revenge, but of punishing disobedience to the Gospel, and disorderly walking among church members, by inflicting church censures. Note, Though the apostle shewed meekness and gentleness, yet he would not betray his authority; and therefore intimateth that when he would commend them whose obedience was fulfilled or manifested, others would fall under severe censures.

7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's. 8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed: 9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters. 10 For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible. 11 Let such an one think this, that, such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present.

In these verses the apostle proceedeth to reason the case with the Corinthians, in opposition to those who despised him, judged him, and spoke hardly of him. "Do ye," saith he, "look on things after the outward appearance?" ver. 7. Is this a fit measure or rule to make an estimate of things or persons by, and to judge between me and my adversaries? In outward appearance Paul was mean and despicable with some, he did not make a figure as perhaps some of his competitors might do; but this was a false rule to judge by. It should seem that some boasted mighty things of themselves, and made a fair show, but there are false appearances many times. A man may seem to be learned that hath not learned Christ, and appear virtuous that hath not a principle of grace in his heart. However, the apostle asserteth two things of himself:

First. His relation to Christ. "If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's," ver. 7. It should seem by this that Paul's adversaries boasted of their relation to Christ as his ministers and servants. Now the apostle reasoneth thus with the Corinthians: Suppose it to be so, allowing what they say to be true,—and let us observe that, in fair arguing, we should allow all that may be reasonably granted; and should not think it impossible but those who differ from us very much may yet belong to Christ, as well as we,—allowing them (might the apostle say) what they boast of, yet they ought also to allow this to us, that we also are Christ's. Note, 1. We must not, by the most charitable allowances we make to others that differ from us, cut ourselves off from Christ, or deny our relation to him. For, 2. There is room in Christ for many, and those that differ much from one another may yet be one in him. And it would go to heal the differences that are among Christians if they would remember that, how confident soever we may be that we belong to Christ, yet at the same time we must allow that they who differ from us may belong to Christ too, and therefore should be treated accordingly. We must not think we are the people, and that none belong to Christ but us. This we may plead for ourselves against those that judge us, and despise us, that how weak soever we are, yet as they are Christ's so are we; we profess the same faith, we walk by the same rule, we build upon the same foundation, and hope for the same inheritance.

Secondly. His authority from Christ as an apostle. This he had mentioned before, ver. 6; and now he tells them he might speak of it again, and that with some sort of boasting, seeing it was a truth that the Lord had given it to him, and it was more than his adversaries could justly pretend to; it was, to be sure, what he should not be ashamed of, ver. 8. Concerning which, observe, 1. The nature of his authority; it was for "edification, and not for destruction." This indeed is the end of all authority, civil and ecclesiastical, and was the end of that extraordinary authority which the apostles had, and of all church discipline. 2. The caution with which he speaketh of his authority, professing his design was not to terrify them with big words, nor by angry letters, ver. 9. Thus he seemeth to obviate an objection that might have been formed against him, ver. 10. But the apostle declareth he did not intend to frighten them that were obedient, nor did he write anything in his letters that he was not able to make good by deeds against the disobedient; and he would have his adversaries know this, ver. 11, that he would by the exercise of his apostolical power committed to him make it appear to have a real efficacy.

12 For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise. 13 But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you. 14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ: 15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly, 16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand. 17 But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord. 18 For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

First. [They had accused him of a want of boldness and energy when present with them, ver. 1, 10. Here, in a strain of severe but delicate irony, he says he was not bold enough to do things which they had done. He did not dare to do the things which had been done among them. To such boldness of character, present or absent, he could lay no claim. "Or compare ourselves," &c. I am not bold enough for that. That requires a stretch of boldness and energy to which I can lay no claim.—A. B.] The apostle refuseth to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false apostles did, ver. 12. He plainly intimateth they took a wrong method to commend themselves in "measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, which is not wise." They were pleased, and did pride themselves in their own attainments, and never considered those that far exceeded them in gifts and graces, in power and authority; and this made them haughty and insolent. Note, If we would compare ourselves with others that do excel us, this would be a good method to keep us humble; we should be pleased and thankful for what we have of gifts or graces, but never pride ourselves therein, as if there were none to be compared with us, or that do excel us. The apostle would not be of the number of such vain men; let us resolve we will not make ourselves of that number.

Secondly. He fixeth a better rule for his conduct; namely, "not to boast of things without his measure," which was the measure God had distributed to him, ver. 13. His meaning is either that he would not boast of more gifts or graces, or power and authority, than God had really bestowed on him; or, rather that he would not act beyond his commission as to persons or things, nor go beyond the line prescribed to him, which he plainly intimateth the false apostles did, while they boasted of "other men's labours." The apostle's resolution was to keep within his own province, and that compass of ground which God had marked out for him. His commission as an apostle was to preach the Gospel every where, especially among the Gentiles, and he was not confined to one place; yet he observed the directions of providence and the Holy Spirit as to the particular places whither he went, or where he did abide.

Thirdly. He acted according to this rule: "We stretch not ourselves beyond our measure," ver. 14. And particularly he acted according to this rule in preaching at Corinth, and in the exercise of his apostolical authority there. For he came thither by Divine direction, and there he converted many to Christianity; and, therefore, in boasting of them as his charge, he acted not contrary to his rule, he boasted not of "other men's labours," ver. 15.

Fourthly. He declareth his success in observing this rule. His hope was that their faith was increased, and that others beyond them, even in the remoter parts of Achaia, would embrace the Gospel also; and in all this he exceeded not his commission, nor acted in "another man's line."

Fifthly. He seemeth to check himself in this matter, as if he had spoken too much in his own praise. The unjust accusations and reflections of his enemies had made it needful he should justify himself; and the wrong methods they took gave him good occasion to mention the better rule he had observed; yet he is afraid of boasting, or taking any praise to himself, and therefore he mentioneth two things which ought to be regarded; namely, 1. That "he that glorieth should glory in the Lord," ver. 17. If we are able to fix good rules for our conduct, or act by them, or have any good success in so doing, the praise and glory of all is owing unto God. Ministers in particular must be careful not to glory in their performances, but must give God the glory of their work, and the success thereof.

[On this verse we may here remark, 1. That nothing is more common than for men to boast or glory. 2. The things of which they boast are very various. (1.) Many are proud of their personal beauty, many too, who would be unwilling to be thought proud of it. (2.) Many glory in their accomplishments; or, what is more likely, in the accomplishments of their children. (3.) Many glory in their talents; talents for any thing, valuable or not, in which they suppose they surpass others. (4.) Many glory in their property; in fine houses, extended plantations, or in the reputation of being rich; or in gorgeous dress, equipage, and furniture. In short, there is nothing which men possess in which they are not prone to glory. 3. If we glory, it should be in the Lord. We should ascribe our talents, wealth, health, strength, salvation, to him. We should rejoice, (1.) That we have such a Lord—so glorious, so full of mercy, so powerful, so worthy of confidence and love. (2.) We should rejoice in our endowments and possessions as his gift. We should rejoice that we may come and lay every thing at his feet; and whatever may be our rank, or talents, or learning, we should rejoice that we may come with the humblest child of poverty, and sorrow, and want, and say, "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake," Ps. cxv. 1.—A. B.]

2. That "not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth," ver. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst; and self-applause is seldom any better than self-flattery and self-deceit. At the best, self-commendation is no praise, it is oftentimes as foolish and vain as it is proud; therefore, instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

[What a reverse of judgment there will yet be on human character! How many now commend themselves who will be condemned in the last day! How many men boast of their talents and morals, and even their religion, who will then be involved in indiscriminate condemnation with the most vile and worthless of the race! How anxious should we be, therefore, to secure the approbation of God! and, whatever our fellow-men may say of us, how infinitely desirable is it to be commended then by our heavenly Father!—A. B.] one would be really without excuse. But if they received another teacher, how much more should they receive Paul, who "was not one whit," &c. ? (verse 5).

xi. 9. See Phil. iv. 15, 16.

xi. 16. "Again:" referring to verse 1; resuming and enlarging on the request there made.

xi. 20. "That such violence might literally be expected from the rulers of the early Christian society is also implied in 1 Tim. iii. 3;

In this chapter the apostle goes on with his discourse in opposition to the false apostles that were very industrious to lessen his interest and reputation among the Corinthians, and had prevailed too much by their insinuations. First, he apologiseth for his going about to commend himself, and giveth the reason for what he did, ver. 1—4. Afterwards he mentioneth, in his own necessary vindication, his equality with the other apostles, and with the false apostles, in this particular of preaching the Gospel to the Corinthians freely, without wages, ver. 5—15. Then he maketh another preface to what he was about farther to say in his own justification, ver. 16—21. And afterwards giveth a large account of his qualifications, labours, and sufferings, in which he exceeded the false prophets, ver. 22—33.

WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly: and indeed bear with me. 2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. 3 But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. 4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or another gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

Here we may observe,
First. The apology the apostle maketh for going about to commend himself. He is loth to enter upon this subject of self-commendation. "Would to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly," ver. 1. He calleth this folly, because too often it is really no better. In his case it was necessary; yet seeing others might apprehend it to be folly in him, he desireth them to bear with it. Note, As much against the grain as it is with a proud man to acknowledge his infirmities, so much is it against the grain with an humble man to speak in his own praise. It is no pleasure to a good man to speak well of himself, yet in some cases it is lawful; namely, when it is for the advantage of others, or for our own necessary vindication, as thus it was here. For,

Secondly. We have the reasons for what the apostle did; namely, 1. To preserve the Corinthians from being corrupted by the insinuations of the false apostles, ver. 2, 3. He tells them he was "jealous over them with godly jealousy;" that is, he was afraid lest their faith should be weakened by hearkening to such suggestions as tended to lessen their regard to his ministry, by which they were brought to the Christian faith. He had espoused them to one husband, that is, converted them to Christianity; and the conversion of a soul is its marriage to the Lord Jesus; and he was desirous to "present them as a chaste virgin;" that is, pure, and spotless, and faithful, not having their minds corrupted with false doctrines, by false teachers; so as Eve was beguiled by the subtilty of the serpent. This godly jealousy in the apostle was a mixture of love and fear; and faithful ministers cannot but be afraid and concerned for their people, lest they should lose that which they have received, and turn from what they have embraced, especially when deceivers are gone abroad, or have crept in among them.

[There is great danger of being corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. Satan desires to destroy us; and his great object is readily accomplished if he can seduce Christians from simple devotedness to the Redeemer; if he can secure corruption in doctrine, or in the manner of worship, and can produce conformity in dress and in the style of living to this world. Formerly, he excited persecution; but in that he was foiled. The more the church was persecuted, the more it grew. Then he changed his ground. What he could not do by persecution he sought to do by corrupting the church; and in this he has been by far more successful. This can be done slowly, but certainly; effectually, but without exciting suspicion. And it matters not to Satan whether the church is crippled by persecution, or its zeal destroyed by false doctrine, and by conformity to the world. His aim is secured, and the power of the church destroyed. The form in which he now assails the church is by attempting to seduce it from simple and hearty attachment to the Saviour. And, O, in how many instances is he successful!—A. B.]

2. To vindicate himself against the false apostles, forasmuch as they could not pretend they had another Jesus, or another Spirit, or another gospel, to preach to them, ver. 4. If this had been the case there would have been some colour of reason to bear with them, or to hearken to them; but seeing there is but one Jesus, one Spirit, and one Gospel, that is, or at least that ought to be, preached to them, and received by them, what reason could there be why the Corinthians should be prejudiced against him, who first converted them to the faith, by the artifices of any adversary? It was a just occasion of jealousy that such persons designed to preach "another Jesus, another Spirit, and another gospel."

5 For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. 6 But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things. 7 Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you

Titus i. 7. Even so late as the seventh century, the Council of Braga, A.D. 675, orders that no bishop at his will and pleasure shall strike his clergy, lest he lose the respect which they owe him" (Stanley).

xi. 32. "Governor:" prefect stationed there by the Arabian king. Damascus was in a Roman province; but at this time Aretas had got possession of it, on the death of the emperor and consequent interruption of Vitellius's operations, who had been sent against Aretas.

xii. 1. "Truly it is not to my advantage to glory; for I will come the gospel of God freely? 8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service. 9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself. 10 As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia. 11 Wherefore? because I love you not? God knoweth. 12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we. 13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. 14 And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. 15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works.

After the foregoing preface to what he was about to say, the apostle in these verses mentioneth.

First. His equality with the other apostles, that he was "not a whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles," ver. 5. This he expresseth very modestly, "I suppose so," and he might have spoken very positively. The apostleship, as an office, was equal in all the apostles; but the apostles, like other Christians, did differ one from another. These stars differed one from another in glory, and Paul was indeed of the first magnitude; yet he speaketh modestly of himself, and humbly owneth his personal infirmity, that he was "rude in speech;" that is, he had not such a graceful delivery as some other might have. Some think that he was a man of a very low stature, his voice was answerably small; others think he might have had some impediment in his speech, perhaps a stammering tongue. However, he was not rude in knowledge, he was not unacquainted with the best rules of oratory and art of persuasion, much less was he ignorant of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, as had been thoroughly manifested among them.

Secondly. His equality with the false apostles in this particular, the preaching the Gospel unto them freely, without wages. This the apostle largely insisteth on, and sheweth that as they could not but own him to be a minister of Christ, so they ought to acknowledge he had been a good friend to them. For,

1. He had preached the Gospel to them freely, ver. 7-10. He had proved at large, in his former epistle to them, the lawfulness of ministers receiving maintenance from the people, and the duty of the people to give them an honourable maintenance; and here he saith he himself had taken wages of other churches, ver. 8, so that he had a right to have asked and received from them; yet he waived his right, and chose rather to abase himself, by working with his hands, in the trade of tent-making, to maintain himself, than be burthensome to them, that they might be exalted, or encouraged to receive the Gospel, which they had so cheap; yea, he chose rather to be supplied from Macedonia than to be chargeable unto them.

2. He informeth them of the reason of this his conduct among them. And negatively,—it was not because he did not love them, ver. 11, or was unwilling to receive tokens of their love; for love and friendship is manifested by mutual giving and receiving. But positively,—it was to avoid offence, that he might "cut off occasion from them that desired occasion." He would not give occasion for any to accuse him of worldly designs in preaching the Gospel, or that he intended to make a trade of it to enrich himself; and that others who opposed him at Corinth might not in this respect gain an advantage against him; that wherein they gloried as to this matter, "they might be found even as he," ver. 12. It is not improbable to suppose that the chief of the false teachers at Corinth, or some among them, were rich, and taught (or deceived) the people freely, and might accuse the apostle, or his fellow-labourers, as mercenary men, that received hire or wages, and therefore the apostle kept to his resolution not to be chargeable to any of the Corinthians.

3. The false apostles are charged as "deceitful workers," ver. 13; and that upon this account, because they would transform themselves into the likeness of the apostles of Christ, and, though they were the ministers of Satan, would seem to be the ministers of righteousness. They would be as industrious and as generous in promoting error as the apostles were in preaching truth; they would endeavour as much to undermine the kingdom of Christ as the apostles did to establish it. There were counterfeit prophets under the Old Testament, that wore the garb, and learned the language, of the prophets of the Lord; so there were counterfeit apostles under the New Testament, that seemed in many respects like the true apostles of Christ. And no marvel, saith the apostle. Hypocrisy is a thing not to be much wondered at in this world, especially when we consider the great influence Satan hath upon the minds of many, who ruleth in the hearts of the children of disobedience; and as he can turn himself into any shape, and put on almost any form, and look sometimes like an angel of light, in order to promote his kingdom of darkness, so he will teach his ministers and instruments to do the same.

[The phrase, "An angel of light," means a pure and holy angel—light being the emblem of purity and holiness. Such are all the angels that dwell in heaven, and the idea is, that Satan assumes such a form as to appear to be such an angel. Learn here, 1. His power. He can assume such an aspect as he pleases. 2. His art. He is long practised in deceitful arts. For six thousand years he has been practising the art of delusion, and with him it is perfect. 3. We are not to suppose that all that appears to be piety is piety. Some of the most plausible appearances of piety are assumed by Satan and his ministers. 4. We are not to expect that Satan will appear to man to be as bad as he is. He never shews himself openly to be a spirit of pure wisdom—or black and abominable in his character; or full of evil, and hateful. He would thus defeat himself. It is for this reason that wicked men do not believe that there is such a being as Satan. Though continually under his influence, and "led captive by him at his will," yet they neither see him nor the chains which lead them, nor are they willing to believe in the existence of the one or the other.—A. B.]

But it followeth, their "end is according to their works," ver. 15; that is, the end will discover them to be "deceitful workers," and their work will end in ruin and destruction.

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little. 17 That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting. 18 Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also. 19 For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise. 20 For ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face. 21 I speak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak. Howbeit whereinsoever any is bold, (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also.

Here we have a farther excuse that the apostle maketh for what he was about to say in his own vindication.

First. He would not have them think he was guilty of folly in saying what he had said to vindicate himself; "Let no man think me a fool," ver. 16. Ordinarily indeed it is unbecoming a wise man to be much and often speaking in his own praise; boasting of ourselves is usually not only a sign of a proud mind, but a mark of folly also. However, saith the apostle, yet "as a fool receive me;" that is, if ye do count it folly in me to boast a little, yet give due regard to what I shall say.

Secondly. He mentioneth a caution, to prevent abuse of what he should say, telling them what he spake. He did not speak after the Lord, ver. 17; that is, he would not have them think that boasting of ourselves, or glorying in what we have, is a thing commanded by the Lord in general unto Christians, nor yet that this is always necessary in our own vindication; though it may be lawfully used, because not contrary to the Lord, when, strictly speaking, it is not after the Lord. It is the duty and practice of Christians, in obedience to the command and example of the Lord, rather to humble and abase themselves; yet prudence must direct in what circumstances it is needful to do that which we may do lawfully, even speak of what God hath wrought for us, and in us, an 1 by us too.

Thirdly. He giveth a good reason why they should suffer him to boast a little, namely, because they suffered others to do so who had less reason. "Seeing many glory after the flesh," that is, of carnal privileges, or outward advantages and attainments, "I will glory also," ver. 18; but he would not glory in those things, though he had as much, or more, reason than others to do so. But he gloried in his infirmities, as he tells them afterwards. The Corinthians thought themselves wise, and might think it an instance of wisdom to bear with the weakness of others, and therefore suffered others to do what might seem folly, therefore the apostle would have them bear with him. Or these words, "Ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise," ver. 19, may be ironical, and then the meaning is this, Notwithstanding all your wisdom, you willingly suffer yourselves to be brought into bondage under the Jewish yoke, or suffer others to tyrannize over you, nay, to devour you, or make a prey of you, and take of your hire for their own advantage, and to exalt themselves above you, and lord it over you, nay, even to "smite you on the face," or impose upon you to your very faces, ver. 20, upbraiding you whilst they reproach me, as if you had been very weak in shewing regard to me, ver. 21. And seeing this was the case, that the Corinthians, or some among them, could so easily bear all this from the false apostles, it was reasonable for the apostle to desire and expect they should bear with what might seem to them an indiscretion in him, seeing the circumstances of the case were such as made it needful, that "whereinsoever any were bold" he should be "bold also," ver. 21.

22 Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I. 23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. 24 Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. 25 Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; 26 In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; 27 In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. 28 Beside those to visions and revelations," &c. "For:" i.e., "I will show the disadvantage of boasting, by introducing instances whereby this may be seen." He then mentions revelations and visions, such as might seem to make boasting pardonable, but adds that a corrective to such boasting was given (verse 7). Another reading is, "I must needs boast, though it be not expedient;" the "for" introduced (as above) is proof of the inexpediency of boasting.

xii. 2. "I knew a man:" rather, "I know a man," meaning himself. "Fourteen years:" i.e., during the time of his stay at Tarsus (Acts ix. 30, xi. 25), or during his second visit (after his conversion) to Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 17). "Third heaven:" "no fixed division, but a high degree of celestial exaltation" (Alford).

xii. 5. "The principle which lies at the basis of the whole passage is, that he was not to boast of such revelations as though they argued anything in his own favour, but only as an incident connected with a man in Christ who had been at this period completely lifted out of his things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches. 29 Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not? 30 If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities. 31 The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not. 32 In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me: 33 And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

ROMAN LICTORS WITH FASCES.—VER. 25.

Here the apostle gives a large account of his own qualifications, labours, and sufferings; not out of pride or vainglory, but to the honour of God, who had enabled him to do and suffer so much for the cause of Christ, and wherein he excelled the false apostles, who would lessen his character and usefulness among the Corinthians. Observe,

First. He mentioneth the privileges of his birth, ver. 22, which were equal to any they could pretend to. He was "an Hebrew of the Hebrews," of a family among the Jews that never intermarried with the Gentiles; he was also an Israelite, and could boast of his being descended from the beloved Jacob, as well as they; and was also of the seed of Abraham, and not of the proselytes. It should seem from hence, that the false apostles were of the Jewish race, who gave disturbance to the Gentile converts.

Secondly. He maketh mention also of his apostleship, that he was more than an ordinary minister of Christ, ver. 23. God had counted him faithful, and had put him into the ministry; he had been a useful minister of Christ unto them; they had found full proofs of his ministry. "Are they ministers of Christ? I am more so."

Thirdly. He chiefly insisteth upon this, that he had been an extraordinary sufferer for Christ; and this is what he gloried in, or rather he gloried in the grace of God that had enabled him to be more abundant in labours, and to endure very great sufferings, such as "stripes above measure," frequent imprisonments, and often the dangers of death, ver. 23. Note, When the apostle would prove himself an extraordinary minister, he proveth he had been an extraordinary sufferer. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and for that reason was hated of the Jews. They did all they could against him, and among the Gentiles also he met with hard usage. Bonds and imprisonments were familiar to him; never was the most notorious malefactor more frequently in the hands of public justice than Paul was for righteousness' sake. The jail and the whipping-post, and all other hard usages of those that are accounted the worst of men, were what he was accustomed to. As to the Jews, whenever he fell into their hands they never spared him. Five times he fell under their lash, and received "forty stripes, save one," ver. 24. Forty stripes were the utmost their law allowed, Deu. xxv. 3; but it was usual with them, that they might not exceed, to abate one, at least, of that number; and to have the abatement of one only was all the favour that ever Paul received from them. The Gentiles were not tied up to that moderation, and among them he was "thrice beaten with rods," of which we may suppose once was at Philippi, Acts xvi. 22; "once he was stoned" in a popular tumult, and was taken up for dead, Acts xiv. 19; he saith, that "thrice he suffered shipwreck," and we may believe him, though the sacred history giveth a relation but of one; "a night and a day he had been in the deep," ver. 25, that is, in some deep dungeon or other, shut up as a prisoner. Thus he was all his days a constant confessor; perhaps scarce a year of his life, after his conversion, passed without suffering some hardships or other for his religion. Yet this was not all, for wherever he went, he went in perils; he was exposed to perils of all sorts. If he journeyed by land, or voyaged by sea, he was in perils of robbers, or enemies of some sort; the Jews, his own countrymen, sought to kill him, or do him a mischief; the heathen, to whom he was sent, were not more kind to him, for among them he was in peril. If he was in the city, or in the wilderness, still he was in peril. He was in peril not only amongst avowed enemies but among them also that called themselves brethren, but were "false brethren," ver. 26. Besides all this, he had great "weariness and painfulness" in his ministerial labours; and these are things that will come into account shortly, and people will be reckoned with for all the care and pains of their ministers concerning them. Paul was a stranger to wealth and plenty, power and pleasure, preferment and ease; he was "in watchings often," and exposed to "hunger and thirst;" and "fastings often," it may be out of necessity; and endured "cold and nakedness," ver. 27. Thus was he, who was one of the greatest blessings of the age, used as if he had been the burthen of the earth, and the plague of his generation. And yet this is not all, for, as an apostle, the "care of all the churches" lay on him, ver. 28. He mentions this last as if this lay the heaviest upon him, and as if he could better bear all the persecutions of his enemies than the scandals that were to be found in the churches he had the oversight of; "Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?" ver. 29. There was not a weak Christian that he did not sympathise with, nor any one scandalized but he was affected therewith. See what little reason we have to be in love with the pomp and plenty of this world, when this blessed apostle, one of the best of men that ever lived, excepting Jesus Christ, felt so much hardship in it. Nor was he ashamed of all this, but, on the contrary, it was what he accounted his honour; and therefore, as much against the grain as it was with him to glory, yet, saith he, "if I must needs glory," if my adversaries will oblige me to it in my own necessary vindication, I will glory in these my infirmities, ver. 30. Note, Sufferings for righteousness' sake will the most of any thing redound to our honour.

In the two last verses he mentioneth one particular part of his sufferings out of its place, as if he had forgotten it before, or because the deliverance God wrought for him was most remarkable, namely, the danger he was in at Damascus, soon after he was converted, and not settled in Christianity, at least in the ministry and apostleship. This is recorded, Acts ix. 24, 25. This was his first great danger and difficulty, and the rest of his life was of a piece with that. And it is observable that, lest it should be thought he spake more than was true, the apostle confirmeth this narrative with a solemn oath, or appeal to the omniscience of God, ver. 31. And it is a great comfort to a good man that "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," who is an omniscient God, doth know the truth of all he saith, and knoweth all he doth, and all he suffereth for his sake.

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter the apostle proceedeth in maintaining the honour of his apostleship. He magnified his office, when there were those that vilified it. What he saith in his own praise was only in his own justification, and the necessary defence of the honour of his ministry, the preservation of which was necessary to the success thereof. First, he maketh mention of the favour God had shewn him, and the honour done him, and the methods God took to keep him humble, and the use he made of this dispensation, ver. 1—10. Then he addresseth himself to the Corinthians, blaming them for what was faulty among them, and giving a large account of his behaviour and kind intentions towards them, ver. 11—21.

It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory. I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord. 2 I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) such an one caught up to the third heaven. 3 And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) 4 How that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. 5 Of such an one will I glory: yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities. 6 For though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool; for I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me. 7 And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure. 8 For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. 9 And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may own individuality, and had been thought worthy of such grace merely on account of his being in Christ" (Kling).

xii. 7. "A thorn:" the word also signifies a stake. A painful bodily infirmity is meant.

xii. 16. A possible insinuation of his opponents is here anticipated. "Be it so that you were not burdensome: this was only a deep, crafty scheme to catch us." To this he replies by pointing out the disinterestedness of his associates as well as of himself.

xiii. 1. "Third time:" there seems little doubt, from this place and chap. xii. 14, that Paul had already paid two visits to the Corinthians, of one only of which we have any account. The second most probably was a short one, paid during the beginning of the second year of his residence at Ephesus. He will institute impartial but strict investigations when he visits them.

rest upon me. 10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

["I will come;" marg., "For I will." Our translators have omitted the word γάρ, "for," in the text, evidently supposing that it is a mere expletive. Doddridge renders it, "nevertheless." But it seems to me that it contains an important sense, and that it should be rendered by 'then.' 'Since it is not fit that I should glory, then I will refer to visions,' &c. 'I will turn away, then, from that subject, and come to another.' Thus the word γάρ is used in Jno. vii. 41, "Shall, then, (μή γάρ) Christ come out of Galilee?" Acts viii. 31, "How can I, then, (πῶς γάρ) except some man should guide me?" See also Acts xix. 35; Rom. iii. 3; Phil. i. 18.—A. B.]

Here we may observe, First. The narrative the apostle giveth of the favours God had shewn him, and the honour he had done him; for doubtless he is the man in Christ of whom he speaketh. And concerning this we may take notice,

1. Of the honour itself which was done to the apostle, namely, he was "caught up into the third heaven," ver. 2. When this was we cannot say, whether it was during those three days that he lay without sight, at his conversion, or at some other time afterwards; much less can we pretend to say how this was, whether by a separation of his soul from his body, or by an extraordinary transport in the depth of contemplation. It would be presumption for us to determine, if not also to inquire, into this matter, seeing the apostle himself saith, "Whether in the body, or out of the body," he could not tell. It was certainly a very extraordinary honour done him; in some sense he was caught up into the third heaven, that is, the heaven of the blessed, above the aerial heavens, in which the fowls fly,—above the starry heavens, which is adorned with those glorious orbs. It was into the third heaven, where God doth most eminently manifest his glory. We are not capable of knowing all, nor is it fit we should know very much of the particulars of that glorious place and state; it is our duty and interest to give diligence to make sure to ourselves a mansion there; and, if that be cleared up to us, then we should long to be removed thither to abide there for ever. This third heaven is called, "Paradise," ver. 4, in allusion to the earthly Paradise, out of which Adam was driven for his transgression. It is called the Paradise of God, Rev. ii. 7, signifying to us that by Christ we are restored to all the joys and honours we lost by sin, yea, unto much better. The apostle doth not mention what he saw in the third heaven or Paradise, but tells us he "heard unspeakable words," such as it is not possible for a man to utter—such is the sublimeness of the matter, and our unacquaintance with the language of the upper world. Nor was it lawful to utter those words, because while we are here in this world we have a more sure word of prophecy than such visions and revelations, 2 Pet. i. 19. We read of the "tongues of angels" as well as of men, and Paul knew as much of that as ever any man upon earth did, and yet preferred charity before it, that is, the sincere love of God and our neighbour. This account, which the apostle giveth us of his vision, should check our curious desires after forbidden knowledge, and teach us to improve the revelation God hath given us in his word. Paul himself, who had been in the third heaven, did not publish to the world what he had heard there, but adhered to the doctrine of Christ. On that foundation the church is built, and on that we must build our faith and hope.

[The transaction here referred to is very remarkable. It is the only instance in the Scriptures of anyone who was taken to heaven, either in reality or in vision, and who returned again to the earth, and was then qualified to communicate important truths about the heavenly world from personal observation. Of all the millions who have been taken to heaven, not one has been permitted to return to bear his testimony to its glories; to witness for God that he is faithful to his promises; to encourage his pious friends to persevere; or to invite his impenitent friends to follow him to that glorious world. And so fixed is the law, so settled is the principle, that even Lazarus was not permitted to go, though at the earnest request of the rich man in hell, and warn his friends not to follow him to that world of woe, Lu. xvi. 27–31. Mohammed, indeed, feigned that he had made a journey to heaven, and he attempts to describe what he saw, and the difference between true inspiration and false or pretended inspiration is strikingly evinced by the difference between Paul's dignified silence—verba sacro digna silentio (Horace)—and the puerilities of the prophet of Mecca: see the Koran, ch. xvii. The fact that Paul was not permitted to communicate what he had seen is very remarkable. It is natural to ask why it is so? I would, therefore, suggest that the following may have been some of the reasons why Paul was not permitted to communicate what he saw to men: 1. It was designed for the support of Paul himself, in view of the very remarkable trials which he was about to endure. 2. It is probable that if there were a full revelation of the glories of heaven, we should not be able to comprehend it; or, even if we did, we should be incredulous in regard to it. 3. There are great truths which it is not the design of God to reveal to men. The object is to communicate enough to win us, to comfort us, to support our faith—not to reveal all. 4. One other reason may be assigned why it was not proper for Paul to disclose what he saw, and why God has withheld more full revelations from men about heaven. It is, that his purpose is that we shall here walk by faith and not by sight. As it is, there is enough to support and comfort, not enough to make it the main and only reason why we serve God. It may be added, (1.) That we have all the truth which we shall ever have about heaven here below. No other messenger will come, none of the pious dead will return. If men, therefore, are not willing to be saved in view of the truth which they have, they must be lost. God will communicate no more. (2.) The Christian will soon know all about heaven. He will soon be there. He begins no day with any certainty that he may not close it in heaven; he lies down to rest at no time with any assurance that he will not wake in heaven, amidst its full and eternal splendours. (3.) The sinner will soon know fully what it is to lose heaven. A moment may make him fully sensible of his loss—for he may die; and a moment may put him for ever beyond the possibility of reaching a world of glory.—A. B.]

2. The modest and humble manner in which the apostle mentioneth this matter is observable. One would be apt to think that one who had had such visions and revelations as these would have boasted greatly of them; but, saith he, "It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory," ver. 1. He therefore did not mention this immediately, not till "above fourteen years" after, ver. 2; and then it is not without some reluctance, as a thing which in a manner he was forced to, by the necessity of the case. Again, he speaketh of himself in the third person, and doth not say, I am the man that was thus honoured above other men. Again, his humility appeareth by εἰ check he seemeth to put upon himself in ver. 6, which plainly sheweth he delighted not to dwell upon this theme. Thus was he, who was not behind the chiefest of the apostles in dignity, very eminent for his humility. Note, It is an excellent thing to have a lowly spirit in the midst of high advancements, and those that abase themselves shall be exalted.

xiii. 7. "Reprobates:" unapproved, deprived of the occasion of exercising apostolic power. "We pray for your good, even if that tend to the non-exercise, and so depreciation, of our apostolic power."

Additional Notes.—Chap. i. 12. "For:" vindication of himself as not unworthy of their sympathy and prayers, alluding to those who accused him of dishonesty and inconsistency.

i. 13. Alford paraphrases, "My character in my writings is one and the same, not fickle and changing, but such as past facts have

Secondly. The apostle giveth an account of the methods God took to keep him humble, and to prevent his being lifted up above measure, and this he speaketh of to balance the account that was given before of the visions and revelations he had had. Note, When God's people communicate their experiences, let them always remember to take notice of what God hath done to keep them humble, as well as of what he hath done in favour to them and for their advancement. Here observe,

1. The apostle was pained with a "thorn in the flesh," and buffeted with "a messenger of Satan," ver. 7. We are much in the dark what this was, whether some great trouble or some great temptation. Some think it was an acute bodily pain or sickness; others think it was the indignities done him by the false apostles, and the opposition he met with from them, particularly on the account of his speech, which was contemptible. However this was, God oftentimes bringeth this good out of evil, that the reproaches of our enemies help to hide pride from us; and this is certain, what the apostle calleth a thorn in his flesh was for a time very grievous to him. But the thorns Christ wore for us, and with which he was crowned, do sanctify and make easy all the thorns in the flesh we may at any time be afflicted with; for he suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour them that are tempted. Temptations to sin are most grievous thorns; they are messengers of Satan to buffet us. Indeed it is a great grievance to a good man to be so much as tempted to sin. (See upon Gal. iv. 14.)

2. The design of this was to keep the apostle humble, lest he "should be exalted above measure," ver. 7. Paul himself knew he had not yet attained, neither was already perfect, and yet he was in danger of being lifted up with pride. If God love us, he will hide pride from us, and keep us from being exalted above measure; and spiritual burthens are ordered, to cure spiritual pride. This thorn in the flesh is said to be a messenger of Satan, which he did not send with a good design, but, on the contrary, with ill intentions, to discourage the apostle, who had been so highly favoured of God, and hinder him in his work. But God designed this for good, and he overruled it for good, and made this messenger of Satan to be so far from being a hindrance that it was a help to the apostle.

3. The apostle prayed earnestly to God for the removal of this sore grievance. Note, Prayer is a salve for every sore, a remedy for every malady; and when we are afflicted with thorns in the flesh we should give ourselves to prayer; therefore we are sometimes tempted that we may learn to pray. The apostle "besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from him," ver. 8. Note, Though afflictions are sent for our spiritual benefit, yet we may pray to God for the removal of them. We ought, indeed, to desire also that they may reach the end for which they are designed. The apostle prayed earnestly, and repeated his requests, he besought the Lord thrice, that is, often; so that if an answer be not given to the first prayer, nor to the second, we must hold on, and hold out, till we receive an answer. Christ himself prayed to his Father thrice. As troubles are sent to teach us to pray, so they are continued to teach us to continue instant in prayer.

4. We have an account of the answer given to the apostle's prayer, that, although the trouble was not removed, yet an equivalent should be granted: "My grace is sufficient for thee." Note, 1st. Though God accepteth the prayer of faith, yet he doth not always answer it in the letter; as he sometimes granteth in wrath, so he sometimes denieth in love. 2nd. That when God doth not remove our troubles and temptations, yet, if he give us grace sufficient for us, we have no reason to complain, or to say he dealeth ill by us. It is a great comfort to us, whatever thorns in the flesh we are pained with, God's grace is sufficient for us. Grace signifieth two things, First. The good-will of God towards us, and that is enough to enlighten and enliven us, sufficient to strengthen and comfort us, to support our souls and cheer up our spirits, in all afflictions and distresses. Secondly. The good work of God in us, the grace we receive from the fulness that is in Christ our head, and from him there shall be communicated that which is suitable and seasonable, and sufficient for his members. Christ Jesus understands our case, and knows our need, and will proportion the remedy to our malady, and not only strengthen us, but glorify himself. His strength is made perfect in our weakness. Thus his grace is manifested and magnified; he ordaineth his praise out of the mouths of babes and sucklings.

Thirdly. Here is the use which the apostle maketh of this dispensation, namely, he glorieth in his infirmities, ver. 9, and took pleasure in them, ver. 10. He doth not mean his sinful infirmities—those we have reason to be ashamed of and grieved at—but he meaneth his afflictions, his "reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses for Christ's sake," ver. 10. And the reason of his glory and joy on account of these things was this, they were fair opportunities for Christ to manifest the power and sufficiency of his grace resting upon him, by which he had so much experience of the strength of Divine grace that he could say, "When I am weak, then am I strong." This is a Christian paradox: when we are weak in ourselves, then we are strong in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; when we see ourselves weak in ourselves, then we go out of ourselves to Christ, and are qualified to receive strength from him, and experience most of the supplies of Divine strength and grace.

11 I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. 12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds. 13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong. 14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not your's, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. 15 And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved. 16 But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, substantiated it to be, and as I hope future facts to the end of my life will continue to do."

i. 17. "Lightness:" i.e., levity, or caprice of purpose; St. Paul meeting the charge of feebleness or caprice. "Did I change my purpose simply from caprice? Do I purpose, as a fickle, worldly man, saying different things at the same time?"

i. 19. The doctrine could not be changeable which concerned Him who is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

being crafty, I caught you with guile. 17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you? 18 I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps? 19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying. 20 For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults: 21 And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed.

In these verses the apostle addresseth himself to the Corinthians two ways: First. He blameth them for what was faulty in them, namely, that they had not stood up in his defence as they ought to have done, and so made it the more needful for him to insist so much on his own vindication. They in a manner compelled him to commend himself who "ought to have been commended" of them, ver. 11. And had they or some among them not failed on their part, it would have been less needful for him to have said so much on his own behalf; and he tells them farther, they in particular had good reason to speak well of him, as being "in nothing behind the very chiefest apostles," because he had given them full proof and evidence of his apostleship; for "the signs of an apostle were wrought among them in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds." Note, 1. It is a debt we owe to good men to stand up in the defence of their reputation; and we are under special obligations to those we have received benefit by, especially spiritual benefit, to own them as instruments, in God's hand, of good to us, and to vindicate them when they are calumniated by others. 2. How much soever we are or ought to be esteemed by others, we ought always to think humbly of ourselves. See an example of this in this great apostle, who thought himself to be nothing, though in truth he was not behind the chiefest apostles; so far was he from seeking praise from men, though he tells them their duty to vindicate his reputation; so far was he from applauding himself, when he was forced to insist upon his own necessary self-defence.

Secondly. He giveth a large account of his behaviour and kind intentions towards them, in which we may observe the character of a faithful minister of the Gospel.

1. He was not willing to be burthensome to them, nor did he seek theirs, but them. He saith, ver. 13, he had not been burthensome to them for the time past, and tells them, ver. 14, he would not be burthensome to them for the time to come, when he should come to them; he spared their purses, and did not covet their money: "I seek not yours, but you." He sought not to enrich himself, but to save their souls; he did not desire to make a property of them to himself, but to gain them over to Christ, whose servant he was. Note, Those who aim at clothing themselves with the fleece of the flock, and take no care of the sheep, are hirelings, and not good shepherds.

["For the children," &c. There is great delicacy and address in this sentiment. The meaning is, "It is not natural and usual for children to make provision for their parents. The common course of events and of duty is, for parents to make provision for their offspring. I, therefore, your spiritual father, choose to act in the same way. I make provision for your spiritual wants; I labour and toil for you as a father does for his children. I seek your welfare, as he does, by constant self-denial. In return, I do not ask you to provide for me, any more than a father ordinarily expects his children to provide for him. I am willing to labour, as he does, content with doing my duty, and promoting the welfare of those under me." The words rendered "ought not," ou ophetai, are to be understood in a comparative sense. Paul does not mean that a child ought never to provide for his parents, or to lay any thing up for a sick, a poor, and an infirm father, but that the duty of doing that was slight and unusual compared with the duty of a parent to provide for his children. The one was of comparatively rare occurrence—the other was constant, and was the ordinary course of duty. It is a matter of obligation for a child to provide for an aged and helpless parent, but commonly the duty is that of a parent to provide for his children. Paul felt like a father toward the church in Corinth; and he was willing, therefore, to labour for them without compensation.—A. B.]

2. He would gladly spend and be spent for them, ver. 15; that is, he was willing to take pains and to suffer loss for their good. He would spend his time, his parts, his strength, his interest, his all, to do them service; nay, so to spend as to be spent, and be like a candle, which consumeth itself to give light to others.

3. He did not abate in his love to them, notwithstanding their unkindness and ingratitude to him, and therefore was contented and glad to take pains with them, though the more abundantly he loved them the less he was loved, ver. 15. This is applicable to other relations; if others be wanting in their duty to us, it doth not follow, therefore, that we may neglect our duty to them.

4. He was careful not only that he himself should not be burthensome, but that none he employed should. This seemeth to be the meaning of what we read, ver. 16–18. If it should be objected by any that though he did not himself burthen them, yet that he, being crafty, caught them with guile, that is, he sent those among them that did pillage from them, and afterwards he shared with them in the profit; this was not so, saith the apostle, I did not make a gain of you myself, nor by any of them I sent, nor did Titus, nor any others; we walked by the same spirit and in the same steps. They all agreed in this matter, to do them all the good they could without being burthensome to them; to promote the Gospel among them, and make it as easy to them as possible. Or this may be read with an interrogation, as utterly disclaiming any guile in himself and others toward them.

5. He was a man that did all things for edifying, ver. 19. This was his great aim and design, to do good; to lay the foundation well, and then with care and diligence to build the superstructure.

6. He would not baulk his duty for fear of displeasing them, though he was so careful to make himself easy to them; therefore he was resolved to be faithful in reproving sin, though he was therein found to be such as they would not, ver. 20. The apostle here mentioned several sins that are too commonly found among professors of religion, and are very reprobable, "debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults;" and, though those who are guilty of these sins can hardly bear to be reproved for them, yet faithful ministers must not fear offending the guilty by sharp reproofs, as they are needful in public and in private.

7. He was grieved at the apprehension that he should find scandalous sins among them not duly repented of. This, he tells them, would be the cause of great humiliation and lamentation. Note, 1st. The falls and miscarriages of professors cannot but be an humbling consideration to a good minister; and God sometimes taketh this way to humble those who might be under temptation to be lifted up; "I fear lest my God will humble me among you." 2nd. We have reason to bewail those that sin and do not repent, to "bewail many that have sinned and have not repented," ver. 21. If these have not as yet grace to mourn and lament their own case, their case is the more lamentable; and those that love God and love them should mourn for them.

CHAPTER XIII.

In this chapter the apostle threateneth to be severe against obstinate sinners, and assigneth the reason thereof, ver. 1–6. Then he maketh a suitable prayer to God on the behalf of the Corinthians, with the reasons inducing him thereto, ver. 7–10. And concludeth his epistle with a valediction and a benediction, ver. 11–14.

THIS is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established. 2 I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time; and being absent now I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare: 3 Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you. 4 For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you. 5 Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? 6 But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates.

In these verses observe,

First. The apostle threateneth to be severe against obstinate sinners when he should come to Corinth, having now sent to them a first and second epistle, with proper admonitions and exhortations, in order to reform what was amiss among them; concerning which we may take notice of,

1. The caution with which he proceeded in his censures. He was not hasty in using severity, but gave a first and second admonition. So some understand his words, ver. 1, "This is the third time I am coming to you," referring to his first and second epistles, by which he admonished them, as if he were present with them, though in person he was absent, ver. 2. And according to this interpretation these two epistles are the witnesses he meaneth in the first verse, referring rather to the direction of our Saviour, Mat. xviii. 16, concerning the manner in which Christians should deal with offenders before they proceed to extremity, than to the law of Moses, Deu. xvii. 6; xix. 5, for the behaviour of judges in criminal matters. We should go [or send] to our brother once and again to tell him of his fault. Thus the apostle had told these Corinthians before, that is, in his former epistle; and now he tells them, or writeth "to them which heretofore had sinned, and to all other," giving warning unto all, before he came in person the third time, to exercise severity against scandalous offenders. Others think the apostle had designed and prepared for his journey to Corinth twice already, but was providentially hindered, and now informeth them of his intention a third time to come to them. However this be, it is observable he kept an account how often he endeavoured, and what pains he took with these Corinthians for their good; and we may be sure an account is kept in heaven, and we must be reckoned with another day for the helps we have had for our souls, and how we have improved them.

2. The threatening itself, that if (or when) he came again (in person) he would not spare obstinate sinners, and such as were impenitent in their scandalous enormities. He had told them before he feared God would humble him among them, because he should find some that had sinned and had not repented; and now he declareth he would not spare such, but would inflict church censures upon them, which are thought to have been accompanied, in those early times, with visible and extraordinary tokens of Divine displeasure. Note, Though it is God's gracious method to bear long with sinners, yet he will not bear always; at length he will come, and will not spare them who remain obstinate and impenitent, notwithstanding all his methods to reclaim and reform them.

v. 2. "To be clothed upon;" St. Paul here adopts the figure of a garment, and refers to the putting on of one garment over another. "The longing" is for a transformation in which the earthly body will not be laid aside (in death), but the heavenly will be thrown over it.

v. 3. "If so be;" rather, "seeing that being clothed, we," &c.;

ii. 12. See Introductory Notes on chap. i.

iii. 16. "It:" i.e., their heart.

iii. 18. "Open face," rather, "unveiled face." "In a glass;" rather, "in a mirror;" the Gospel being a mirror reflecting the glory of Christ.

v. 1. Dean Stanley suggests that the double metaphor of a tent and a garment may have been suggested by Paul's familiarity with the Cilician materials used in tent-making. "Earthly:" i.e., that

Secondly. The apostle assigneth a reason why he would be thus severe; namely, for "a proof of Christ speaking" in him, which they sought after, ver. 3. The evidence of his apostleship was necessary for the credit, and confirmation, and success, of the Gospel he preached; and therefore such as denied that were justly and severely to be censured. It was the design of the false teachers to make the Corinthians call this matter into question, which yet they had not weak, but strong or mighty proofs of, ver. 3, notwithstanding the mean figure he made in the world, and the contempt which by some was cast upon him. Even as Christ himself was crucified through weakness, or appeared in his crucifixion as a weak and contemptible person, but liveth by the power of God, or in his resurrection and life manifesteth his Divine power, ver. 4, so the apostles, how mean and contemptible soever they appeared to the world, did yet, as instruments, manifest the power of God, and particularly the power of his grace, in converting the world to Christianity; and, therefore, as a proof unto those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ's speaking in the apostle, he puts them upon the proving their Christianity; ver. 5, "Examine yourselves," &c. Hereby he intimateth that if they could prove their own Christianity, this would be a proof of his apostleship; for if they were in the faith, if Jesus Christ was in them, this was a proof Christ spake in him, because it was by his ministry they did believe. He had been not only an instructor, but a father to them. He had begotten them again by the Gospel of Christ. Now it could not be imagined that a Divine power should go along with his ministrations if he had not his commission from on high. If, therefore, they could prove themselves not to be reprobates, that is, not to be rejected of Christ, he trusted they would know that he was not a reprobate, ver. 6, that is, not disowned by Christ.

What the apostle here saith of the duty of the Corinthians to examine themselves, &c., with the particular view already mentioned, is applicable to the great duty of all that call themselves Christians, to examine themselves concerning their spiritual state. We should examine whether we be in the faith, because it is a matter in which we may be easily deceived, and wherein a deceit is highly dangerous. We are therefore concerned to prove our own selves, to put the question to our own souls, whether Christ be in us or not; and Christ is in us, except we be reprobates. So that either we are true Christians or we are great cheats; and what a reproachful thing is it for a man not to know himself, not to know his own mind!

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates. 8 For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth. 9 For we are glad, when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection. 10 Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

Here we have,

First. The apostle's prayer to God on the behalf of the Corinthians, that they might "do no evil," ver. 7. This is the most desirable thing we can ask of God, both for ourselves and for our friends, to be kept from sin, that we and they may do no evil; and it is most needful that we often pray to God for his grace to keep us, because without that we cannot keep ourselves. We are more concerned to pray that we may not do evil than that we may not suffer evil.

Secondly. The reasons why the apostle put up this prayer to God on behalf of the Corinthians, which reasons have a special reference to their case and the subject-matter about which he was writing to them. Observe, he tells them,

1. It was not so much for his own personal reputation as for the honour of religion; "Not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest," or decent, and for the credit of religion, though we should be reproached and vilified, and accounted as reprobates, ver. 7. Note, 1st. The great desire of faithful ministers of the Gospel is, that the Gospel they preach may be honoured, however their persons may be vilified. 2nd. The best way to adorn our holy religion is, to do that which is honest and of good report, to walk so as becometh the Gospel of Christ.

2. Another reason was this, that they might be free from all blame and censure when he should come to them. This is intimated in ver. 8; "We can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth." If, therefore, they did not do evil, nor act contrary to their profession of the Gospel, the apostle had no power nor authority to punish them. He had said before, ch. x. 8, and saith here, ver. 10, "The power which the Lord had given him was to edification, not to destruction." So that, although the apostle had great powers committed to him for the credit and advancement of the Gospel, yet he could not do any thing to the disparagement of the truth, nor the discouragement of them who obeyed it. He could not, that is, he would not, he dared not, he had no commission to act against the truth; and it is remarkable how the apostle did rejoice in this blessed impotency; "We are glad," (saith he, ver. 9), "when we are weak, and ye are strong," that is, that we have no power to censure those who are strong in the faith and fruitful in good works. Some understand this passage thus: Though we are weak through persecutions and contempt, we bear it patiently, and also joyfully, while we see that you are strong, that you are prosperous in holiness, and persevering in well-doing; for,

3. He desired their perfection, ver. 9; that is, that they might be sincere, and aim at perfection; sincerity is our gospel perfection. Or else he wished there might be a thorough reformation amongst them. He not only desired that they might be kept from sin, but also that they might grow in grace and increase in holiness, and that all that was amiss among them might be rectified and reformed. This was the great end of his writing this epistle, and that freedom he used with them by writing these things, that is, those friendly admonitions and warnings, being absent, that so being present he should not "use sharpness," ver. 10; that is, not proceed to the utmost extremity in the exercise of the power which the Lord had given him as an apostle, "to revenge all disobediences," ch. x. 6.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you. 12 Greet one another with an holy kiss. 13 All the saints salute you. 14 The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

Thus the apostle concludeth his epistle with,

First. A valediction. He giveth them a parting farewell, and taketh his leave of them for the present with hearty good wishes for their spiritual welfare. In order to which,

1. He giveth them several good exhortations; for example, 1st. To be perfect, or to be knit together in love, which would tend greatly to their benefit and advantage as a church, or Christian society. 2nd. To be of good comfort under all the sufferings and persecutions they might endure for the cause of Christ, or any calamities and disappointments they might meet with in the world. 3rd. To be of one mind, which would greatly tend to their comfort; for, the more easy we are with our brethren, the more ease we shall have in our own souls. The apostle would have them, as far as was possible, to be of the same opinion and judgment; however, if this could not be attained to, yet, 4th. He exhorteth them to live in peace, that difference in opinion should not cause an alienation of affections; that they should be at peace among themselves. He would have all the schisms healed that were among them, that there should be no more contentions and wrath found among them—to prevent which they should avoid "debates, envyings, backbitings, whisperings," and such like enemies to peace.

2. He encourageth them with the promise of God's presence among them. "The God of love and peace shall be with you," ver. 11. Note, 1st. God is the God of love and peace. He is the author of peace and lover of concord; he hath loved us and is willing to be at peace with us, and commands us to love him, and to be reconciled to him, and also that we love one another, and be at peace among ourselves. 2nd. God will be with them that live in love and peace. He will love them that love peace; he will dwell with them here, and they shall dwell with him for ever. Such shall have God's gracious presence here, and be admitted to his glorious presence hereafter.

3. He giveth directions to them to salute each other, and sends kind salutations to them from those that were with him, ver. 12, 13. He would have them testify their affection to one another by the sacred rite of a kiss of charity, which was then used, but hath long been disused, to prevent all occasions of wantonness and impurity, in the more declining and degenerate state of the church.

Secondly. The apostolical benediction; ver. 14, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." Thus the apostle concludeth his epistle, and thus it is usual and proper to dismiss worshipping assemblies. This plainly proveth the doctrine of the Gospel, and is an acknowledgment that Father, Son, and Spirit, are three distinct persons, yet but one God, and herein the same, that they are the fountain of all blessings to men. It likewise speaketh our duty, which is to have an eye by faith to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; to live in a continual regard to the three persons in the Trinity, into whose name we were baptized, and in whose name we are blessed.

This is a very solemn benediction, and we should give all diligence to inherit this blessing, namely, the grace of Christ, the love of God, and the communion (or communication) of the Holy Ghost. The grace of Christ as Redeemer, the love of God that sent the Redeemer, and all the communications of this grace and love which come to us by the Holy Ghost; it is the communications of the Holy Ghost that qualify us for an interest in the grace of Christ, and the love of God; and we can desire no more to make us happy than the grace of Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

[In regard to this closing verse of the epistle, we may make the following remarks: 1. It is a prayer; and if it is a prayer addressed to God, it is no less so to the Lord Jesus and to the Holy Spirit. If so, it is right to offer worship to the Lord Jesus and to the Holy Spirit. 2. There is a distinction in the Divine nature; or there is the existence of what is usually termed three persons in the Godhead. If not, why are they mentioned in this manner? If the Lord Jesus is not Divine and equal with the Father, why is he mentioned in this connexion? 3. The Holy Spirit is a person, or has a distinct personality. He is not an attribute of God, nor a mere Divine influence. How could prayer be addressed to an attribute, or an influence? 4. The Lord Jesus is not inferior to the Father; that is, he has an equality with God. If he were not equal, how could he be mentioned, as he is here, as bestowing favours like God, and especially why is he mentioned first? Would Paul, in invoking blessings, mention the name of a mere man or an angel before that of the eternal God? 5. The passage, therefore, furnishes a proof of the doctrine of the Trinity that has not yet been answered, and it is believed, cannot be. On the supposition that there are three persons in the adorable Trinity, united in essence, and yet distinct in some respects, all is plain and clear. But, on the supposition that the Lord Jesus is a mere man, an angel, or an archangel, and that the Holy Spirit is an attribute, or an influence from God, how unintelligible, confused, strange, does all become! That Paul, in the solemn close of the epistle, should at the same time invoke blessings from a mere creature, and from God, and from an attribute, surpasses belief. But that he should invoke blessings from Him who was the equal with the Father, and from the Father himself, and from the sacred Spirit sustaining the same rank, and in like manner imparting important blessings, is in accordance with all that we should expect, and makes all harmonious and appropriate. 6. Nothing could be a more proper close of the epistle; nothing is a more appropriate close of public worship than such an invocation. It is a prayer to the ever-blessed God, that all the rich influences which he gives as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, may be imparted; that all the benefits which God confers in the interesting relations in which he makes himself known to us, may descend and bless us. What more appropriate prayer can be offered at the close of public worship? How seriously should it be pronounced, as a congregation is about to separate, perhaps to come together no more! With what solemnity should all join in it, and how devoutly should all pray, as they thus separate, that these rich and inestimable blessings may rest upon them! With hearts uplifted to God it should be pronounced and heard; and every worshipper should leave the sanctuary deeply feeling that what he most needs, as he leaves the place of public worship—as he travels on the journey of life—as he engages in its duties or meets its trials—as he looks at the grave and eternity, is the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the blessings which the Holy Spirit imparts in renewing, and sanctifying, and comforting his people. What more appropriate prayer than this for the writer and reader of these Notes! May that blessing rest alike upon us, though we may be strangers in the flesh; and may those heavenly influences guide us alike to the same everlasting kingdom of glory.—A. B.]

v. 11 "Being conscious of the fear of the Lord (as our guiding principle) we persuade men (of our integrity), but to God we are already manifested, and so have no need to persuade him of our integrity."

v. 14. "All dead:" rather, "all died"—i.e., in the death of Christ.

v. 16. "After the flesh:" i.e., according to his mere worldly and external relations.

i.e., because we shall be clothed with a body, and not be merely disembodied spirits; referring probably to the deniers of the resurrection.

v. 8. St. Paul had spoken above of an unwillingness to be unclothed of the body. Here he goes a step further, and asserts that even should that take place it would not shake his confidence, nay, he should even prefer it to being kept from the more immediate presence of his Lord.

ST. PAUL TO THE GALATIANS,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

THIS epistle of Paul is directed not to the church or churches of a single city, as some others are, but of a country or province, for so Galatia was. It is very probable that these Galatians were first converted to the Christian faith by his ministry; but if he was not the instrument of planting, yet at least he had been employed in watering, these churches, as is evident from this epistle itself, and also from Acts xviii. 23, where we find him going over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples. While he was with them they had expressed the greatest esteem and affection both for his person and ministry; but he had not been long absent from them before some Judaizing teachers got in among them, by whose arts and insinuations they were soon drawn into a meaner opinion, both of the one and of the other. That which these false teachers chiefly aimed at was, to draw them off from the truth as it is in Jesus, particularly in the great doctrine of justification, which they grossly perverted by asserting the necessity of joining the observation of the law of Moses with faith in Christ in order to it; and, the better to accomplish this their design, they did all they could to lessen the character and reputation of the apostle, and to raise up their own on the ruins of his, representing him as one who, if he was to be owned as an apostle, yet was much inferior to others, and particularly who deserved not such a regard as Peter, James, and John, whose followers it is likely they pretended to be; and in both these attempts they had but too great success. This was the occasion of his writing this epistle, wherein he expresses his great concern that they had suffered themselves to be so soon turned aside from the faith of the Gospel, vindicates his own character and authority as an apostle against the aspersions of his enemies, shewing that his mission and doctrine were both Divine, and that he was not upon any account "behind the very chiefest of the apostles," 2 Cor. xi. 5. He then sets himself to assert and maintain the great gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, and to obviate some difficulties that might be apt to arise in their minds concerning it; and having established this important doctrine, he exhorts them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free, cautions them against the abuse of this liberty, gives them several very needful counsels and directions, and then concludes the epistle with giving them the true character of those false teachers by whom they had been ensnared, and, on the contrary, his own temper and behaviour. In all which his great scope and design was, to recover those that had been perverted, to settle those that might be wavering, and to confirm such among them as had kept their integrity.

A.D. 58.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter, after the preface or introduction, ver. 1—5, the apostle severely reproves these churches for their defection from the faith, ver. 6—9; and then proves his own apostleship, which his enemies had brought them to question, 1. From his end and design in preaching the gospel, ver. 10. 11. From his having received it by immediate revelation, ver. 11, 12; for the proof of which, he acquaints them, 1. What his former conversation was, ver. 13, 14; 2. How he was converted and called to the apostleship, ver. 15, 16; 3. How he behaved himself afterwards, ver. 16—24.

PAUL, an apostle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead;) 2 And all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia: 3 Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, 4 Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father: 5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

In these verses we have the preface or introduction to the epistle. Where observe,

First. The person or persons from whom this is sent. From Paul an apostle, &c., and all the brethren that were with him.

1. The epistle is sent from Paul. He only was the penman of it; and because there were some among the Galatians who endeavoured to lessen his character and authority, in the very front of it he gives a general account both of his office and the manner in which he was called to it, which afterwards, in this and the following chapter, he enlarges more upon. As to his office, he was an apostle; he is not afraid to style himself so, though his enemies would scarce allow him this title. And to let them see that he did not assume this character without just ground, he acquaints them how he was called to this dignity and office, and assures them that his commission to it was wholly Divine, for he was an apostle, "not of men, neither by man." He had not the common call of an ordinary minister, but an extraordinary call from heaven, to this office; he neither received his qualification for it nor his designation to it by the mediation of men, but had both the one and the other directly from above. For he was an apostle "by Jesus Christ," he had his instructions and commission immediately from him; and, consequently, from "God the Father," who, in respect of his Divine nature, was one with him, and who, as Mediator, had appointed him to be the apostle and high priest of our profession, and as such to authorise others to this office.

[Note, 1. That the office of an apostle had this peculiar unto itself, that the designation of the person to undergo that office was not immediately by the election and suffrages of men, as it is in the calling of ordinary office-bearers, Acts xiv. 23, but immediately from God; so that the function of the apostles ceased with them, and did not pass by succession to a pope or any other; for in this respect Paul affirmeth he was an apostle, not by man, to wit, mere man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father. He was called immediately by God, Acts ix. 15. 2. That Jesus Christ is not mere man, but God also, appeareth from this, that the apostle opposeth Christ to man, and so he behoved to be more than man; and this was not an angel, Heb. ii. 16, and therefore he was also God; "Neither by man," saith he, to wit, mere man, "but by Jesus Christ." 3. When Scripture ascribeth an action to the Father, the first person of the blessed Trinity, as done by him, it is not to be so understood as if the Son and Holy Ghost were excluded from having hand in that action, but that they are rather included in the Father, as persons of the same Godhead; for the calling of the ministers of the Gospel, which is ascribed to God the Father, is ascribed to the Holy Ghost, Acts xx. 28; and Paul, who is here said to be called by God the Father, is by the Holy Ghost separated and sent forth unto a particular employment in his calling, Acts xiii. 2, 4; and the raising of Christ from the dead, in like manner ascribed to God the Father here, is ascribed to Christ also, 1 Jo. x. 18, and to the Holy Ghost, Rom. viii. 11: "And God the Father, who raised him from the dead." All the external actions of the Godhead towards the creatures are common to the whole Trinity, 1 Jo. v. 19; so that the ascribing of some actions to the Father is not as if any of the rest were not concurring, but because of the order of working, which is among the three Persons; the Father being the first fountain of working, as doing all things from himself, 1 Cor. viii. 6; by the Son, 1 Cor. viii. 6; and Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 6, 8. Because of this order, those actions which are common to the whole Trinity are frequently ascribed unto the Father.]

And he adds, "Who raised him from the dead;" both to acquaint us that herein God the Father gave a public testimony to Christ's being his Son, and the promised Messiah, and also that, as his call to the apostleship was immediately from Christ, so it was after his resurrection from the dead, and when he was entered upon his exalted state. So that he had reason to look upon himself not only as standing upon a level with the other apostles, but as in some sort preferred above them; for, whereas they were called by him when on earth, he

i. 1. Concerning the date of the epistle, considerable differences of opinion exist. Lightfoot fixes it about A.D. 57, 58, thus according with that adopted above. Accepting this date as on the whole most satisfactory, the epistle occupies an historical place between 2 Corinthians and Romans. The province of Galatia possessed many commercial advantages; position, soil, and climate being good. The inhabitants were a mixed race, but mainly Celtic. Their love of novelty, fickleness, irascibility, avarice, and superstitiousness have been noted by heathen writers—hints of these may be traced in the epistle. Paul's weakness and earnestness combined to win upon the hearts of an excitable people, and their first reception of the Gospel was most promising (chap. v. 7, iv. 14, 15). But their fickleness was soon seen in the readiness with which they adopted the errors of the Judaizing party. To correct these errors was the main object of the epistle. "The two threads which run through this epistle—the defence of the apostle's own authority (verse 1), and the maintenance had his call from him when in heaven. Thus doth the apostle (being constrained to it by his adversaries,) magnify his office; which shews that, though men should by no means be proud of any authority they are possessed of, yet that sometimes, and upon some occasions, it may become needful to assert it.

2. He joins all the brethren that were with him in the inscription of the epistle, and writes in their names as well as his own. By the brethren that were with him may be understood, either the Christians in common of that place where he now was, or such as were employed as ministers of the Gospel. These, notwithstanding his own superior character and attainments, he is ready to own as his brethren; and though he only wrote the epistle, yet he joins them with himself in the inscription of it. Wherein, as he shews his own great modesty and humility, and how remote he was from an assuming temper, so he might do this to dispose these churches to a greater regard to what he wrote, since hereby it would appear that he had their concurrence with him in the doctrine which he had preached, and was now about to confirm; and that it was no other than what was both published and professed by others, as well as himself.

Secondly, To whom this epistle is sent: "to the churches of Galatia." There were several churches at that time in this country, and it should seem that all of them were more or less corrupted through the arts of those seducers who had crept in among them; and therefore, Paul, on whom came daily the care of all the churches, being deeply affected with their state, and concerned for their recovery to the faith and establishment in it, writes this epistle to them. He directs it to all of them, as being all more or less concerned in the matter of it; and he gives them the name of churches, though they had done enough to forfeit it,—for corrupt churches are never allowed to be churches; and no doubt there were some among them who still continued in the faith, and he was not without hope that others might be recovered to it.

[We are not so to stumble at the many sinful failings, yea, gross enormities, which may be in churches, relating either to faith or manners, as presently to unchurch them, by denying them to be a church, or to separate from them, by refusing to keep communion with them in lawful and commanded ordinances, being purely administered according to the prescript of God's word; chiefly if their error be not contrary to fundamental truths, or at least if they err of human frailty, and not obstinately or avowedly.]

Thirdly, The apostolical benediction, ver. 3. Wherein the apostle and the brethren that were with him, wish these churches "grace and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." This is the usual blessing wherewith he bleaseth the churches in the name of the Lord, "Grace and peace." Grace includes God's goodwill towards us, and his good work upon us; and peace implies in it all that inward comfort, or outward prosperity, which is really needful for us; and they come from God the Father, as the fountain, through Jesus Christ, as the channel of conveyance; both these the apostle wishes for these Christians. But we may observe, first grace, and then peace; for there can be no true peace without grace. And having mentioned the Lord Jesus Christ, he cannot pass without enlarging upon his love, and therefore adds, ver. 4, "Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver" &c. Jesus Christ gave himself for our sins, as a great sacrifice, to make atonement for us; this the justice of God required, and this he freely submitted to for our sakes. And one great end hereof was "to deliver us from this present evil world;" not only to redeem us from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, but also to recover us from the corruption that is in the world through lust, and to rescue us from the vicious practices and customs of it, unto which we are naturally enslaved; and possibly also to set us free from the Mosaic constitution, for so αὐτοῦ αἰῶνος is used, 1 Cor. ii. 6, 8. From whence we may note, 1. That this present world is an evil world. It has become so by the sin of man, and it is so on account of the sin and sorrow with which it abounds, and the many snares and temptations to which we are exposed, as long as we continue in it. But, 2. That Jesus Christ has died to deliver us from this present evil world, not presently to remove his people out of it, but [but first to renew their natures, and so separate them from the condition of unregenerate men, who are called the world, 1 Jno. v. 19; and then,] to rescue them from the power of it, to keep them from the evil of it, and in due time to possess them of another and better world. And this, the apostle informs us, he has done "according to the will of God and our Father." In offering up himself a sacrifice for this end and purpose, he acted by the appointment of the Father, as well as with his own free consent; and, therefore, we have the greatest reason to depend upon the efficacy and acceptableness of what he has done and suffered for us. Yea, from hence we have encouragement to look upon God as our Father; for thus the apostle here represents him, as he is the Father of our Lord Jesus, so in and through him he is also the Father of all true believers: as our blessed Saviour himself acquaints us, Jno. xx. 17, when he tells his disciples that he was ascending to his Father and their Father.

The apostle having thus taken notice of the great love wherewith Christ hath loved us, concludes this preface with a solemn ascription of praise and glory to him; ver. 5, "To whom be glory for ever and ever: Amen." Intimating that on this account he is justly entitled to our highest esteem and regard. Or this doxology may be considered as referring both to God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom he had just before been wishing grace and peace. They are both the proper objects of our worship and adoration, and all honour and glory is perpetually due to them; both on account of their own infinite excellencies, and also on account of the blessings we receive from them.

[The glory of the Redeemer, and of God who sent his Son to do that work, shall be the long-lasting and never-ending song of the redeemed ones through millions of imaginable ages, even to all eternity: so much doth the word rendered "for ever and ever" bear: for it signifieth to ages of ages, or innumerable ages. Our praise and thanksgiving to God must not be formal or verbal only, Mat. xv. 8; but ought to be fervent and serious, as proceeding from the most intimate affection of the heart, Lu. i. 46, 47, signified by the word "Amen," that is "Let it be so;" an earnest wish.]

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: 7 Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ. 8 But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. 9 As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

Here the apostle comes to the body of the epistle, and he begins it with a more general reproof of these churches for their unsteadiness in the faith, which he afterwards in some following parts of it enlarges more upon. Here we may observe,

First, How much he was concerned at their defection; "I marvel," &c. It at once filled him with the greatest surprise and sorrow. Their sin and folly were, that they did not hold fast the doctrine of Christianity, as it had been preached to them, but suffered themselves to be removed from the purity and simplicity of it. And there were several things by which their defection was greatly aggravated, as, 1. That they were removed from him that had called them. Not only from the apostle, who had been the instrument of calling them into the fellowship of the Gospel, but from God himself, by whose order and direction the Gospel was preached to them, and they invited to a participation in the privileges of it. So that herein they had been guilty of a great abuse of his kindness and mercy towards them. 2. They had been called into the grace of Christ. As the Gospel which had been preached to them was the most glorious discovery of Divine grace and mercy in Christ Jesus, so thereby they had been called to partake of the greatest blessings and benefits, such as justification and reconciliation with God here, and eternal life and happiness hereafter. These our Lord Jesus has purchased for us at the expense of his precious blood, and freely bestows upon all that sincerely accept of him. And, therefore, in proportion to the greatness of the privilege they enjoyed, such was their sin and folly in deserting it, and suffering themselves to be drawn off from the established way of obtaining these blessings. 3. That they were so soon removed. In a very little time they lost that relish and esteem of this grace of Christ which they seemed to have, and too easily fell in with those that taught justification by the works of the law, as many did that had been bred up in the opinions and notions of the Pharisees, which they mingled with the doctrine of Christ, and so corrupted it; and this, as it was an instance of their weakness, so it was a farther aggravation of their guilt. 4. That they were removed to another gospel, which yet was not another. Thus the apostle represents the doctrine of these Judaizing teachers; he calls it another gospel, because it opened a different way of justification and salvation from that which was revealed in the Gospel, namely, by works, and not by faith in Christ. And yet he adds, "which is not another;" that is, you will find it to be no gospel at all; not really another gospel, but the perverting of the Gospel of Christ, and the overturning of the foundations of that, whereby he intimates that they who go about to establish any other way to heaven than what the Gospel of Christ has revealed, are guilty of a gross perversion of it, and in the issue will find themselves wretchedly mistaken.

Thus the apostle endeavours to impress upon these Galatians a due sense of their guilt in forsaking the gospel way of justification; and yet at the same time he tempers his reproof with mildness and tenderness towards them, and represents them as rather drawn into it by the arts and industry of some that troubled them, than as coming into it of their own accord, which, though it did not excuse them, yet was some extenuation of their fault. And hereby he teaches us that in reproving of others, as we should be faithful, so we should also be gentle, and endeavour to restore them in the spirit of meekness, ch. vi. 1.

Secondly, How confident he was that the Gospel he had preached to them was the only true Gospel. He was so fully persuaded of this, that he pronounces an anathema upon those that pretended to preach any other gospel, ver. 8. And to let them see that did not proceed from any rashness or intemperate zeal in him, he repeats it again, ver. 9. This will not justify our thundering our anathemas against those that differ from us in lesser things. It is only against those that forge a new gospel, that overturn the foundation of the covenant of grace, by setting up the works of the law in the place of Christ's righteousness, and corrupting Christianity with Judaism, that Paul denounces this. He puts the case, Suppose we should preach any other gospel; nay, suppose an angel from heaven should, not as if it were possible for an angel from heaven to be the messenger of a lie, but it is expressed so, the more to strengthen what he was about to say. If you have any other gospel preached to you by any other person under our name, or under colour of having it from an angel himself, you must conclude you are imposed upon; and whoever preaches another gospel lays himself under a curse, and is in danger of laying you under it too.

10 For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ. 11 But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. 12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. 13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it: 14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers. 15 But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, 16 To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood: 17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, of the doctrine of grace (verse 4)—are knotted together in the opening salutation" (Lightfoot). "Of men," "by man:" "of" referring to the fountain head, "by" to the channel; neither the source nor the medium of his authority was from man.

i. 6, 7. "Another Gospel, which is not another;" two different words are here rendered by the same English word. The force of the passage is thus weakened. The first Greek word refers to a difference in kind, and is translated "different" by Alford and Lightfoot. The second word refers to a difference of identity or individuality. (Compare 2 Cor. xi. 4.) The verse thus means, "You are turned to a totally different kind of Gospel. Gospel, did I say? nay, there is no other besides that I have preached."

i. 10. "Do I now," &c.: the charge of inconsistency and temporising had been brought against St. Paul by the Judaizing party. Hence his question, "Do I now please men? does this strong language look like temporising?" "Servant of Christ:" Lightfoot and returned again unto Damascus. 18 Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. 19 But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother. 20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not. 21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; 22 And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judæa which were in Christ: 23 But they had heard only, That he which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. 24 And they glorified God in me.

SELEUCIA IN CILICIA.

What Paul had said more generally in the preface of this epistle, he now proceeds more particularly to enlarge upon. There he had declared himself to be an apostle of Christ; and here he comes more directly to support his claim to that character and office. There were some in the churches of Galatia who were prevailed with to call this into question; for they that preached up the ceremonial law did all they could to lessen Paul's reputation, who preached the pure Gospel of Christ to the Gentiles. And, therefore, he here sets himself to prove the divinity both of his mission and doctrine, that thereby he might wipe off the aspersions which his enemies had cast upon him, and recover these Christians into a better opinion of the Gospel he had preached to them. This he gives sufficient evidence of:

First. From the scope and design of his ministry, which was not to persuade men but God, &c. The meaning of this may be either, that, in his preaching the Gospel, he did not act in obedience to men, but God, who had called him to this work and office; or, that his aim therein was not to bring persons to the obedience of men, but of God. As he professed to act by a commission from God, so that which he chiefly aimed at was to promote his glory, by recovering sinners into a state of subjection to him. And as this was the great end he was pursuing, so agreeably hereunto he did not seek to please men. He did not in his doctrine accommodate himself to the humours of persons, either to gain their affection or to avoid their resentment; but his great care was to approve himself to God. The Judaizing teachers, by whom these churches were corrupted, had discovered a very different temper; they mixed works with faith, and the law with the Gospel, only to please the Jews, whom they were willing to court and keep in with, that they might escape persecution. But Paul was a man of another spirit; he was not so solicitous to please them, or to mitigate their rage against him, as to alter the doctrine of Christ, either to gain their favour or to avoid their fury. And he gives this very good reason for it, that "if he yet pleased men, he should not be the servant of Christ." These he knew were utterly inconsistent, and that no man could serve two such masters; and, therefore, though he would not needlessly displease any, yet he dared not allow himself to gratify men at the expense of his faithfulness to Christ. Thus from the sincerity of his aims and intentions in the discharge of his office he proves that he was truly an apostle of Christ; and from this his temper and behaviour we may note, 1. That the great end which ministers of the Gospel should aim at is, to bring men to God. 2. That they who are faithful will not seek to please men, but to approve themselves to God. 3. That they must not be solicitous to please men, if they would approve themselves faithful servants to Christ. But if this argument should not be thought sufficient, he goes on to prove his apostleship.

Secondly. From the manner wherein he received the Gospel he preached to them; concerning which, he assures them, ver. 11, 12, that he had it not by information from others, but by revelation from heaven. One thing peculiar in the character of an apostle was, that he had been called to, and instructed for, this office immediately by Christ himself. And this he here shews he was by no means defective in, whatever his enemies might suggest to the contrary. Ordinary ministers, as they receive their call to preach the Gospel by the mediation of others, so it is by means of the instruction and assistance of others that they are brought to the knowledge of it. But Paul acquaints them that he had his knowledge of the Gospel, as well as his authority to preach it, directly from the Lord Jesus; the Gospel which he preached was not after man; he neither received it of man, nor was he taught it by man, but by immediate inspiration or revelation from Christ himself. This he was concerned to make out, to prove himself an apostle; and to this purpose,

1. He tells them what his education was, and what accordingly his conversation in time past had been, ver. 13, 14; particularly he acquaints them that he had been brought up in the Jewish religion, and that he had profited in it above many his equals of his own nation; that he had been exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the elders, such doctrines and customs as had been invented by their fathers, and conveyed down from one generation to another; yea, to that degree, that in his zeal for them he had beyond measure "persecuted the church of God, and wasted it." He had not only been a rejecter of the Christian religion, notwithstanding the many evident proofs that were given of its Divine original, but he had been a persecutor of it too, and had applied himself with the utmost violence and rage to destroy the professors of it. This Paul often takes notice of for the magnifying of that free and rich grace that had wrought so wonderful a change in him, whereby of so great a sinner he was made a sincere penitent, and from a persecutor was become an apostle. And it was very fit to mention it here; for from hence it would appear that he was not led to Christianity, as many others are, purely by education, since he had been bred up in an enmity and opposition to it; and they might reasonably suppose that it must be something very extraordinary that had made so great a change in him, which had conquered the prejudices of his education, and brought him not only to profess, but to preach, that doctrine which he had before so vehemently opposed.

brought to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and appointed to the office of an apostle, ver. 15, 16. This was not done in an ordinary way, or by ordinary means, but in an extraordinary manner. For, 1st. God had "separated him hereunto from his mother's womb." The change that was wrought in him was in pursuance of a Divine purpose concerning him, whereby he was appointed to be a Christian and an apostle before he came into the world, and had done either good or evil. 2nd. He was called by his grace. All that are savingly converted are called by the grace of God, their conversion is the effect of his good pleasure concerning them, and is effected by his power and grace in them. But there was something peculiar in the case of Paul, both in the suddenness and greatness of the change wrought in him, and also in the manner wherein it was effected, which was not by the mediation of others, as the instruments of it, but by Christ's personal appearance to him, and immediate operation upon him, whereby it was rendered a more special and extraordinary instance of Divine power and favour. 3rd. He had Christ revealed in him. He was not only revealed to him, but in him. It will but little avail us to have Christ revealed to us, if he is not also revealed in us; but this was not the case of Paul; it pleased God "to reveal his Son in him," to bring him to the knowledge of Christ and his Gospel by special and immediate revelation. And, 4th. It was with this design, that he should preach him among the heathen; not only that he should embrace him himself, but preach him to others; so that he was both a Christian and an apostle by revelation.

3. He acquaints them how he behaved himself hereupon, from ver. 16 to the end; being thus called to this work and office, he "conferred not with flesh and blood." This may be taken more generally, and so we may learn from it that, when God calls us by his grace, we must not consult flesh and blood. But the meaning of it here is, that he did not consult men; he did not apply himself to any others for their advice and direction; neither did he go up to Jerusalem "to those that were apostles before him," as though he needed to be approved by them, or to receive any farther instructions or authority from them; but, instead of that, he steered another course, and went into Arabia, either as a place of retirement proper for receiving farther Divine revelations, or in order to preach the Gospel there among the Gentiles, being appointed to be the apostle of the Gentiles; and from thence he returned again to Damascus; where he had first begun his ministry, and from whence he had with difficulty escaped the rage of his enemies, Acts ix. And it was not till three years after his conversion that he went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and when he did so he made a very short stay with him, no more than fifteen days; nor while he was there did he go much into conversation, for other of the apostles he saw none, but "James the Lord's brother."

[That nothing of Peter's supposed supremacy over Paul and the rest of the apostles can be gathered from this place, as the papists do allege, appeareth from this, that Paul went first to his work before he came to Peter at all, and that his business with Peter was not to receive ordination from him, or to evidence his subjection to him, but from the respect and reverence he carried to him to give him a friendly visit; besides that, it is the apostle's scope in a great part of this epistle to shew that he was nothing inferior to Peter, or to any other of the apostles.]

So that it could not be well pretended that he was indebted to any other, either for his knowledge of the Gospel, or his authority to preach it; but it appeared that both his qualifications for, and his call to, the apostolic office were extraordinary and Divine. This account being of importance, to establish his claim to this office, to remove the unjust censures of his adversaries, and to recover the Galatians from the impressions they had received to his prejudice, he confirms it by a solemn oath, ver. 20, declaring, as in the presence of God, that what he had said was strictly true, and that he had not in the least falsified in what he had related; which, though it will not justify us in solemn appeals to God upon every occasion, yet shews that in matters of weight and moment this may sometimes not only be lawful, but duty. After this he acquaints them that he "came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;" having made this short visit to Peter, he returns to his work again; he had no communication at that time with the churches of Christ in Judæa, they had not so much as seen his face; but having heard that he who persecuted them in times past "now preached the faith which he once destroyed," they glorified God because of him; thanksgivings were rendered by many unto God on that behalf; the very report of this mighty change in him, as it filled them with joy, so it excited them to give glory to God on the account of it.

[Whensoever God is pleased to make a man instrumental, whether for our own particular good, or the more public benefit of Christ's church, as we would not be ungrateful unto the instruments themselves, Jud. ix. 16, &c., so neither are we to rest upon them, ascribing the praise of what they do to them; but as we would not provoke the Lord to smite them, or, at least, to make them useless to us, 1 Cor. iv. 6, we are to look unto God more than them, ascribing the praise of what they do unto him, as that which is his proper right and due; so do they ascribe to God the praise of any good which Paul did by his preaching; "They glorified God in me, or concerning me."] has "I should not have been," and suggests that there is possibly an allusion to the marks of persecution (chap. vi. 17). "If I had pleased men, I should not have been branded as the slave of Christ."

i. 17. "Arabia;" of this sojourn, or its purpose, nothing is known. It seems probable that it was for retirement's sake. It is conjectured that the spot he visited was the Sinaitic peninsula. The same region is connected, as here, with Damascus in the history of Elijah (3 Kings xix. 15). The spot was full of interest and suggestive associations to one in the condition St. Paul then was. The sojourn was probably not long. "Damascus:" St. Paul's life was in danger on this occasion.

i. 19. "James, the Lord's brother:" "I saw no apostle save James." The inference is that this James was styled an apostle, but it does not follow that he was one of the twelve. In any case the expression "the Lord's brother" distinguishes this James from the son of Zebedee, living at the time of this visit.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle in this chapter continues the relation of his past life and conduct, which he had begun in the former; and by some farther instances of what had passed between him and the other apostles makes it appear that he was not beheld to them, either for his knowledge of the Gospel or his authority as an apostle, as his adversaries would insinuate; but on the contrary that he was owned and approved even by them, as having an equal commission with them to this office. Particularly he, I. Informs them of another journey which he took to Jerusalem many years after the former, and how he behaved himself at that time, ver. 1—10. And, II. Gives them an account of another interview he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch, and how he was obliged to behave himself towards him there. And from the subject matter of that conversation he proceeds to discourse on the great doctrine of justification by faith in Christ without the works of the law, which it was the main design of this epistle to establish, and which he enlarges more upon in the two following chapters.

THEN fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. 2 And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain. 3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised: 4 And that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: 5 To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you. 6 But of these who seemed to be somewhat, (whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person:) for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me: 7 But contrariwise, when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter; 8 (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me toward the Gentiles:) 9 And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision. 10 Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.

It should seem, by the account Paul gives of himself in this chapter, that from the very first preaching and planting of Christianity there was a difference of apprehension between those Christians that had first been Jews and those that had first been Gentiles. Many of those that had first been Jews retained a regard to the ceremonial law, and strove to keep up the reputation of that; but those that had first been Gentiles had no regard to the law of Moses, but took pure Christianity as perfective of natural religion, and resolved to stick to that. Peter was the apostle of the circumcision, preached the Gospel to them; and the ceremonial law, though dead with Christ, yet not being as yet buried, he connived at the respect kept up for it. But Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles; and though he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, yet he adhered to pure Christianity. Now in this chapter he tells us what passed between him and the other apostles, and particularly between him and Peter hereupon. In these verses he informs us of another journey which he took to Jerusalem, and of what passed between him and the other apostles there, from ver. 1 to 11. And here he acquaints us,

First, With some circumstances relating to this his journey thither. As particularly,

1. With the time of it. That it was not till fourteen years after the former, mentioned ch. i. 18, or, as others choose to understand it, from his conversion, or from the death of Christ. It was an instance of the great goodness of God that so useful a person was for so many years continued in his work. And it was some evidence that he had no dependence upon the other apostles, but had an equal authority with them, that he had been so long absent from them, and all the while employed in preaching and propagating pure Christianity, without being called into question by them for it; which, it may be thought, they would have done had he been inferior to them, and his doctrine disapproved by them.

2. With his companions in it. He went up with Barnabas, and took with him Titus also. If the journey here spoken of was the same with that recorded Acts xv., as many think, then we have a plain reason why Barnabas went along with him; for he was chosen by the Christians at Antioch to be his companion and associate in the affair he went about. But as it does not appear that Titus was put into the same commission with him, so the chief reason of his taking him along with him seems to have been to let them at Jerusalem see that he was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the doctrine which he had constantly preached; for, though Titus was now become not only a convert to the Christian faith, but a preacher of it too, yet he was by birth a Gentile, and uncircumcised. And therefore, by his making him his companion, it appeared that his doctrine and practice were of a piece; and that as he had preached the no-necessity of circumcision, and observing the law of Moses, so he was ready to own and converse with those that were uncircumcised.

3. With the reason of it, which was a Divine revelation he had concerning it. He "went up by revelation;" not of his own head, much less as being summoned to appear there, but by special order and direction from heaven. It was a privilege with which this apostle was often favoured, to be under a special Divine conduct in his motions and undertakings; and though this is what we have no reason to expect, yet it should teach us in every thing of moment we go about to endeavour, as far as we are capable, to see our way made plain before us, and to commit ourselves to the guidance of Providence.

Secondly, He gives us an account of his behaviour while he was at Jerusalem, which was such as made it appear that he was not in the least inferior to the other apostles, but that both his authority and qualifications were every way equal to theirs. Particularly he acquaints us,

1. That he there communicated the Gospel to them which he preached among the Gentiles, but privately, &c. Where we may observe both the faithfulness and prudence of our great apostle. 1st. His faithfulness in giving them a free and fair account of the doctrine which he had all along preached among the Gentiles, and was still resolved to preach; namely, that of pure Christianity, free from all mixtures of Judaism. This he knew was a doctrine that would be ungrateful to many there, and yet he was not afraid to own it; but in a free and friendly manner lays it open before them, and leaves them to judge whether or no it was the true Gospel of Christ. And yet, 2nd. He uses prudence and caution herein for fear of giving offence; he chooses rather to do it in a more private than in a public way, and "to them that were of reputation," namely, to the apostles themselves, or to the chief among the Jewish Christians, rather than more openly and promiscuously to all; because, when he came to Jerusalem, "there were multitudes that believed, and yet continued zealous for the law," Acts xxi. 20. And the reason of this his caution was "lest he should run, or had run, in vain;" that is, lest he should stir up opposition against him, and thereby either the success of his past labours should be lessened, or his future usefulness be obstructed; for nothing more hinders the progress of the Gospel than differences of opinion about the doctrines of it, especially when they occasion quarrels and contentions among the professors of it, as they too usually do. It was enough to his purpose to have his doctrine owned by those that were of greatest authority, whether it was approved by others or no. And therefore, to avoid offence, he judges it safest to communicate it privately to them, and not in public to the whole church. And this conduct of the apostle may teach all, and especially ministers, how much need they have of prudence, and how careful they should be to use it upon all occasions, as far as is consistent with their faithfulness.

[It is the part of a faithful minister not only to preach the Gospel and go about all the other parts of his ministerial office faithfully and painfully, and so as he may be approved unto the consciences of all, 2 Tim. iv. 5, but he must be also solicitous about the success of his pains towards those among whom he labourereth; for so was Paul, who compareth his continual labours and painfulness in his ministry to running a race, and yet was careful lest he had run in vain; that is, lest his labours had wanted fruit among the hearers; for otherwise, and as to the end intended to be brought about by God, 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16, or as to the promised reward, Isa. xlix. 4, the work of a faithful minister is never in vain: "Lest by any means I should run in vain," saith he.]

2. That in his practice he firmly adhered to the doctrine which he had preached. Paul was a man of resolution, and would stick to his principles; and therefore, though he had Titus with him, who was a Greek, yet he would not suffer him to be circumcised, because he would not betray the doctrine of Christ as he had preached it to the Gentiles. It does not appear that the apostles at all insisted upon this, for though they connived at the use of circumcision among the Jewish converts, yet they were not for imposing it upon the Gentiles. But there were others that did, whom the apostle here calls false brethren, and concerning whom he informs us that they were unawares brought in, that is, into the church, or into their company, and that they came only to spy out their liberty which they had in Christ Jesus, [Jesus Christ having, by that only sacrifice of himself upon the cross, fulfilled all those legal types and shadows of things to come, (Heb. viii. 5; ix. 9) hath purchased liberty unto the Christian church, and made them fully free from the observation of those Levitical ceremonies, ch. v. 1; hence this freedom is called "Our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus;"] or to see whether Paul would stand up in defence of that freedom from the ceremonial law which he had taught as the doctrine of the Gospel, and represented as the privilege of those who embraced the Christian religion. And their design herein was to bring them into bondage, which they would have effected, could they have gained the point they aimed at; for had they prevailed with Paul and the other apostles to have circumcised Titus they would easily have imposed circumcision upon other Gentiles, and so have brought them under the bondage of the law of Moses. But Paul, seeing their design, would by no means yield to them; he would not "give place by subjection, no, not for an hour." Not in this one single instance; and the reason of it was, that the truth of the Gospel might continue with them—that the Gentile Christians, and particularly the Galatians, might have it preserved to them pure and entire, and not corrupted with the mixtures of Judaism, as it would have been had he yielded in this matter. Circumcision was at that time a thing indifferent, and what in some cases might be complied with without sin; and accordingly we find even Paul himself sometimes giving way to it, as in the case of Timothy, Acts xvi. 3. But when it is insisted on as necessary, and his consenting to it, though only in a single instance, was like to be improved as giving countenance to such an imposition, he has too great a concern for the purity and liberty of the Gospel to submit to it; he would not yield to those that were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, but would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free; which conduct of his may give us occasion to observe, that what under some circumstances may lawfully be complied with, yet, when that cannot be done without betraying the truth, or giving up the liberty of the Gospel, it ought to be refused.

3. That though he conversed with the other apostles, yet he did not receive any addition to his knowledge or authority from them, ver. 4. By those "who

ii. 1. "Fourteen years after:" after what? Two views are maintained—1, after his conversion; 2, after the visit mentioned in chap. i. 18. Of recent commentators Ellicott and Alford adopt the first; Lightfoot, however, gives some good reasons for maintaining the second. Nearly all recent writers agree in identifying this visit with the one mentioned in Acts xv. "There is a great concurrence of the best writers in placing this visit in either A.D. 50 or 51. St. Paul himself places it 'fourteen years' after either his conversion or the first visit. In the former case we have 37 or 38 for the date of his conversion."

ii. 2. "By revelation:" in St. Luke's narrative (Acts xv. 2) the reason for the visit is stated to be the difficulties which were occurring at Antioch. St. Paul here attributes his action in the matter to the influence of the Holy Spirit, who unfolded to him the grave issues which were involved in the question. "Privately:" he laid before the apostles at Jerusalem the Gospel he had been preaching, lest by seemed to be somewhat," he means the other apostles, particularly James, Peter, and John, whom he afterwards mentions by name, ver. 9. And concerning these he grants that they were deservedly had in reputation by all; that they were looked upon, and justly too, as pillars of the church, who were set not only for the ornament but support of it; and that on some accounts they might seem to have the advantage of him, in that they had seen Christ in the flesh, which he had not, and were apostles before him, yea, even while he continued a persecutor. But yet, whatever they were it was no matter to him. This was no prejudice to his being equally an apostle with them; for God does not accept the persons of men on the account of any such outward advantages. As he had called them to this office, so he was at liberty to qualify others for it, and to employ them in it. And it was evident in his case that he had done so; for "in conference they added nothing to him," they told him nothing but what he before knew by revelation, nor could they except against the doctrine which he communicated to them; from whence it appeared that he was not at all inferior to them, but was as much called and qualified to be an apostle as they themselves were.

4. That the issue of this conversation was, that the other apostles were fully convinced of his Divine mission and authority, and accordingly acknowledged him as their fellow-apostle, ver. 7—11. They were not only satisfied with his doctrine, but they saw a Divine power attending him, both in preaching it and in working miracles for the confirmation of it; "that he who wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in him towards the Gentiles," and from hence they justly concluded that the "Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to Paul, as the Gospel of the circumcision was to Peter." And therefore, perceiving the grace that was given to him, that he was designed to the honour and office of an apostle as well as themselves, they gave unto him and Barnabas "the right hand of fellowship," a symbol whereby they acknowledged their equality with them, and agreed that these should go to the heathen, while they continued to preach to the circumcision; as judging it most agreeable to the mind of Christ, and most conducive to the interest of Christianity, so to divide their work.

[Here note that, 1. The office of preaching the Gospel is a special trust, whereby a rich treasure of saving truths, 2 Cor. iv. 7, is concredited to weak men, who must be answerable to God how they keep, maintain, and dispose that treasure for the good of souls; hence he saith, "the Gospel was committed," or, as a rich treasure, entrusted to him; "The Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me." 2. It is not the pains of ministers, Isa. xlix. 4, or any virtue which is in the word preached, as of itself, 1 Cor. i. 18, from whence the success of the ministry among a people floweth, but from the effectual working of the Spirit of God, whereby he effectually worketh that which the word doth press upon us, 1 Cor. ii. 6; for Paul ascribeth the success both of his own and Peter's ministry to this; "He that wrought effectually in Peter, the same was mighty in me."]

And thus this meeting ended in an entire harmony and agreement; they approved both Paul's doctrine and conduct, they were fully satisfied in him, and heartily embraced him as an apostle of Christ, and had nothing farther to add, only that they would "remember the poor," which of his own accord he was very forward to do. The Christians of Judaea were at that time labouring under great wants and difficulties, and the apostles, out of their compassion to them, and concern for them, recommend their case to Paul, that he should use his interest with the Gentile churches to procure a supply for them. This was but a reasonable request, "for if the Gentiles were made partakers of their spiritual things, it was their duty to minister to them in carnal things," as Rom. xv. 27. And he very readily falls in with it, whereby he shewed his charitable and catholic disposition; how ready he was to own the Jewish converts as brethren, though many of them could scarce allow the like favour to the converted Gentiles, and that mere difference of opinion was no reason with him why he should not endeavour to relieve and help them. And herein he has given us an excellent pattern of Christian charity, and has taught us that we should by no means confine it to those that are just of the same sentiments with us, but be ready to extend it to all whom we have reason to look upon as the disciples of Christ.

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. 12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. 13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. 14 But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? 15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, 16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. 17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

any means he should run in vain; not that St. Paul had any misgiving on the Gospel he had been preaching. This view is alien to the drift of his argument, which has affirmed his independence of the apostles of the circumcision; but "the words must be taken to express his fear lest the Judaic Christians, by insisting on the Mosaic ritual, might thwart his past and present endeavours to establish a church on a liberal basis" (Lightfoot).

ii. 4. Ellicott takes this verse as explaining why Titus was not

18 For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor. 19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God. 20 I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. 21 I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

From the account which Paul gives of what passed between him and the other apostles at Jerusalem, the Galatians might easily discern both the falseness of what his enemies had insinuated against him, and their own folly and weakness in departing from that Gospel which he had preached to them. But to give the greater weight to what he had already said, and more fully to fortify them against the insinuations of the Judaizing teachers, he acquaints them with another interview which he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch, and what passed between them there, ver. 11—14. Antioch was one of the chief churches of the Gentile Christians, as Jerusalem was of those Christians that turned from Judaism to the faith of Christ. There is no colour of reason for the supposition that Peter was bishop of Antioch. If he had been, surely Paul would not have withstood him in his own church, as we here find he did; but, on the contrary, it is here spoken of as an occasional visit which he made thither. In their other meeting there had been a good harmony and agreement. Peter and the other apostles had both acknowledged Paul's commission and approved his doctrine, and they parted very good friends. But in this Paul finds himself obliged to oppose Peter, for he was to be blamed; a plain evidence that he was not inferior to him, and consequently of the weakness of the pope's pretence to supremacy and infallibility, as the successor of Peter. Here we may observe,

First, Peter's fault. When he came among the Gentile churches he complied with them, and did eat with them, though they were not circumcised, agreeably to the instructions which were given in particular to him, Acts x. when he was warned by the heavenly vision to call nothing common or unclean. But when there came some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem he grew more shy of the Gentiles, only to humour them of the circumcision, and for fear of giving them offence, which doubtless was to the great grief and discouragement of the Gentile churches. Then "he withdrew, and separated himself." And his fault herein had an ill influence upon others, for the other Jews separated with him; though before they might be better disposed, yet now, from his example, they took on them to scruple eating with the Gentiles, and pretended they could not in conscience do it, because they were not circumcised. And (would you think it?) Barnabas himself, one of the apostles of the Gentiles, and one that had been instrumental in planting and watering the churches of the Gentiles, "was carried away with their dissimulation." Here note, 1. The weakness and inconstancy of the best of men when left to themselves, and how apt they are to falter in their duty to God, out of an undue regard to the pleasing of men. And, 2. The great force of bad examples, especially the examples of great men and good men, such as are in reputation for wisdom and honour.

Secondly, The rebuke which Paul gave him for his fault. Notwithstanding Peter's character, yet, when he observes him thus behaving himself, to the great prejudice both of the truth of the Gospel and the peace of the church, he is not afraid to reprove him for it. Paul stuck resolutely to his principles when others faltered in theirs; he was as good a Jew as any of them, for he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, but he would magnify his office as the apostle of the Gentiles, and therefore would not see them discouraged and tripped upon. When he "saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the Gospel," that they did not live up to that principle which the Gospel taught, and which they had professed to own and embrace, namely, that by the death of Christ the partition wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and the observation of the law of Moses was no longer in force; when he observed this, as Peter's offence was public, so he publicly reproveth him for it; he said unto him before them all, "If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" Herein one part of his conduct was a contradiction to the other; for if he who was a Jew could himself sometimes dispense with the use of the ceremonial law, and live after the manner of the Gentiles, this shewed that he did not look upon the observation of it as still necessary, even for the Jews themselves; and, therefore, that he could not consistently with his own practice impose it upon the Gentile Christians. And yet this Paul chargeth him with, yea, represents him as compelling the Gentiles to live as did the Jews,—not by open force and violence, but this was the tendency of what he did; for it was in effect to signify this, that the Gentiles must comply with the Jews, or else not be admitted into Christian communion.

Paul having thus established his character and office, and sufficiently shewn that he was not inferior to any of the apostles, no, not to Peter himself, from the account of the reproof he gave him he takes occasion to speak of that great fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, namely, that justification is only by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law, (though some think all that he saith to the end of the chapter is what he said to Peter at Antioch,) which doctrine condemned Peter for his symbolizing with the Jews. For, if it was the principle of his religion that the Gospel is [reveals] the instrument of our justification, and not the law, then he did very ill in countenancing them that kept up the law, and were for mixing it with faith in the business of our justification. This was the doctrine which Paul had preached among the Galatians, which he still adhered to, and which it is his great business in this epistle to mention and confirm. Now, concerning this, Paul acquaints us,

1. With the practice of the Jewish Christians themselves. "We," says he, "who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles," even we that have been born and bred in the Jewish religion, and not among the impure Gentiles, "knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we" ourselves "have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law." And if we have thought it necessary to seek justification by the faith of Christ, why then should we hamper ourselves with the law? what did we believe in Christ for? was it not that we might be justified by the faith of Christ? and if so, is it not folly to go back to the law, and to expect to be justified either by the merit of moral works or the influence of any ceremonial sacrifices or purifications? And if it would be wrong in us, who are Jews by nature, to return to the law, and expect justification by it, would it not be much more so circumcised: "now it was because," &c. Lightfoot would begin here a fresh sentence which is never completed: "But because of false brethren (to satisfy or disarm them), yet (verse 5) we did not yield." His conjecture is that in the incompleting sentence St. Paul hints at the influence brought to bear upon him to yield the point for the sake of peace. The sense would be, "Titus was not circumcised; but to satisfy the false brethren, some counselled me to submit, but not for a moment would we do so."

to require this of the Gentiles, who were never subject to it, since "by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified?" And, to give the greater weight to this, he adds, ver. 17, "But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is Christ the minister of sin?" that is, if while we seek justification by Christ alone, and teach others to do so, we ourselves are found giving countenance or indulgence to sin, or rather are accounted sinners of the Gentiles, and such as it is not fit to have communion with, unless we also observe the law of Moses—is "Christ the minister of sin?" will it not follow that he is so, if he engages us to receive a doctrine that gives liberty to sin, or by which we are so far from being justified that we remain impure sinners, and unfit to be conversed with? This he intimates would be the consequence, but he rejects it with abhorrence. God forbid, says he, that we should entertain such a thought of Christ, or of his doctrine, that thereby he should direct us into a way of justification that is defective and ineffectual, and leaves those that embrace it still unjustified, or that would give the least encouragement to sin and sinners. This would be very dishonourable to Christ, and it would be very injurious to them also. "For," says he, ver. 18, "if I build again the things which I destroyed;" if I (or any other) who have taught that the observation of the Mosaic law is not necessary to justification, should now by word or practice teach or intimate that it is necessary, "I make myself a transgressor." I own myself to be still an impure sinner, and to remain under the guilt of sin, notwithstanding my faith in Christ; or I shall be liable to be charged with deceit and prevarication, and acting inconsistently with myself.

["Thus by the preaching of the Gospel I have destroyed the law, that it may no more bear rule in the conscience. For when the new guest, Christ, comes into his new house, that he may dwell there alone, then the old colonist, Moses, must give way, and migrate elsewhere. Now, where Christ, the new guest, is, there the law, sin, wrath, death, have no place; but there are present only grace, righteousness, joy, life, a complete filial confidence in a pacified, gracious, and propitious Father through Christ. Then should I, by expelling Christ and destroying his kingdom, which by the Gospel I have planted, build the law again, and erect a kingdom for Moses? This is what I should do were I, as false apostles are wont to do, to teach circumcision and the keeping of the law as necessary to salvation: and in this manner I should restore, in the place of righteousness and life, sin and death; for the law only discovers sin, produces wrath, and kills."—Luther on Galatians, as translated by Owen.]

Thus does the apostle argue for the great doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, from the principles and practice of the Jewish Christians themselves, and from the consequences that would attend their departure from it; from whence it appeared that Peter, and the other Jews, were much in the wrong for refusing to communicate with the Gentile Christians, and endeavouring to bring them under the bondage of the law.

2. He acquaints us what his own judgment and practice was.

1st. That he was "dead to the law." Whatever account others might make of it, yet for his part he was dead to it. He knew that the moral law denounced a curse against all that continue not in all things written therein to do them; and therefore he was dead to it, as to all hope of justification and salvation that way. And as for the ceremonial law, he also knew that was now antiquated and superseded by the coming of Christ, and therefore the substance being come, he had no longer any regard to the shadow. And he was thus dead to the law, through the law itself; it discovered itself to be at an end. By considering the law itself he saw that justification was not to be expected by the works of it, since none could perform a perfect obedience to it, and that there was now no farther need of the sacrifices and purifications of it—since they were done away in Christ, and a period was put to them by his offering up himself a sacrifice for us—and therefore the more he looked into it the more he saw that there was no occasion for keeping up that regard to it which the Jews pleaded for. But though he was thus "dead to the law," yet he does not look upon himself as without law; he had renounced all hopes of justification by the works of it, and was unwilling any longer to continue under the bondage of it, but he was far from thinking himself discharged from his duty to God; on the contrary, he was dead to the law "that he might live unto God." The doctrine of the Gospel, which he had embraced, instead of weakening the bond of duty upon him, did but the more strengthen and confirm it; and therefore, though he was dead to the law, yet it was only in order to his living a new and better life to God, as Rom. vii. 4, 6; such a life as would be more agreeable and acceptable to God than his observation of the Mosaic law could now be, namely, a life of faith in Christ, and under the influence thereof, of holiness and righteousness towards God. And agreeably hereunto he acquaints us,

2nd. That as he was dead to the law, so he was alive unto God through Jesus Christ; ver. 20, "I am crucified with Christ," &c. And here in his own person he gives us a most excellent description of the mysterious life of a believer. First. He is crucified, and yet he lives. The old man is crucified, Rom. vi. 6, out the new man living; he is dead to the world, and dead to the law, and yet alive to God and Christ. Sin is mortified, and grace quickened. Secondly. He lives, and yet not he; this is strange, "I live, and yet not I." He lives in the exercise of grace; he has the comforts and the triumphs of grace, and yet that grace is not from himself, but from another. Believers see themselves living in a state of dependence. Thirdly. He is "crucified with Christ," and yet Christ lives in him. This results from his mystical union with Christ, by means of which he is interested in the life of Christ, so as by virtue of that to die unto sin; and yet interested in the life of Christ, so as by virtue of that to live unto God. Fourthly. He lives in the flesh, and yet lives by faith. "To outward appearance he lives as other people do, his natural life is supported as others' are, but yet he hath a higher and nobler principle that supports and actuates him, namely, that of faith in Christ, and especially as eyeing the wonders of his love in giving himself for him; hence it is that, though he lives in the flesh, yet he does not live after the flesh. Note, They that have true faith do live by that faith; and the great thing which faith fastens upon is Christ's loving us, and giving himself for us. The great evidence of Christ's loving us is his giving himself for us; and this is that we are chiefly concerned to mix faith with, in order to our living to him.

[This verse shews more fully that justified persons are most strictly tied to mortify sin and lead a holy life, if so they walk according to the prescript of the doctrine of justification which was taught by Paul; for he, and by consequence all real believers, were "crucified with Christ," to wit, the old man of their indwelling corruption, Rom. vi. 6; it did receive the stroke of death by his death, he having by death redeemed them from the slavery of it, Tit. ii. 24; which crucifixion with Christ doth not destroy the natural life of believers, for so Paul sheweth he did live. Only the old man of corruption doth not live in them so as to act upon them in what they do, but Jesus Christ doth live in them, he being united to them as the root to the branches, or head to the members, and furnishing them with spiritual life and motion, whereby the very natural life which they live, and those things which concern that life, are ordered and gone about by virtue of strength drawn from Christ, by faith in him; and the consideration of Christ's love to them, and his dying for them because he loved them, is a great inducement unto justified persons so to live. Now, this being true in Paul, and in some measure in all believers, and seeing the principles of the doctrine of justification did bind all to this, it is evident that to affirm this doctrine did tend to foster sin is but a foul-forged calumny. Note, That though the full persuasion and assurance of Christ's special love unto and his dying for me in particular, is not the very essence and being of saving faith, Eph. i. 13, for saving faith may be without it, Isa. i. 10, yet it is a thing which may be had without extraordinary revelation, the Spirit of God enabling the believer to discern in himself those graces (1 Cor. ii. 12) which are set down as marks of his special love and favour in Scripture, 1 Jno. iii. 14–24, and bearing witness with his spirit that he is a child of God, Rom. viii. 16; and this assurance should be aimed at in the right method by all, 2 Pet. i. 10; for Paul, speaking in the name of other believers, sheweth he had attained it; "Who loved me, and gave himself for me," saith he. This full persuasion and assurance, in its own nature, is so far from making those who have it loose the reins to wickedness and security, that, upon the contrary, it serveth as a strong incitement to make them mortify sin, and live that spiritual life of faith which is here spoken of; for it served for this use unto Paul: "I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."]

The apostle concludes this discourse with acquainting us that by the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, which he asserted, and others opposed, he avoided two great difficulties, which the contrary opinion was loaded with; namely, 1st. That he did not "frustrate the grace of God," which the doctrine of justification by the works of the law did; for, as he argues, Rom. xi. 6, "If it be of works, it is no more of grace." 2nd. That he did not frustrate the death of Christ, whereas "if righteousness come by the law," then it must follow "that Christ is dead in vain;" for if we look for salvation by the law of Moses, then we render the death of Christ needless; for to what purpose should he be appointed to die if we might have been saved without it?

CHAPTER III.

The apostle in this chapter, I. Reproves the Galatians for their folly in suffering themselves to be drawn away from the faith of the Gospel, and endeavours from several considerations to impress them with a sense of it. II. He proves the doctrine which he had reproved them for departing from, viz., that of justification by faith without the works of the law, 1. From the example of Abraham's justification; 2. From the nature and tenor of the law; 3. From the express testimony of the Old Testament. And, 4. From the stability of the covenant of God with Abraham. And lest any should hereupon say, wherefore then serveth the law? he answers, 1st. It was added because of transgressions; 2nd. It was given to convince the world of the necessity of a saviour. 3rd. It was designed as a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. And then he concludes the chapter by acquainting us with the privilege of Christians under the gospel state.

FOOLISH Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you? 2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? 3 Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh? 4 Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain. 5 He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

ANCYRA—THE CAPITAL OF GALATIA.—VER. 1.

ii. 11–14. "Peter was to be blamed;" "was to be condemned," or "was condemned"—i.e., self-condemned by his own conduct. The date of this occurrence is placed by some before the visit to Jerusalem just spoken of, by others immediately after. The "withstanding of St. Peter was no opposition of Pauline to Petrine views; it was a faithful rebuke of blamable moral weakness." The progress of the defection at Antioch may be traced, Peter "gradually withdrew," and ultimately separated himself from the Gentile converts with whom he had before freely associated. This conduct was out of deference to or fear of the converts from Judaism. This led the rest of the Jewish converts (other Jews) to act a similarly disingenuous part; and even Barnabas, adds St. Paul, was swept away by the flood of opinion.

iii. 4. "Have ye suffered," &c.: Alford and Lightfoot render, "Did ye suffer so many things in vain?" The history says nothing of these persecutions; but when the converts in the neighbouring

The apostle is here dealing with those that, having embraced the faith of Christ, yet still continued to seek for justification by the works of the law, that is, who depended upon their own obedience to the moral precepts as their righteousness before God, and wherein that was defective had recourse to the legal sacrifices and purifications to make it up. These he first sharply reproves, and then endeavours by the evidence of truth to convince them. And this is the right method, when we reprove any for a fault or an error, to convince them that it is an error, that it is a fault.

He reproves them, and the reproof is very close and warm; he calls them "foolish Galatians," ver. 1. Though as Christians they were wisdom's children, yet as corrupt Christians they were foolish children. Yea, he asks, "Who hath bewitched you?" whereby he represents them as enchanted by the arts and snares of their seducing teachers, and so far deluded as to act very unlike themselves; and that wherein their folly and infatuation appeared was, that they did "not obey the truth," that is, they did not adhere to the Gospel way of justification, wherein they had been taught, and which they had professed to embrace. Note, 1. It is not enough to know the truth, and to say we believe it; but we must obey it too, we must heartily submit to it, and steadfastly abide by it. And, 2. That those are spiritually bewitched who, when the truth as it is in Jesus is plainly set before them, will not thus obey it. Several things proved and aggravated the folly of these Christians.

First, Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth as crucified among them; that is, they had had the doctrine of the cross preached to them, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper administered among them, in both which Christ crucified had been set before them. Now, it was the greatest madness that could be for them, who had had acquaintance with such sacred mysteries, and admittance to such great solemnities, not to obey the truth which was thus published to them, and signed and sealed in that ordinance. Note, The consideration of the honours and privileges we have been admitted to as Christians should shame us out of the folly of apostasy and backsliding.

[Ministers ought not to rest upon a coldrite (inanimate) way of preaching truth, Mat. vii. 29, but are to endeavour the delivery of it with that perspicuity and plainness, Col. iv. 4, that power and liveliness, 1 Cor. ii. 4, as it may penetrate the conscience of the hearers, and be as clear and evident to them as if it were pictured and painted out before their eyes; and, in order to this, they would not only labour to understand thoroughly what they preach, 1 Tim. i. 17, but also to believe it themselves, 2 Cor. iv. 13, and to have their own affections in some measure warmed with love to it, 1 Tim. i. 15. And above all, would labour with God, that the effectual operation of his Spirit may come along with what they preach, 1 Cor. ii. 4, that so the truth delivered may be the more lively, and convincingly represented to the hearers: for Paul did so preach; "Jesus Christ was evidently set forth, crucified among them, before their eyes;" he did so represent Christ and him crucified to their ears, by the preaching of the word, as if they had seen him with their eyes.]

Secondly, He appeals to the experiences they had had of the working of the Spirit upon their souls, ver. 2; he puts them in mind that upon their becoming Christians they had received the Spirit, that many of them at least had been made partakers, not only of the sanctifying influences, but of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were eminent proofs of the truth of the Christian religion, and the several doctrines of it, and especially of this, that justification is by Christ only, and not by the works of the law, which was one of the peculiar and fundamental principles of it. And to convince them of the folly of their departing from this doctrine, he desires to know how they came by these gifts and graces; was it "by the works of the law," that is, the preaching the necessity of these in order to justification? This they could not say, for that doctrine had not then been preached to them, nor had they, as Gentiles, any pretence to justification that way. Or was it by the "hearing of faith," that is, the preaching of the doctrine of faith in Christ, as the only way of justification? This, if they would say the truth, they were obliged to own, and therefore must be very unreasonable if they should reject a doctrine the good effects of which they had had such experience of. Note, 1. That it is usually by the ministry of the Gospel [Gospel preached and heard] that the Spirit is communicated to persons.

[Our justification before God, and the renovation of our natures by the Spirit of God, are so much conjoined, that the doctrine which, through God's blessing, is the means of working the former, is also the only doctrine appointed of God for holding forth the right way of attaining the latter: for Paul argueth that the doctrine of justification, without works, is divine, because that doctrine was the means of conveying sanctifying grace into their hearts; as appeareth from the scope of the argument here used, "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?"]

And, 2. That they are very unwise who suffer themselves to be turned away from that ministry and doctrine which has been blessed to their spiritual advantage.

Thirdly, He calls upon them to consider their past and present conduct, and from thence to judge whether they were not acting very weakly and unreasonably, ver. 3, 4. He tells them that they had "begun in the Spirit," but now were seeking to be "made perfect by the flesh;" they had embraced the doctrine of the Gospel, by means of which they had received the Spirit, and wherein only the true way of justification is revealed. And thus they had begun well; but now they were turning to the law, and expecting to be advanced to higher degrees of perfection, by adding the observation of it to faith in Christ, in order to their justification, which could end in nothing but their shame and disappointment: for this, instead of being an improvement upon the Gospel, was really a perversion of it; and while they sought to be justified in this way, they were so far from being more perfect Christians, that they were more in danger of becoming no Christians at all; hereby they were pulling down with one hand what they had built with the other, and undoing what they had hitherto done in Christianity. Yea, he farther puts them in mind that they had not only embraced the Christian doctrine, but suffered for it too, and therefore their folly would be the more aggravated, if now they should desert it; for in this case all that they had suffered would be in vain, it would appear that they had been foolish in suffering for what they now deserted, and their sufferings would be altogether in vain, and of no advantage to them. Note, 1. It is the folly of apostates that they lose the benefit of all they have done in religion, or suffered for it. 2. That it is very sad for any to live in an age of services and sufferings, of sabbaths, sermons, and sacraments, in vain; in this case former righteousness shall not be mentioned. [3. Though those who have suffered much for truth should afterward make defection from it, we are nevertheless to keep charity towards them, as hoping God will give them repentance, and reclaim them.]

Fourthly, He puts them in mind that they had had ministers among them, (and particularly himself,) who came with a Divine seal and commission; for they had ministered the Spirit to them and wrought miracles among them; and he appeals to them whether they did it "by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith;" whether the doctrine that was preached by them, and confirmed [not only by the fruits of the Spirit of regeneration and saving grace, but] by the miraculous gifts and operations of the Spirit, was that of justification by the works of the law, or by the faith of Christ; they very well knew it was not the former, but the latter; and therefore must needs be inexcusable in forsaking a doctrine which had been so signally owned and attested, and exchanging it for one that had received no such attestations.

6 Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. 7 Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham. 8 And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. 9 So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham. 10 For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them. 11 But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith. 12 And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them shall live in them. 13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: 14 That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith. 15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto. 16 Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. 17 And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. 18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

The apostle having reproved the Galatians for their not obeying the truth, and endeavoured to impress them with a sense of their folly herein, in these verses he largely proves the doctrine which he had proved them for the rejecting of; namely, that of justification by faith without the works of the law. This he does several ways.

First, From the example of Abraham's justification; which argument this same apostle uses, Rom. iv.; "Abraham believed God, and that was accounted to him for righteousness," ver. 6; that is, his faith fastened upon the word and promise of God, and upon his believing he was owned and accepted of God as a righteous man. And as on this account he is represented as the father of the faithful, so the apostle would have us to know that they who are of faith are the children of Abraham, ver. 7; not according to the flesh, but according to the promise, and consequently that they are justified in the same way that he was. Abraham was justified by faith, and so are they; and, to confirm this, the apostle acquaints us that the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3, "In thee shall all nations be blessed," had a reference hereunto, ver. 8. The Scripture is said to foresee, because he that indited the Scripture did foresee that God would justify the heathen world in the way of faith; and therefore in Abraham, that is, in the seed of Abraham, which is Christ, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also, should be blessed; not only blessed in the seed of Abraham, but blessed as Abraham was, being justified as he was. This the apostle calls preaching the Gospel to Abraham, and from thence infers, ver. 9, that they who are of faith, that is, true believers, of what nation soever they be, "are blessed with the faithful Abraham." They are blessed with Abraham the Father of the faithful, by the promise made to him, and therefore by faith as he was. It was through faith in the promise of God that he was blessed and it is only in the same way that others obtain this privilege.

Secondly, He shews that we cannot be justified but by faith fastening on the Gospel, because the law condemn us. If we put ourselves upon trial in that court, and stand to the sentence of it, we are certainly cast, and lost, and undone; "for as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse," that is, as many as depend upon the merit of their own works as their righteousness, that plead not guilty, and insist upon their own justification, the cause will certainly go against them; "for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them," ver. 10; and Deut. xxvii. 26. The condition of life by the law is perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience,—the language of it is, Do this and live; or, as ver. 12, "The man that doeth them shall live in them," and for every failure provinces of Pisidia, Lycania, and proconsular Asia suffered (Acts xiv. xix. 23; 2 Cor. i. 8), it is unlikely the Galatians escaped.

iii. 5. "He that ministereth," or "supplieth to you the Spirit, and worketh mighty works." "It is important," says Lightfoot, "to notice how here, as in the Epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul assumes the possession of these extraordinary powers by his converts as an acknowledged fact."

iii. 8. "The promise to Abraham was an anticipation of the Gospel, not only as announcing the Messiah, but as involving the doctrine of righteousness by faith." "Blessed:" in this quotation Gen. xii. 3 and Gen. xviii. 18 are blended together.

iii. 15. "Confirmed:" this word, both here and in verse 17, Alford renders "ratified." "Addeth thereto:" i.e., adds fresh clauses. "Covenant:" "The word may mean either testament or covenant, but in the New Testament, with only one exception (Heb. ix. 15–17), it means covenant" (Lightfoot).

herein the law denounces a curse. Unless our obedience be universal, continuing in all things that are written in the book of the law, and unless it be perpetual too—if in any instance, at any time, we fail and come short—we fall under the curse of the law. The curse is wrath revealed, and ruin threatened. It is a separation unto all evil, and this is in full force, power, and virtue against all sinners, and therefore against all men; for all have sinned and are become guilty before God; and if as transgressors of the law we are under the curse of it, it must be a vain thing to look for justification by it. But though this is not to be expected from the law, yet the apostle afterwards acquaints us that there is a way open to our escaping this curse, and regaining the favour of God, namely, through faith in Christ, who, as he says, ver. 13, “has redeemed us from the curse of the law,” &c. A strange method it was which Christ took to redeem us from the curse of the law; it was by his being himself made a curse for us; being made sin for us, he was made a curse for us; not separated from God, but laid for the present under that infamous token of the Divine displeasure, which the law of Moses had put a particular brand upon, Deu. xxi. 23; and the design of this was, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ. [Or, as it is in the original, in Jesus Christ: so that this blessing is still in him, as the fountain and dispenser of it.] That all who believed on Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, might become heirs of Abraham’s blessing, and particularly of that “promise of the Spirit,” [promised Spirit.—Luther], which was peculiarly reserved for the times of the Gospel. And from hence it appeared that it was not by putting themselves under the law, but by faith in Christ, that they became the people of God and heirs of the promise. Here note, 1. The misery which as sinners we are sunk into; we are under the curse and condemnation of the law. [2. There is no delivery of enslaved man from this woful bondage but by giving satisfaction and by paying of a price for the wrong done to Divine justice, either by himself, or by some surety in his stead: God’s fidelity, Gen. ii. 17, his righteous nature, Ps. xi. 6, 7, and the inward desert of sin, Rom. i. 32, do call for it; for “Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law;” the word signifieth to deliver by giving a price.] 3. The love and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ towards us; he has submitted to be made a curse for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law. 4. The happy prospect which we now have through him, not only of escaping the curse, but of inheriting the blessing. 5. That it is only through faith that we can hope to obtain this favour. [6. Faith doth justify and make us blessed, not for any worth in itself, as if the work and merit of faith were reckoned to us for righteousness, but because it is the instrument, and, as it were, the hand of the soul, whereby we receive the promise, and Christ in the promise, whose satisfaction alone is our only righteousness before God, Rom. v. 19; for that Paul is to be understood thus all along this dispute appeareth from these two verses, wherein he ascribeth our delivery from the curse, and partaking of Abraham’s blessing, to Christ’s merit, or to his being made a curse for us, giving unto faith only the receiving and embracing of that satisfaction, as it is offered in the promise; “That we might receive the promise through faith,” saith he.]

Thirdly. To prove that justification is by faith, and not by the works of the law, the apostle alleges the express testimony of the Old Testament, ver. 11. The place referred to is Hab. ii. 4, where it is said, “The just shall live by faith;” it is again quoted, Rom. i. 17, and Heb. x. 38; and the design of it is to shew that they are only such as are just or righteous who do truly live, who are freed from death and wrath, and restored into a state of life in the favour of God; and that it is only through faith that persons become righteous, and as such obtain this life and happiness, that they are accepted of God, and enabled to live to him now, and are entitled to an eternal life in the enjoyment of him hereafter. And from hence the apostle says, it is evident, that “no man is justified by the law in the sight of God.” Whatever he may be in the account of others, yet he is not so in the sight of God, for the law is not of faith; that says nothing concerning faith in the business of justification, nor does it give life to those that believe; but the language of it is, “That the man that doth them shall live in them,” as Lev. xviii. 5. It requires perfect obedience as the condition of life, and therefore now can by no means be the rule of our justification; and this argument of the apostle’s may give us occasion to remark that justification by faith is no new doctrine, but what was established and taught in the church of God long before the times of the Gospel. Yea, it is the only way wherein any sinners ever were or can be justified.

Fourthly. To this purpose the apostle urges the stability of the covenant which God made with Abraham, which was not vacated or disannulled by the giving of the law to Moses, ver. 15, &c. Faith had the precedence of the law, for Abraham was justified by faith. It was a promise that he built upon, and promises are the proper objects of faith. God entered into covenant with Abraham, ver. 8; and this covenant was firm and steady; even men’s covenants are so, and therefore much more his. When a deed is executed, or articles of agreement sealed, both parties are bound, and it is too late then to settle things otherwise; and therefore it is not to be supposed that by the subsequent law the covenant of God should be vacated. The original word, diathēkē, signifies both a covenant and a testament. Now, the promise made to Abraham was rather a testament than a covenant. When a testament is become of force by the death of the testator, it is not capable of being altered; and therefore the promise that was given to Abraham being of the nature of a testament, it remains firm and unalterable; but if it should be said that a grant or testament may be defeated for want of persons to claim the benefit of it, therefore, ver. 16, he shews that there is no danger of that in this case. Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead, but the covenant is made with Abraham and his seed; and he gives us a very surprising exposition of that. We should have thought it had been meant only of the people of the Jews; nay, saith the apostle, it is in the singular number, and points at a single person,—that seed is Christ. So that the covenant is still in force, for Christ abideth for ever in his person, and in his spiritual seed that are his by faith; and if it be objected that the law which was given by Moses did disannul this covenant, because that insisted so much upon works, and there was so little in it of faith or of the promised Messiah, he answers that the subsequent law could not disannul the precedent covenant or promise; for, ver. 18, “if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but,” says he, “God gave it to Abraham by promise,” and therefore it would be inconsistent with his holiness, wisdom, and faithfulness, by any subsequent act to set aside the promise, and so alter the way of justification, which he had thus established. If the inheritance was given to Abraham by promise, and thereby entailed upon his spiritual seed, we may be sure God would not retract that promise; for he is not a man that he should repent. [The only way of attaining right to this inheritance now, since the fall, is by God’s free gift, without the merit of works; for “God did give it to Abraham,” the father of all justified persons; the word signifieth he gave it freely, without respect had to Abraham’s works. The tender and offer of this gracious gift is made in the promises of the Gospel, which, being laid hold upon by faith, do entitle the believer to the tendered inheritance, 1 Jno. v. 10–12; for, saith he, “God gave it by promise.”]

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. 20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one. 21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. 22 But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. 23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. 24 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. 25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. 26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. 27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. 28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. 29 And if ye be Christ’s, then are ye Abraham’s seed, and heirs according to the promise.

The apostle having just before been speaking of the promise made to Abraham, and representing that as the rule of our justification and not the law, lest they should think he did too much derogate from the law, and render it altogether useless, he from thence takes occasion to discourse of the design and tendency of it, and to acquaint us for what purposes it was given. It might be asked, if that promise was sufficient for salvation, wherefore then serveth the law? or why did God give the law by Moses? To this he answers:

First. That the law “was added because of transgressions,” ver. 19. It was not designed to disannul the promise, and to establish a different way of justification from that which was settled by the promise; but it was added to it, annexed on purpose to be subservient to it, and it was so because of transgressions. The Israelites, though they were chosen to be God’s peculiar people, yet were sinners as well as others, and therefore the law was given to convince them of their sin and of their obnoxiousness to the Divine displeasure on the account of it; “for by the law is the knowledge of sin,” Rom. iii. 20; and “the law entered that sin might abound,” Rom. v. 20; and it was also intended to restrain them from the commission of sin, to put an awe upon their minds, and be a curb upon their lusts, that they should not run into that excess of riot which they were naturally inclined to; and yet at the same time it was designed to direct them unto the true and only way whereby sin was to be expiated, and wherein they might obtain the pardon of it, namely, through the death and sacrifice of Christ, which was the special use for which the law of sacrifices and purifications was given.

And the apostle adds that the law was given for this purpose, “till the seed should come to whom the promise was made,” that is, either till Christ should come, the principal seed referred to in the promise, as he had before shewn, or till the gospel dispensation should take place, when Jews and Gentiles without distinction should, upon believing, become the seed of Abraham. The law was added because of transgressions, till this fulness of time, or this complete dispensation, was come. But when the seed was come, and a fuller discovery of Divine grace in the promise was made, then the law, as given by Moses, was to cease; that covenant, being found faulty, was to give place to another and a better, Heb. viii. 7, 8; and though the law, considered as the law of nature, is always in force, and still continues to be of use to convince men of sin, and to restrain them from it, yet we are no longer under the bondage and terror of that legal covenant. The law then was not intended to discover another way of justification different from that revealed by the promise, but only to lead men to see their need of the promise, by shewing them the sinfulness of sin, and to point them to Christ, through whom alone they could be pardoned and justified.

And as a farther proof that the law was not designed to vacate the promise, the apostle adds, that “it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.” It was given to different persons, and in a different manner from the promise, and therefore for different purposes. The promise was made to Abraham and all his spiritual seed, including believers of all nations, even of the Gentiles as well as Jews; but the law was given to the Israelites as a peculiar people, and separated from the rest of the world. And whereas the promise was given immediately by God himself, the law was given by the ministry of angels, and the hand of a mediator, and from hence it appeared that the law could not be designed to set aside the promise; for, ver. 20, “a mediator is not a mediator of one,” that is, of one party only; but God is one, that is, but one party in the promise or covenant made with Abraham; and therefore it is not to be supposed that, by a transaction which passed only between him and the nation of the Jews, he should make void a promise which he had long before made to Abraham and all his spiritual seed, whether Jews or Gentiles. This would not have been consistent with his wisdom, or with his truth and faithfulness. Moses was only a mediator between God and the Israelites, not between God and the spiritual seed of Abraham; and therefore the law that was given by him could not affect the promise made to them, much less be subversive of it.

Secondly. The law was given to convince men of the necessity of a saviour. The apostle asks, ver. 21, as what some might be ready to object, “Is the law then against the promises of God?” do they really clash and interfere with

iii. 19, 20. “By angels:” “It was ordered or administered by means of angels. Angels were the instrumental enactors of law” (Alford). (Compare Acts vii. 53; Heb. ii. 2, 3; Deut. xxxiii. 2.) “Mediator:” Moses is generally allowed to be the mediator here referred to. The meaning appears to be, the idea of a mediator supposes two persons between whom the mediation is carried on; but God is one, he stands and acts alone, and dealt directly, without mediators, with Abraham.

iii. 23. “Before faith came, we were kept:” or, “kept in ward.”
iii. 24. “Schoolmaster:” the pedagogue or tutor was entrusted with the whole moral training of the child. The tempting explanation that the law was as “one to conduct us to the school of Christ” ought, says Lightfoot, probably to be abandoned. Christ is not represented as a teacher in the passage, but rather represents “the freedom of mature age, for which the constraints of childhood are a preparation.”

each other? or do you not set the covenant with Abraham and the law of Moses at variance with one another. To this he answers, God forbid; he was far from entertaining such a thought, nor could it be inferred from what he had said. The law is by no means inconsistent with the promise, but subservient to it, as the design of it is to discover men's transgressions, and to shew them the need they have of a better righteousness than that of the law. That consequence would much rather follow from their doctrine than from his; "for if there had been a law given that could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law," and in that case the promise would have been superseded, and rendered useless; but that in our present state could not be, for "the Scripture hath concluded all under sin," ver. 22; or declared that all, both Jew and Gentile, are in a state of guilt, and therefore unable to attain to righteousness and justification by the works of the law. That discovered their wounds, but could not afford them a remedy; it shewed that they were guilty, because it appointed sacrifices and purifications, which were manifestly insufficient to take away sin; and therefore the great design of it was "that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe;" that being convinced of their guilt, and the insufficiency of the law to effect a righteousness for them, they might be persuaded to believe on Christ, and so obtain the benefit of the promise.

Thirdly. The law was designed for a schoolmaster to bring men to Christ, ver. 24. In the foregoing verse the apostle acquaints us with the state of the Jews under the Mosaic economy; that before faith came, or before Christ appeared, and the doctrine of justification by faith in him was more fully discovered, they were "kept under the law," oblig'd on severe penalties to a strict observance of the various precepts of it; and at that time they were shut up, held under the terror and discipline of it as prisoners in a state of confinement; and the design of this was, that hereby they might be disposed more readily to embrace "the faith which should afterwards be revealed," or be persuaded to accept Christ when he came into the world, and to fall in with that better dispensation he was to introduce, whereby they were to be freed from that bondage and servitude, and brought into a state of greater light and liberty. Now in that state he tells them that the law was their schoolmaster to bring them to Christ, that they "might be justified by faith." As it declared the mind and will of God concerning them, and at the same time denounced a curse against them for every failure in their duty, so it was proper to convince them of their lost and undone condition in themselves, and to let them see the weakness and insufficiency of their own righteousness to recommend them to God; and as it obliged them to a variety of sacrifices, &c., which, though they could not of themselves take away sin, yet were typical of Christ, and of the great sacrifice which he was to offer up for the expiation of it, so it directed them (though in a more dark and obscure manner) to him, as their only relief and refuge. And thus it was their schoolmaster to instruct and govern them in their state of minority, or, as the word παιδαγωγός most properly signifies, their servant to lead and conduct them to Christ, (as children were wont to be led to school by those servants that had the care of them,) that they might be more fully instructed by him as their schoolmaster in the true way of justification and salvation, which is only by faith in him, and which he was appointed to give the fullest and clearest discoveries of. But lest it should be said, if the law was of this use and service under the Jewish, why may it not continue to be so under the Christian state too? the apostle adds, ver. 25, that "after faith is come," and the gospel dispensation had taken place, under which Christ, and the way of pardon and life through faith in him, is set in the clearest light, "we are no longer under a schoolmaster;" we have no such need of the law to direct us to him as there was then.

Thus the apostle acquaints us for what uses and purposes the law served; and from what he says concerning this matter we may observe, 1. The goodness of God to his people of old, in giving the law to them; for though in comparison of the gospel state it was a dispensation of darkness and terror, yet it furnished them with sufficient means and helps, both to direct them in their duty to God and to encourage their hopes in him. 2. The great fault and folly of the Jews, in mistaking the design of the law, and abusing it to a very different purpose from that which God intended in the giving of it; for they expected to be justified by the works of it, whereas it was never designed to be the rule of their justification, but only a means of convincing them of their guilt, and of their need of a Saviour, and of directing them to Christ, and faith in him, as the only way of obtaining this privilege: see Rom. ix. 31, 32; and ch. x. 3, 4. 3. The great advantage of the gospel state above the legal, under which we not only enjoy a clearer discovery of Divine grace and mercy than was afforded to the Jews of old, but are also freed from that state of bondage and terror under which they were held. We are not now treated as children in a state of minority, but as sons grown up to a full age, who are admitted to greater freedoms, and instated in larger privileges, than they were. This the apostle enlarges upon in the following verses. For, having shewn for what intent the law was given, in the close of the chapter he acquaints us with our privilege by Christ, where he particularly declares,

1st. That we "are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus," ver. 26. And here we may observe, First. The great and excellent privilege which, under the Gospel, real Christians enjoy. They are the children of God; they are no longer accounted servants, but sons; they are not now kept at such a distance, and under such restraints, as the Jews were, but are allowed a nearer and freer access to God than was granted to them; yea, they are admitted into the number, and have a right to all the privileges, of his children. Secondly. How they come to obtain this privilege; and that is "by faith in Christ Jesus." Having accepted him as their Lord and Saviour, and relying on him alone for justification and salvation, they are hereupon admitted into this happy relation to God, and are entitled to the privileges of it; for, Jno. i. 12, "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." And this faith in Christ, whereby they became the children of God, he acquaints us, ver. 27, was what they professed in baptism; for, he adds, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Having in baptism professed their faith in him, they were thereby devoted to him, and had, as it were, put on his livery, and declared themselves to be his servants and disciples; and, being thus become the members of Christ, they were through him owned and accounted as the children of God. Here note, 1st. That baptism is now the solemn rite of our admission into the Christian church, as circumcision was into that of the Jews. Our Lord Jesus appointed it to be so in the commission he gave to his apostles, Mat. xxviii. 19, and accordingly it was their practice to baptize those whom they had disciples to the Christian faith. And perhaps the apostle might take notice of their baptism here, and of their becoming the children of God through faith in Christ professed therein, to obviate a further objection, which the false teachers might be apt to urge in favour of circumcision. They might be ready to say, though it should be allowed that the law as given at mount Sinai was abrogated by the coming of Christ the promised seed, yet what reason was there that circumcision should be set aside too, when that was given to Abraham together with the promise, and long before the giving of the law by Moses? But this difficulty is sufficiently removed when the apostle says, that they who are baptized into Christ have put on Christ; [it is a metaphor taken from the garments which men put on to cover, adorn, and keep themselves warm;] for from thence it appears, that under the Gospel baptism comes in the room of circumcision, and that they who by baptism are devoted to Christ and do sincerely believe in him, are to all intents and purposes as much admitted into the privileges of the Christian state as the Jews were by circumcision into those of the legal. Phil. iii. 3; and therefore there was no reason why the use of that should still be continued. Note, 2nd. That in our baptism we put on Christ, therein we profess our discipleship to him, and are obliged to behave ourselves as his faithful servants. Being baptized into Christ we are baptized into his death; that, as he died and rose again, so, in conformity thereto, we should die unto sin, and walk in newness of life, Rom. vi. 3, 4, and it would be of great advantage to us did we oftener remember this.

2nd. That this privilege of being the children of God, and of being by baptism devoted to Christ, is now enjoyed in common by all real Christians. The law indeed made a difference between Jew and Greek, giving the Jews on many accounts the pre-eminence; that also made a difference between bond and free, master and servant, and between male and female, the males being circumcised; but it is not so now,—they all stand on the same level, and "are all one in Christ Jesus." As the one is not accepted on the account of any national or personal advantages he may enjoy above the other, so neither is the other rejected for the want of them; but all that sincerely believe on Christ, of what nation, or sex, or condition soever they be, are accepted of him, and become the children of God through faith in him.

3rd. That being Christ's, we are Abraham's seed, "and heirs according to the promise." Their Judaizing teachers would make them believe that they must be circumcised and keep the law of Moses, or they could not be saved. No, says the apostle, there is no need of that; for "if ye be Christ's," if you sincerely believe on him who is the promised seed, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, you thereby become the true seed of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and as such "are heirs according to the promise," and consequently are entitled to the great blessings and privileges of it. And therefore, upon the whole, since it appeared that justification was not to be attained by the works of the law, but only by faith in Christ, and that the law of Moses was a temporary institution, and was given for such purposes as were only subservient to, and not subversive of, the promise, and that now under the Gospel Christians enjoy much greater and better privileges than the Jews did under that dispensation, it must needs follow that they were very unreasonable and unwise in hearkening to those who at once endeavoured to deprive them of the truth and liberty of the Gospel.

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle in this chapter is still carrying on the same general design as in the former, namely, to recover these Christians from the impressions made upon them by the Judaizing teachers, and to represent their weakness and folly in suffering themselves to be drawn away from the gospel doctrine of justification, and to be deprived of their freedom from the bondage of the law of Moses. To this purpose he makes use of various considerations, such as, I. The great excellence of the gospel state above the legal, ver. 1—7. II. The happy change that was made in them at their conversion, ver. 8—11. III. The affection they had for him and his ministry, ver. 12—16. IV. The characters of the false teachers by whom they had been perverted, ver. 17, 18. V. The very tender affection he had for them, ver. 19, 20. VI. The history of Isaac and Ishmael, by a comparison taken from which he illustrates the difference between such as rested in Christ and such as trusted in the law. And in all these, as he uses great plainness and faithfulness with them, so he expresses the tenderest concern for them.

OW I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; 2 But is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. 3 Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: 4 But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, 5 To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. 6 And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. 7 Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

In this chapter the apostle deals plainly with those that hearkened to the Judaizing teachers, who cried up the law of Moses in competition with the Gospel of Christ, and endeavoured to bring them under the bondage of it; and to convince them of their folly, and to rectify their mistake therein, in these verses he prosecutes the comparison of a child under age, which he had touched upon in the foregoing chapter, and from thence shews what great advantages we have now under the Gospel above what they had under the law. And here, First. He acquaints us with the state of the Old Testament church. It was like a child under age, and it was used accordingly, being kept in a state of darkness and bondage, in comparison of that greater light and liberty which we enjoy under the Gospel. That was indeed a dispensation of grace, and yet it was comparatively a dispensation of darkness; for as the heir in his minority is "under tutors and governors till the time appointed of his Father," by whom he is educated and instructed in those things which at present he knows little of the meaning of, though afterwards they are likely to be of great use to him, so it was with the Old Testament church, the Mosaic economy which they were under was what they could not fully understand the meaning of;

iii. 27. "Have put on;" rather, "did put on Christ." The metaphor has been supposed to be taken from the white garments in which the newly-baptised were clothed. It seems, however, very doubtful whether the custom prevailed at so early a date.

iii. 28. "Are all one;" properly, "one man in Christ Jesus." (Compare Eph. ii. 15.)

iv. 1. "A child;" or, "an infant." The word probably is equivalent to a "minor" in any stage of his minority. His legal position was much the same as that of a "slave" or "bond-servant." Such is the force of the word here used.

iv. 2. "Tutors and governors;" controllers of his person, his guardians, are meant by "tutors;" by "governors," the stewards or bailiffs appointed to manage his property.

iv. 3. "The elements of the world;" most probably, "elementary teaching," the elementary principles of religion, not necessarily erroneous, but suited to the "child" state of the world. Compare for, as the apostle says, 2 Cor. iii. 13, "They could not stedfastly look to the end of that which was abolished." But to the church, when grown up to maturity in gospel days, it becomes of great use. And as that was a dispensation of darkness, so of bondage too; for "they were in bondage under the elements of the world," being tied to a great number of burdensome rites and observances, by which, as by a kind of first rudiments, they were taught and instructed, and whereby they were kept in a state of subjection, like a child under tutors and governors. The church then lay more under the character of a servant, being obliged to do every thing according to the command of God, without being fully acquainted with the reason of it; but the service under the Gospel appears to be more reasonable than that was. The time appointed of the Father being come, when the church was to arrive at its full age, now that darkness and bondage under which it before lay is removed, and we are under a dispensation of greater light and liberty.

Secondly, He acquaints us with the much happier state of Christians under the gospel dispensation; ver. 4-7, "When the fulness of time was come," the time appointed of the Father, when he would put an end to the legal dispensation, and set up another and a better in the room of it, he "sent forth his Son," &c. The person who was employed to introduce this new dispensation was no other than the Son of God himself, the only begotten of the Father, who, as he had been prophesied of and promised from the foundation of the world, so in due time was manifested for this purpose. He, in pursuance of the great design he had undertaken, submitted to be "made of a woman," there is his incarnation; and to be "made under the law," there is his subjection. He who was truly God, yet for our sakes became man; and he was Lord of all yet consented to come into a state of subjection, and to take upon him the form of a servant; and one great end of all this was "to redeem them that were under the law," to save us from that intolerable yoke, and to appoint gospel ordinances more rational and easy.

[1. Jesus Christ had a being and subsistence before his incarnation, he was even from all eternity truly God, Ps. viii. 23, for he is "sent forth" before "he was made of a woman." 2. The Father cannot but accept the obedience of Christ in the name of those for whom it is offered, and who do lay hold upon it by faith; seeing Christ did not come of himself, but was sent by the Father to pay, in obedience to the law, that he might redeem those that were under the law; for "God sent his Son," to wit, not by dispatching him from one place to another, (for the Son, being God, is present in all places, and can be absent from none,) but by making him appear invested with the human nature, which before he was not. 3. Jesus Christ is God's Son in a way proper to himself alone, as being his only Son by nature, Jno. i. 14; the eternally begotten Son of the Father, Ps. ii. 7; and the express image of the Father's glory, Heb. i. 3; for it is of him he speaketh while he saith, "God sent his Son." 4. It belongeth our Mediator to be true man, God's unchangeable justice so requiring, that the same nature which sinned should also suffer for sin; for he "was made of a woman." 5. Christ's human nature was miraculously formed by the Holy Ghost in the womb of a virgin without the company of any man; whence it followeth that he was free from the guilt of Adam's first sin, and consequently of original sin, which descendeth from Adam unto all his posterity, who come of him by ordinary generation, Gen. v. 3; but Christ did not so come of him, for he "was made of a woman," and not begotten by a man, Mat. i. 28. 6. The body of Christ was not created in heaven, and conveyed to the womb of the virgin, and from her to the world, without taking of its substance from her, as water is conveyed through a conduit, but it was framed in the virgin and of her substance; for "he was made of a woman." 7. Though there be two natures in Christ, as being both God and man, yet he is but one person; for the same Son who was sent by the Father is "made of a woman." 8. By virtue of this personal union of the two natures in Christ, those things which are only verified in the one nature are attributed unto and spoken of the whole person; for to be made of a woman (which agreeth only to the human nature) is ascribed to the person of the Son; "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman."]

He had indeed something more and greater in his view in coming into the world than merely to deliver us from the bondage of the ceremonial law; for he came into our nature, and consented to suffer and die for us, that hereby he might redeem us from the wrath of God, and from the curse of the moral law, which, as sinners, we all lay under. But that was one end of it, and a mercy reserved to be bestowed at the time of his manifestation; then the more servile state of the church was to come to a period, and a better to succeed in the place of it; for he was sent to redeem us, "that we might receive the adoption of sons," that we might no longer be accounted and treated as servants, but as sons grown up to maturity, who are allowed greater freedoms and admitted to larger privileges than while they were under tutors and governors. This, the course of the apostle's argument leads us to take notice of as one thing intended by this expression, though no doubt it may also be understood as signifying that gracious adoption which the Gospel so often speaks of as the privilege of those who believe in Christ. Israel was God's son, his firstborn, Rom. ix. 4; but now, under the Gospel, particular believers receive the adoption; and, as an earnest and evidence of it, they have together therewith the spirit of adoption, putting them upon the duty of prayer, and enabling them in prayer to eye God as a father; for, as it follows, ver. 6, "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father."

[1. The Spirit here spoken of is not a naked quality, or operation and work only, but a person subsisting of himself, as appeareth from this, that he is said to be sent forth, which agreeth only to persons; "God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son." 2. He is a Divine person, and no mere creature; for he dwelleth in the hearts of all believers, which can be said of no person but God; "God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." 3. Whoever have this high dignity of adoption conferred upon them, must also have the Spirit of God given to reside, not in their brain only, to fill them with the gifts of knowledge, as he may be in hypocrites, Mat. vii. 22, but in their hearts also, by making a gracious change there, Eph. iv. 23, to be diffused from thence, as from the first principle of life, Pr. iv. 23, through all the faculties of the soul, and members of the body, 1 Thes. v. 23; for, saith he, "Because ye are sons, he hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts."]

And hereupon, ver. 7, the apostle concludes this argument, by adding, "Wherefore thou art no more a servant but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ;" that is, now under the gospel state we are no longer under the servitude of the law, but upon our believing in Christ become the sons of God; we are thereupon accepted of him, and adopted by him; and, being the sons, we are also heirs of God, and are entitled to the heavenly inheritance, as he also reasons, Rom. viii. 17. And therefore it must needs be the greatest weakness and folly to turn back to the law, and to seek justification by the works of it. From what the apostle says in these verses, we may observe,

1. The wonders of Divine love and mercy towards us, particularly of God the Father in sending his Son into the world to redeem and save us; of the Son of God in submitting so low, and suffering so much for us, in pursuance of that design; and of the Holy Spirit in condescending to dwell in the hearts of believers for such gracious purposes.

2. The great and invaluable advantages which Christians enjoy under the Gospel; for, 1st. We "receive the adoption of sons." Whence note, That it is the great privilege which believers have through Christ that they are adopted children of the God of heaven. We, who by nature are children of wrath and disobedience, are become by grace children of love. 2nd. We receive "the spirit of adoption." Note, First. That all that have the privilege of adoption have the spirit of adoption; all that are received into the number partake of the nature of the children of God, for he will have all his children to resemble him. Secondly. That the spirit of adoption is always the spirit of prayer, and it is our duty in prayer to eye God as a Father. Christ hath taught us in prayer to eye God as our Father in heaven. Thirdly. If we are his sons, then his heirs. It is not so among men, with whom the eldest son is heir. But all God's children are heirs; they that have the nature of sons shall have the inheritance of sons.

[Paul has Christ ever in his mouth; he cannot forget him; for he foresaw that nothing would be less known in the world, even among those who would profess themselves to be Christians, than Christ and his Gospel. Hence he perpetually refers to him and places him before our eyes. And as often as he speaks of grace, righteousness, promise, filiation and heirship, he is ever wont to add, "in" or "through Christ," hereby alluding indirectly to law, as though he said, "These things come not to us by the law or its work, (much less by our own strength or the works of human traditions,) but by Christ alone.—Luther.]

8 Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. 9 But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage? 10 Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. 11 I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

In these verses the apostle puts them in mind of what they were before their conversion to the faith of Christ, and what a blessed change their conversion had made upon them, and from thence endeavours to convince them of their great weakness in hearkening to those that would bring them under the bondage of the law of Moses.

First. He reminds them of their past state and behaviour, and what they were before the Gospel was preached to them. Then they knew not God, they were grossly ignorant of the true God, and the way wherein he is to be worshipped. And at that time they were under the worst of slaveries, for "they did service to them which by nature were no gods;" they were employed in a great number of superstitious and idolatrous services to those who, though they were accounted gods, yet were really no gods, but mere creatures, and perhaps of their own making, and therefore were utterly unable to hear and help them. Note, 1. That those who are ignorant of the true God cannot but be inclined to false gods. They who forsake the God that made the world, rather than be without gods, worshipped such as they themselves made. 2. That religious worship is due to none but to him who is by nature God; for when the apostle blames the doing service to such as by nature were no gods, he plainly shews that he only who is by nature God is the proper object of our religious worship.

Secondly. He calls upon them to consider the happy change that was made in them by the preaching of the Gospel among them. Now they had known God they were brought to the knowledge of the true God and of his Son Jesus Christ, whereby they were recovered out of that ignorance and bondage under which they before lay, or rather were known of God. This happy change in their state, whereby they were turned from idols to the living God, and through Christ had received the adoption of sons, was not owing to themselves, but to him. It was the effect of his free and rich grace towards them, and as such they ought to account it; and therefore hereby they were laid under the greater obligation to adhere to the liberty wherewith he had made them free. Note, That all our acquaintance with God begins with him; we know him, because we are known of him.

Thirdly. From hence he infers the unreasonableness and madness of their suffering themselves to be brought again into a state of bondage. He speaks of it with surprise and deep concern of mind, that such as they should do so; "How turn ye again?" &c., saith he, ver. 9; how is it that you, who have been taught to worship God in the gospel way, should now be persuaded to comply with the ceremonial way of worship? that you, who have been acquainted with a dispensation of light, liberty, and love, as that of the Gospel is, should now submit to a dispensation of darkness, and bondage, and terror, as that of the law is? This they had the less reason for, since they had never been under the law of Moses, as the Jews had been, and therefore on this account they were more inexcusable than the Jews themselves, who might be supposed to have some fondness for that which had been of so long standing among them. Besides, what they suffered themselves to be brought into bondage to were but weak and beggarly elements, such things as had no power in them to cleanse the soul, or to afford any solid satisfaction to the mind, and which were only designed for that state of pupillage under which the church had been, but which was now come to a period; and therefore their wickedness and folly were the more aggravated in submitting to them, and in symbolizing with the Jews in observing their various festivals, here signified by "days, and months, and times, and years." Here note, 1. That it is possible for those who have made great professions of religion to be afterwards drawn into very great defections from the purity and simplicity of it, for this was the case of these Christians. 2. That the more mercy God has shewn to any in bringing them into an acquaintance with the Gospel, and the liberties and privileges of it, the greater is their sin and folly in suffering themselves to be deprived of them; for this the apostle lays a special stress upon, that after they had known God, or rather were known of him, they desired to be in bondage under the weak and beggarly elements of the law.

Fourthly. Hereupon he expresses his fears concerning them. "Lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain." He had been at a great deal of pains about them in preaching the Gospel to them, and endeavouring to confirm them in the faith and liberty of it; but now they were giving up these, and thereby rendering his labour among them fruitless and ineffectual, and this he could not but be deeply affected with the thoughts of. Note, 1. That a great deal of the labour of faithful ministers is labour in vain, and that when it is so it cannot but be a great grief to those who desire the salvation of souls. Note, 2. That the labour of ministers is in vain upon those that begin in the Spirit and end in the flesh, who, though they seem to set out well, yet afterwards

Col. ii. 8, 20, which seem to show that the expression refers to "a mode of instruction."

iv. 6. "Crying:" the word expresses earnest and importunate prayer. (See Isa. xix. 20; James v. 4.)

iv. 7. "An heir:" the best MSS. read "an heir through God"—i.e., an heir not by virtue of birth or merit, but through God, who adopted you.

iv. 8, 9. "Nevertheless, in an unfilial spirit, ye have subjected yourselves again to bondage. Formerly your subjection to gods 'which by nature exist not' (Alford) was due to ignorance. Now, after having 'recognised' God, how turn you back?" The word rendered "known" in verse 9 is distinct from that rendered "knew" in verse 8; the latter brings out more strongly the recognition of facts. "Weak and beggarly:" weak, because powerless to rescue from condemnation; beggarly, because bringing no rich endowment of spiritual treasures.

turn aside from the way of the Gospel. Note, 3. That those will have a great deal to answer for upon whom the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ bestow labour in vain.

12 Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all. 13 Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first. 14 And my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus. 15 Where is then the blessedness ye spake of? for I bear you record, that, if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me. 16 Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?

That these Christians might be the more ashamed of their defection from the truth of the Gospel which Paul had preached to them, he here reminds them of the great affection they formerly had for him and his ministry, and puts them upon considering how very unsuitable their present behaviour was to what they then professed. And here we may observe,

First. How affectionately he addresses himself to them. He styles them brethren, though he knew their hearts were in a great measure alienated from him. He desires that all resentments might be laid aside, and that they would bear the same temper of mind towards him which he did to them; he would have them to be as he was, for he was as they were; and moreover tells them that they had not injured him at all. He had no quarrel with them upon his own account; though in blaming their conduct he had expressed himself with some warmth and concern of mind, yet he assures them that was not owing to any sense of personal injury or affront, as they might be ready to think, but proceeded wholly from a zeal for the truth and purity of the Gospel, and their welfare and happiness. Thus he endeavours to mollify their spirits towards him, that so they might be the better disposed to receive the admonitions he was giving them; and hereby teaches us that in our reproving others we should take care to convince them that our reproofs do not proceed from any private pique or resentment, but from a sincere regard to the honour of God and religion, and their truest welfare; for then they are like to be most successful when they appear to be most disinterested.

Secondly. How he magnifies their former affection to him, that hereby they might be the more ashamed of their present behaviour towards him. To this purpose, 1. He puts them in mind of the difficulty under which he laboured when he first came among them. "Ye know," says he, "how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the Gospel unto you at the first." What this "infirmity of the flesh" was, which in the following words he expresses by his temptation that was in his flesh, though no doubt it was well known to those Christians to whom he wrote, yet now we can have no certain knowledge of it. Some take it to have been the persecutions which he suffered for the Gospel's sake, others to have been something in his person or manner of speaking which might render his ministry less grateful and acceptable, referring to 2 Cor. x. 10, and to ch. xii. 7-10. But whatever it was it seems it made no impression on them to his disadvantage; for, 2. He takes notice that, notwithstanding this his infirmity, which might possibly lessen him in the esteem of some others, yet they did not despise or reject him on the account of it, but, on the contrary, received him "as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus;" they shewed a great deal of respect to him; he was a welcome messenger to them, even as though an angel of God, or Jesus Christ himself, had preached to them. Yea, so great was their esteem of him, that, if it would have been any advantage to him, they could have plucked out their own eyes and have given them to him. Note, How uncertain the respects of people are, how apt they are to change their minds, and how easily they are drawn into a contempt of those for whom they once had the greatest esteem and affection, so that they are ready to pluck out the eyes of those for whom they would before have plucked out their own! We should therefore labour to be accepted of God, "for it is a small thing to be judged of man's judgment," 1 Cor. iv. 3.

Thirdly. How earnestly he expostulates with them hereupon. "Where is then," says he, "the blessedness ye spake of?" As if he had said, Time was when you expressed the greatest joy and satisfaction in the glad tidings of the Gospel, and were very forward in pouring out your blessings upon me as the publisher of them; whence is it that you are now so much altered, that you have so little relish of them or respect for me? You once thought yourselves happy in receiving the Gospel; have you now any reason to think otherwise? Note, Those that have left their first love would do well to consider where is now the blessedness they once spake of; what is become of that pleasure they used to take in communion with God, and in the company of his servants. And, the more to impress upon them a just shame of their present conduct, he again asks, ver. 16, "Am I become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?" How is it that I, who was heretofore your favourite, am now accounted your enemy? Can you pretend any other reason for it than that I have told you the truth, endeavoured to acquaint you with, and to confirm you in, the truth of the Gospel? and if not, how unreasonable must your disaffection be. Note, 1. That it is no uncommon thing for men to account those their enemies who are really their best friends; for so to be sure those are, whether ministers or others, who tell them the truth, and deal freely and faithfully with them in matters relating to their eternal salvation, as the apostle now did with these Christians. 2. That ministers may sometimes create enemies to themselves by the faithful discharge of their duty; for this was the case of Paul,—he was accounted their enemy for telling them the truth. 3. That yet ministers must not forbear speaking the truth for fear of offending others, and drawing their displeasure upon them. And, 4. That they may be easy in their own minds when they are conscious to themselves that, if others are become their enemies, it is only for telling them the truth.

17 They zealously affect you, but not well; yea, they would exclude you, that ye might affect them.

iv. 10. "Days:" the weekly-recurring Sabbaths. "Months:" or the new moons. "Times;" the annual festivals—Passover, Pentecost, &c. "Years:" the sacred years, as the Sabbatical year and year of jubilee. With regard to this latter, it has been calculated that the year 54-55 was a Sabbatical year.

iv. 12. "Be as I am:" i.e., "Be free from the bondage of ordinances as I am; for I am as ye are. I gave up my associations of race and custom as a Jew, to become like you. Ye did me no wrong, I have 18 But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.

The apostle is still carrying on the same design as in the foregoing verses, which was to convince the Galatians of their sin and folly in departing from the truth of the Gospel; and having just before been expostulating with them about the change of their behaviour towards him who endeavoured to establish them in it, he here gives them the character of those false teachers who made it their business to draw them away from it, which, if they would attend to, they might soon see how little reason they had to hearken to them. Whatever apprehensions they might have of them, he tells them they were designing men, who were aiming to set up themselves, and who, under their specious pretences, were more consulting their own interest than theirs. "They zealously affect you," says he; they shew a mighty respect for you, and pretend a great deal of affection to you, "but not well;" they do it not with any good design, they are not sincere and upright in it, for "they would exclude you, that you might affect them." That which they are chiefly aiming at is, to engage your affections to them, and in order to this they are doing all they can to draw off your affections from me and from the truth, that so they may engross you to themselves. This, he assures them, was their design, and therefore they must needs be very unwise in hearkening to them. Note, 1. That there may appear to be a great deal of zeal where yet there is but little truth and sincerity. 2. That it is the usual way of seducers to insinuate themselves into people's affections, and by that means to draw them into their opinions. 3. That, whatever pretences such may make, they have usually more regard to their own interest than that of others, and will not stick at ruining the reputation of others, if by that means they can raise their own. On this occasion the apostle gives us that excellent rule which we have ver. 18, "It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing." What our translation renders, "in a good thing," some choose to render, "to a good man," and so consider the apostle as pointing to himself; and this sense they think is favoured both by the preceding context and also by the words immediately following, "and not only when I am present with you;" which may be as if he had said, Time was when you were zealously affected towards me, you once took me for a good man, and have now no reason to think otherwise of me: sure, then, it would become you to shew the same regard to me, now that I am absent from you, which you did when I was present with you. But if we adhere to our own translation, the apostle here furnishes us with a very good rule to direct and regulate us in the exercise of our zeal; and there are two things which to this purpose he more especially recommends to us. 1st. That it be exercised only upon that which is good; for zeal is then only good when it is in a good thing. They who are zealously affected to that which is evil will thereby only do so much the more hurt. And, 2nd. That herein it be constant and steady. It is good to be zealous always in a good thing, not for a time only, or now and then, like the heat of an ague fit, but, like the natural heat of the body, constant. And happy would it be for the church of Christ if this rule was better observed among Christians.

19 My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you, 20 I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice; for I stand in doubt of you.

That the apostle might the better dispose these Christians to bear with him in the reproofs which he was obliged to give them, he here expresses his great affection to them, and the very tender concern he had for their welfare. He was not like them, one thing when among them and another when absent from them; their disaffection to him had not removed his affection from them, but he still bore the same respect to them which he had formerly done. Nor was he like their false teachers, who pretended a great deal of affection to them, when at the same time they were only consulting their own interest; but he had a sincere concern for their truest advantage; he sought not theirs, but them. They were too ready to account him their enemy, but he assures them that he was their friend; nay, not only so, but that he had the bowels of a parent towards them. He calls them his children, as he justly might, since he had been the instrument of their conversion to the Christian faith; yea, he styles them his "little children," which, as it denotes a greater degree of tenderness and affection to them, so it may possibly have a respect to their present behaviour, whereby they shewed themselves too like little children, who are easily wrought upon by the arts and insinuations of others. He expresses his concern for them, and earnest desire of their welfare and soul-prosperity, by the pangs of a travelling woman; he travailed in birth for them: and the great thing that he was in so much pain about, and which he was so earnestly desirous of, was not so much that they might affect him, as that Christ might be formed in them; that they might become Christians indeed, and be more confirmed and established in the faith of the Gospel; from whence we may note, 1. The very tender affection which faithful ministers bear towards those among whom they are employed; it is like that of the most affectionate parents to their little children. 2. That the chief thing they are longing, and even travelling in birth for, on their account, is, that Christ may be formed in them; not so much that they may gain their affections, much less that they may make a prey of them, but that they may be renewed in the spirit of their minds, wrought into the image of Christ, and more fully settled and confirmed in the Christian faith and life. And how unreasonably must those people act who suffer themselves to be prevailed upon to desert or dislike such ministers. 3. That Christ is not fully formed in men till they are brought off from trusting in their own righteousness, and made to rely only upon him and his righteousness.

As a farther evidence of the affection and concern which the apostle had for these Christians, he adds, ver. 20, that he desired to be then present with them; he would be glad of an opportunity of being among them and conversing with them, and that thereupon he might find occasion to change his voice towards them, for at present he stood in doubt of them; he knew not well what to think of them. He was not so fully acquainted with their state as to know how to accommodate himself to them; he was full of fears and jealousies concerning them, which was the reason of his writing to them in such a manner as he had done. But he would be glad to find that matters were better with them than he feared, and that he might have occasion to speak them fair, instead of thus reproving and chiding them. Note,
